Q. At the time of your husband's death, and at the time you began this suit, how many children had you by Gottlieb Kolb?

A. Three children.

Q. That are living?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many children did you have by Gottlieb Kolb?

A. Three.

Then follows testimony giving the names of these children as set forth in the declaration, and the age of each.

Q. Did you ever have any other children by Gottlieb Kolb?

A. No, sir.

In cross-examination, counsel for defendant was permitted against the objection of the plaintiff, and after some discussion as to the evident purpose of the inquiry, to ask the following question: "Q. You have more than three, haven't you?" The court ruled that it would be proper for the defendant to show what children the deceased left, and, as affecting the plaintiff's character for truth and veracity, to show that there had been improper conduct on her part since her husband's death. The ground of objection on the part of plaintiff was that the evidence was immaterial and irrelevant, and was specially obnoxious to the objection that it was an attempt to impeach the plaintiff's character for chastity without first showing a conviction of the offense involved in her misconduct notwithstanding the plaintiff's objection, however, she was compelled to admit that she gave birth to an illegitimate child October 20, 1895, more than twenty-one months after her husband's death. The admission of this evidence was duly excepted to by the plaintiff, and the question presented, therefore, is whether the court erred in admitting it. We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. Whether or not the plaintiff had given birth to a bastard child was entirely irrelevant to any issue involved in the case on trial. Nor do we understand it to be seriously contended by defendant that it was. But it is vigorously contended that it was competent for the defendant to prove the unchastity of the plaintiff for the purpose of affecting her credibility as a witness in the case.

The broad claim advanced by counsel for defendant in support of the ruling complained of is that a witness may be interrogated upon cross-examination in regard to any vicious or criminal act of his life, and may be compelled to answer unless he claims his constitutional privilege. We think this position is clearly untenable, and that, while it finds support in some of the cases relied on by the defendant, the contrary view is overwhelmingly sustained by the authorities. We agree that specific acts of misconduct committed by a party to the suit may be shown in that class of cases where the act has some relation to, or some bearing upon, the issue involved in the case, and also that the general reputation of the party as to the particular trait of character involved may also be shown. Thus, in Mitchell v. Work, 13 R. I. 645, which was an action to recover damages laid at $5,000, for an indecent assault, it was held that testimony showing the plaintiff to have been unchaste in her relations with men, and also testimony that her reputation for chastity was bad, were properly admitted. The plaintiff in that case was suing for something more than compensation for bodily injuries. Indeed, the gravamen of the assault consisted, according to her testimony, in the insult, the personal indignity, and in the mental suffering and sense of shame and wrong consequent upon it. It was therefore clearly pertinent for the defendant to show that she was a vulgar, licentious, and unchaste woman, and hence that the damages to which she would be entitled, if any, would be much less than if she had been upright and chaste in her character. But no such question is presented in the case at bar. Here the plaintiff is suing for damages sustained by the death of her husband through the alleged negligence of the defendant. And the fact that she has given birth to an illegitimate child since the death of her husband in no way whatever affects the question of damages involved in the case; nor, indeed, does it affect any other question involved therein. Nor can said fact be properly shown for the purpose of affecting the plaintiff's credibility for truth and veracity. The credit of a witness can be directly impeached only by showing that his general reputation for truth and veracity is bad. "Certainly it is a fixed and established rule in the law of evidence," as said by the court in Holbrook v. Dow, 12 Gray, 358, "that it is not competent, for the purpose of creating a distrust of his integrity, and of thus disparaging his testimony, to prove particular acts of alleged misbehavior and dishonesty in relation to matters foreign to all the questions which are involved in the trial. 'This point,' says Mr. Greenleaf, 'has heretofore been much the subject of discussion, but it must now be considered as settled and at rest.' 1 Greenl. Ev. § 461." In the latest edition of 1 Greenl. Ev. § 461a, the rule, as laid down by the present editor, relating to the impeachment of a witness, is stated as follows: "The fundamental trait desirable in a witness is the disposition to tell truth, and hence the trait of character that should naturally be shown in impeaching him is his bad character for veracity. But there has always been more or less support for the use of bad general character, i. e., the man as a whole, not specifically the trait of veracity, as necessarily involving an impairment of veracity. This was the original English doctrine, but it was replaced in the early 1800's by the first-mentioned principle, with the exception that the witness was allowed to base his statement as to the other's veracity upon his knowledge of the other's general character. In this country, the better doctrine, that the trait of veracity only could be considered, was early introduced, and this is the rule in the great majority of jurisdictions."

In 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 804-806, the rule as to the admissibility of particular acts of misconduct, and also as to particular traits of character, is well stated in the following language: "Whether the inquiry into the character of the witness be confined to his reputation for truth and veracity, or extend to his general moral character, the rule is uniform that evidence of specific crimes or of particular acts of misconduct on his part is not admissible for the purpose of impeaching his credit. The impeaching evidence must be confined to the general reputation of the witness. It is also a general rule that peculiar traits of character, aside from that of habitual lying, shall not be made the subject of inquiry for the purpose of impeaching a witness. Thus, a witness may not be impeached by evidence that he is in the habit of associating with lewd and unchaste women; neither is it permissible, as a rule, to impeach a female witness by attacking her reputation for chastity, even where it is proposed to prove that she is a common prostitute." The author adds, however, that "in a few cases . . . the wholesome restraints of this rule have been disregarded." The cases cited which are to this effect are from Missouri, Georgia, and Kentucky. The general doctrine above announced is sustained by Wharton, Ev. 3d ed. § 541; Rapalje, Witnesses, § 197; Thomp. Trials, §§ 524, 525; and is also in accord with the great majority of decisions throughout the country. As specially pertinent to the particular question here involved, we cite the cases of Com. v. Churchhill, 11 Met. 538, 45 Am. Dec. 229; State v. Smith, 7 Vt. 141; Spears v. Forrest, 15 Vt. 437; Gilchrist v. M'Kee, 4 Watts, 380, 28 Am. Dec. 721; State v. Carson, 66 Me. 116; Rudsill v. Slingerland, 18 Minn. 380, Gil. 342; Atwood v. Impson, 20 N. J. Eq. 157; Bucklin v. State, 20 Ohio, 18; Mustee v. Tuteur, 77 Wis. 243, 9 L. R. A. 86, 46 N. W. 123; Dimick v. Downs, 82 Ill. 570; Moore v. Moore, 73 Tex. 382, 11 S. W. 396.

That a trial court may properly exercise a large discretion in permitting matters which are not strictly relevant to the issue involved in the trial to be brought out in the cross-examination of witnesses there can be no doubt. It is through cross-examination that the whole truth is generally brought out, and that the motives of the witness in testifying are made apparent. The power of cross-examination has been justly said to be one of the principal, as it certainly is one of the most efficacious, tests which the law has devised for the discovery of truth. 1 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 446. If the witness is biased or prejudiced in favor of the party calling him, that may be made to appear in cross-examination. If he has previously made statements contrary to those made upon the witness stand, this fact may be brought out in the same way. His relation to the case, if any; his interest in the result; his relationship to the parties or to either of them; how he came to be a witness; his intelligence; means of knowledge; his business; place of residence; the accuracy of his memory; and many other things, which need not be enumerated,—may be thus brought out for the purpose of enabling the jury to rightly estimate and weigh his testimony. But that the past life of a witness may be ransacked, and his misdeeds paraded before the jury, for the purpose of disgracing and degrading him in their eyes, is so obnoxious to our sense of what is justly due to a person on the witness stand that we cannot consent thereto. If unrestricted liberty were allowed in this respect, no witness, however modest or however venerable, could be sworn without being required, if it should please the opposing counsel, to submit to an investigation into his or her past history, however offensive and humiliating this might be, and notwithstanding the fact that the particular acts of misconduct which might thus be brought out were long ago atoned for and generally forgotten. Such inquisitions the great majority of the courts refuse to permit, and we think rightly so refuse.

The previous rulings of this court, so far as we are aware, have always been in harmony with the position which we have thus taken. An examination of the numerous cases cited in the well-prepared briefs of the respective counsel in this case conclusively shows that the authorities are hopelessly divided on the question at issue, and hence it would serve no useful purpose to further discuss their relative merits. We therefore content ourselves by adopting that view which most strongly commends itself to our judgment, and which, as already said, is supported by the great preponderance of authority.

As the admission of the irrelevant and improper testimony referred to was of such a character as to be very likely to prejudice the jury against the plaintiff,—indeed, in view of the record in the case, it is not too much to say that it probably had this effect,—and as it is not clear from the evidence that the defendant was entitled to a verdict in any event, a new trial must be granted. Graham v. Coupe, 9 R. I. 478; King v. Colvin, 11 R. I. 582; Tourgee v. Rose, 19 R. I. 432, 37 Atl. 9. We express no opinion as to the merits of the petition, in so far as it is based on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence.

Petition for new trial granted, and case remitted to the common pleas division.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

F. C. DOREMUS, Respt.,

v.

Samuel ROOT,

OREGON RAILROAD & NAVIGATION

(23 Wash. 710.)

1. In an action against a railroad company and its conductor for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the conductor a verdict in favor of the latter will preclude a judgment against the company.
2. The action of the trial court in construing a verdict silent as to one of two sued jointly for injuries caused by the alleged negligence of one acting as agent for the other, as a verdict in his favor, and rendering judgment to that effect, is, at most, error rendering the judgment voidable if properly attacked, but leaving it conclusive against collateral attack.

3. Appeal by defendant against whom judgment is rendered in an action against two for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of one acting as agent for the other, in which judgment is rendered against one and in favor of the other, will take up only that part of the judgment which affects appellant, and the appellate court will have no power over the other judgment on such appeal.

4. Judgment absolute must be entered upon appeal, in favor of the principal,

- VI. Conclusion.

I. The general rule.

Where the relations between two parties are analogous to that of principal and agent, or principal and surety, or master and servant, the 54 L. R. A.

rule is, that a judgment in favor of either, in an action brought by a third party, rendered upon a ground equally applicable to both, should be accepted as conclusive against the plaintiff's right of action against the other. Featherston v. Newburgh & C. Turnp. Road, 71 Hun, 109, 24 N. Y. Supp. 603; Warfield v. Davis, 14 B. Mon. 40; Kansas City v. Mitchener, 85 Mo. App. 86.

And where the relation of master and servant, or principal and agent, exists between parties, and an action is brought against the agent or servant, and it is the right or duty of the principal or master to appear when called upon and assume the defense of the agent or servant, grounded upon his implied obligation to save him harmless, and he actually does defend him, he has the same legal rights as though he had been

In an action against principal and agent for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the agent, where judgment was entered in the trial court in favor of the agent and against the principal, and the principal alone appeals, since the judgment in favor of the agent precludes a recovery against the principal, and the appellate court has no power to revise such judgment.

APPEAL by defendant transportation company from a judgment of the Superior Court for Whitman County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cotton, Teal, & Minor, for appellant:

actually a party to the action, under the principles of res judicata, and a judgment in favor of the agent is conclusive against the same claim subsequently made in an action by or against the principal or master. Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329; Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401.

The rule that a principal when his agent is sued in a transaction can set up a judgment in favor of the agent as a bar to an action against himself by the same plaintiff for the same cause of action is based upon that principle of public policy which gives every man one opportunity to prove his case, and limits every man to such opportunity. Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401.

A master or principal is liable for the wrongful act of his servant or agent because such act is his act through the instrumentality of the servant or agent. A determination, therefore, exonerating the servant or agent, and establishing that his act was not wrongful, or that it was excusable, is necessarily a like determination in favor of the master or principal; and, were the person claiming to have been injured permitted to proceed against the master or principal after such a determination in favor of the servant or agent, he would be given a second opportunity to establish a right of recovery for the same act.

A former judgment in favor of a servant or agent, however, to be a bar against a subsequent action against the master or principal for the same cause must have been a judgment upon the merits. This was held, in effect, in Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401.

Thus, a plea of a former judgment in favor of an agent as a bar to a subsequent action against the principal for the same cause is bad, where it appears that the former judgment was rendered upon a nonsuit of the plaintiff, and not upon the merits. Ibid.

And a nonsuit in an action against a deputy sheriff for default in attaching certain property under a writ of attachment is not a bar to a subsequent action by the same plaintiff for the same cause brought against the sheriff, as in such case the nonsuit would be no bar to a second action against the sheriff himself. Clapp v. Thomas, 5 Allen, 158.

In Ferrers v. Arden, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 668, however, the rule was stated that in personal actions a recovery upon demurrer, confession, or verdict is a bar to every other personal action for the same cause, and the party has no remedy but by error or attain; but the action was one of trespass for taking an ox, and it 54 L. R. A.

No joint cause of action existed against the railroad company and Root.

When a servant negligently does an injury, he is liable because of his own direct trespass. For the wrongful act of the servant, however, the master may or may not be liable. Before liability can arise in any case, it must be made to appear that the negligent act of the servant was within the scope of his authority.

Hart v. Maney, 12 Wash. 271, 40 Pac. 987; Robinson v. McNeill, 18 Wash. 163, 51 Pac. 355.

Where the injured person is himself a servant of the same common master, then, before the master can be held liable it must not only appear that the act was within the scope of the wrongdoer's authority, but that such wrongdoer was a servant occupying the position of a vice-principal.

Sayward v. Carlson, 1 Wash. 29, 23 Pac.

appeared that the taking in that and in the former action were one and the same, and that the trover and conversion supposed in the latter action to be by the defendant only was committed by the other defendants with him, and that they had been omitted and not named in the latter action.

II. Identity or privity as to parties.

Two actions are between the same parties so as to be within the principle of res judicata, not only when the same persons are parties, but when they have appeared by their agents and representatives. Gallagher v. Moundsville, 34 W. Va. 730, 12 S. E. 859.

In the term "parties to an action," within the meaning of the law of res judicata, is included, not only the persons named and privies in law, but those persons whose rights have been legally represented by them. Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326, 63 Am. Dec. 627.

And a judgment in favor of the owner of property abutting upon a highway, in an action brought by a person who suffered a personal injury upon such highway by coming in contact with an obstruction in front of such premises, rendered upon the ground of the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, is a bar to a subsequent action brought by the person injured against the turnpike company having charge of the highway, since, if the property owner was not liable because of the plaintiff's own negligence, then the turnpike company could not be, under the rule that a judgment in favor of one of two parties occupying the relation of principal and agent, principal and surety, or master and servant upon a ground equally applicable to both, should be accepted as conclusive against the plaintiff's right of action against the other. Featherston v. Newburgh & C. Turnp. Road, 71 Hun, 109, 24 N. Y. Supp. 608.

So, there is sufficient privity between a sheriff and his deputy to make a judgment in a suit against the deputy for a wrongful attachment rendered in favor of the deputy a bar to a subsequent action against the sheriff for wrongful seizure of the same goods. King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 675.

And a judgment in an action for mandamus brought against a city treasurer to compel him to apply a sum of money in his hands as such to pay certain overdue coupons clipped from bonds issued by the city, determining that the coupons were illegal, and dismissing the mandamus proceeding, is a bar to a subsequent proceeding by mandamus brought directly against the city for the recovery of judgment on the

A cause of action against the servant, and one against the master because of his relation to the servant, are so different in their characteristics that such separate causes of action cannot be joined and apparently made the foundation of a joint single cause of action against both.

Winchell*, 5 Cush. 592, 52 Am. Dec. 745; Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 47; Mulchey v. Methodist Religious Soc. 125 Mass. 489; Campbell v. Portland Sugar Co. 62 Me. 552, 16 Am. Rep. 503; Beuttel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 26 Fed. 50; Waras v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 72

Fed. 637; Hukill v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. 72 Fed. 745; Ferguson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 63 Fed. 177; Hartshorn v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 77 Fed. 9; Doremus v. Root, 94 Fed. 760.

The court erred in instructing that the jury might return a verdict against either of the defendants.

In view of the relation sustained by the railroad company to Root, it was entitled to have the entire issues found, including a finding against Root, so as to have recourse against him, had it so desired.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 281-292.

The verdict in this case cannot be made the basis of a judgment against the railroad company.

In order to support a judgment a special verdict must pass upon all of the material issues made by the pleadings.

same coupons, as the proceeding against the city treasurer was against him in his official capacity, and not as an individual. Ransom v. Pierre, 41 C. C. A. 585, 101 Fed. 665.

And a determination in an action by five taxpayers on behalf of themselves and of other taxpayers of the city for an injunction to restrain the issue and sale of municipal bonds on account of their invalidity, brought against the mayor and clerk of the city, authorized by an ordinance to sign, countersign, and sell such bonds and deliver them to commissioners authorized to receive and sell them, dissolving the injunction, is a bar to a subsequent action brought by two of the five taxpayers in behalf of themselves and of other taxpayers against the city and its marshal to restrain the collection of taxes to pay interest on such bonds, the invalidity of the bonds being alleged in each case, as the agents of the city represented it fully in the first case. Gallaher v. Moundsville, 34 W. Va. 730, 12 S. E. 859.

Likewise, a determination, in an action by a property owner against the civil engineer and marshal of a city for extending improvements so as to include a strip of his land, made in favor of the defendants therein, awarding them judgment for costs, is res judicata as to a subsequent suit brought by the property owner against the city and its civil engineer and marshal to enjoin the extension of such improvement so as to include such strip of land, as the city in both cases is the real party in interest, and the other defendants are its servants merely, acting under its authority, and the right and authority of the city to make the improvement was settled in the former suit, that adjudication being conclusive against the property owner, not only as to the city, but also as to such servants and agents. Faust v. Baumgartner, 113 Ind. 189, 15 N. E. 337.

So, in Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326, 63 Am. Dec. 627, it was said that the technical rule, that a judgment can only be admitted between the parties to the record or their privies, expands so far as to admit it, when the same question has been decided and judgment rendered between parties responsible for the acts of others; but the case was one in which the previous judgment was in an action against the principal, and not against the agent.

And in Hill v. Bain, 15 R. I. 75, 23 Atl. 44, it was held that a town sued for damages by a person injured while driving on a highway by coming in collision with certain teams and carts placed in the road by third parties may set up, by way of estoppel, a verdict and judgment recovered by the third parties in an action brought against them by the same plaintiff for the same injury, upon the ground that the town, though not a party to the former judgment, was so connected in interest with the parties to the former action that the judgment, when recovered therein, could be regarded as virtually recovered by the town for the purpose of estoppel; but the relationship between the persons placing the teams and carts in the road and the town does not appear in the case.

And Wilson v. Buell, 117 Ind. 315, 20 N. E. 231, holds that a determination in an action that the plaintiff take nothing as against the defendant and for the recovery by the defendant of the costs of the action, is a bar to a subsequent action in which the same matters are brought in issue though the parties to the two actions are not identical, there having been two defendants in the first action, while the determination was in favor of but one, and though the former action counted on a joint obligation, while the latter action counted on a separate obligation of the party in whose favor the first judgment was obtained; but it does not appear that the party in whose favor the judgment was obtained was the agent of the other defendant.

So, in State use of Hempstead v. Coste, 36 Mo. 437, 38 Am. Dec. 148, in which a former judgment in favor of an administrator was set up as a bar to a subsequent action against his sureties upon the same subject-matter, it was said that it is not true that the term "parties," within the meaning of the rule which renders a prior judgment conclusive on those who sustain that character, is restricted to those who appear as parties on the record, but, on the contrary, includes all who have a direct interest in the subject-matter of the suit, or a right to make a defense or control the proceedings; and that it has been held that the relation of master and servant and principal and surety constitutes such privity as would enable one of the parties to avail himself of a judgment rendered in favor of or against the other party on the same question; but the court omitted to cite the cases in which it had been so held.

And substantially the same thing was said in McKinsie v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 23 Md. 161; but the relationship between the defendants in the two actions would appear to have been that of bailor and bailee, and not of principal and agent.

And the same statement was made in Bates v. Stanton, 1 Duer, 79; but the action was one for the recovery of damages for the loss of goods, brought against the owners and master of a ship, in which a judgment in a prior action of trover was pleaded relating to the same goods, brought against persons to whom, as owners, the goods had been delivered by the defendants.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 383.

A jury should determine each issue involved, and the whole of each issue.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 281-292.

Where a general verdict is silent, or fails to find upon any of the issues involved, such verdict, like a special verdict, is necessarily regarded as a finding against the party upon whom the burden rests of establishing the issue not found.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 285.

If the action is one in which the defendants are jointly liable, but have a right of contribution among themselves, then silence as to one of them is such a defect as will render it necessary to set aside the verdict and also to vacate any judgment founded thereon.

ex rel. Ellison v. Marquette County Circuit Judge, 41 Mich. 222; Bissell v. Cushman, 5 Colo. 76; Ward v. Stanley, 41 Ill. App. 417.

Where the tort charged is a joint tort committed by all of the parties, so that no right of contribution exists, the silence of the verdict as to one of them is regarded as a verdict upon all of the issues in favor of the defendant not named.

Wilderman v. Sandusky, 15 Ill. 59; Westfield Gas & Mill. Co. v. Abernathy, 8 Ind. App. 73, 35 N. E. 399; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Kingsbury (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 322; Howard v. Johnson, 91 Ga. 322, 18 S. E. 132.

The silence of the jury as to Root was a finding in his favor. The action of Root was proper. He was entitled to have the issues found either for him or against him.

28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 281, 292.

And in Lyon v. Stanford, 42 N. J. Eq. 411, 7 Atl. 869, in which a wife was held bound by a judgment at law against her husband, rendered in a suit instituted against her husband alone, with relation to property of which she was the owner, on the ground that she was a real, though not a nominal, party to the litigation, it was said that the defense made was in reality her defense, interposed with her consent by her agent, and substantially on her behalf; and that, if it had prevailed, she could have insisted with justice that it estopped the plaintiff from any further denial of her right in the premises which her husband had secured and maintained for her.

A defense in an action, however, that in an action brought by a third party against the plaintiffs they set up the same matter, and that the third party recovered judgment therein, is bad as not showing privity between the third party and the defendants, unless it is made to appear that there existed an identity of interest between them which would make the defense equally conclusive in their favor, the rule being that privies, within the meaning of the law with relation to estoppel, are such persons only as are represented by the parties, and who claim under them or in privity with them. Godard v. Benson, 15 Abb. Pr. 191.

And while a judgment in favor of an agent, in an action for trespass for removing the household goods of an occupant of premises, in which it was alleged that the agent, at the request of the owners and as their agent, removed the occupant and her goods from the premises, but not alleging that he was the agent, or that the removal was made by him as such agent, is an adjudication as to the trespass, it does not estop the principal from contesting the question of his agency in a suit brought against him. Marks v. Sullivan, 8 Utah, 406, 20 L. R. A. 590, 32 Pac. 668.

And the Missouri courts, in some of the cases at least, would seem to have adopted a more strict construction of the term "parties" in this connection.

Thus, a judgment in a proceeding by mandamus by a stockholder in a corporation against the vice president and transfer agent of the company, brought to enforce a stockholder's right of inspection of the books of the corporation, rendered in favor of such vice president and transfer agent, is not a bar against a subsequent proceeding by mandamus brought by the same stockholder against the corporation to compel the corporation to allow the relator to inspect its books, as the parties are not the same. State ex rel. Wilson v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 29 Mo. App. 801.

So, a proceeding by mandamus brought by an underground service company under city ordinances to compel a street commissioner to grant to it permission to make certain excavations in certain streets pursuant to charter rights of the company, determined against the company and in favor of the commissioner, is not a bar to a subsequent proceeding by mandamus brought by a subway company to compel the city and its board of public improvements to take action upon plans and specifications submitted by the relators for service and supply pipes connecting manholes in the subway constructed by virtue of such ordinances, and to grant a permit to do the work contemplated, though the ordinances were determined to be ultra vires in the former proceeding, as the parties to the two suits in question were not the same. State ex rel. National Subway Co. v. St. Louis, 145 Mo. 551, 42 L. R. A. 113, 46 S. W. 981.

But see supra, State use of Hempstead v. Coste, 36 Mo. 437, 88 Am. Dec. 148.

III. Identity of issues.

The question on a plea of former adjudication in favor of an agent in an action against the principal by the same party for the same cause is whether the former suit against the agent was for precisely the same cause as the present suit, and the test is whether the issue actually determined in the former suit is identical with that upon which the complainant must recover in the latter suit if he is entitled to recover at all. Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401.

And where a previous judgment in an action against a principal or agent is set up as a bar to a subsequent action against the agent or principal, it is effectual for that purpose, if, upon a trial upon the merits, both suits might be determined upon the same testimony presented by the same parties or those by whom they were legally represented. Emery v. Fowler, 39 Mo. 326, 68 Am. Dec. 627.

And where one has such an interest in the matter involved in an action as to be entitled to share in the fruits of the judgment, and intrusts it to another for settlement by suit, he will be estopped to deny the matters adjudicated therein, as in such case the latter will be the agent of the former, with authority to prosecute the suit for his principal's benefit, and the principal will be bound by the judgment. Conger v. Chilcote, 42 Iowa, 18.

Thus, a judgment in favor of one who acted as the servant of a mortgagee, in seizing and appropriating a load of lumber, which was a

The verdict was against law because it was a verdict in favor of Root and also one against the railroad company. Such a verdict, being against law, must necessarily be set aside.

Pepperall v. City Park Transit Co. 15 Wash. 176, 45 Pac. 743, 46 Pac. 407.

Mr. M. O. Reed, for respondent:

To require a party injured to point out how much of the injury was done by one person and how much by another, or what share of responsibility is fairly attributable to each as between themselves, and to leave this to be apportioned among them by the jury, according to the mischief found to have been done by each, would in many cases be equivalent to a practical denial of justice.

While the law permits all the wrongdoers to be proceeded against jointly, it also leaves the party injured at liberty to pursue any one of them severally, or any number less than the whole, and to enforce his remedy regardless of the participation of the others. While the wrong is joint it is also, in contemplation of law, several.

part of the property covered by the mortgage, in which the validity of the mortgage was brought in issue, is conclusive against the title of the party from whom it was taken, who claimed it as purchaser under an execution against the mortgagor, in a subsequent action brought by the executors of the mortgagee, in which the mortgage was attacked as fraudulent as against creditors. Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329.

And a judgment in favor of an officer who replevied goods sold, in an action in which the claim was that the sale was made with intent to defraud the creditors of the vendor, is a bar to an action on a note given by the purchaser of the vendors, the sole consideration for which was the pretended sale. Bailey v. Foster, 9 Pick. 189.

And a plaintiff in an action against a deputy sheriff for seizing certain oats under attachment claimed by the plaintiff under a mortgage in which a judgment was rendered in favor of the deputy sheriff cannot afterwards maintain an action against the sheriff for seizure of the goods in question, setting up another title on the theory that no other title was tried in the former action except the mortgage title, as the matter in issue in the former action was the title to the oats and the conversion thereof by defendant in that case, and the jury found that the plaintiff had no title, and that therefore the defendant could not convert them, which covers the issue in the subsequent action. King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 675.

So, a determination in a proceeding by petition brought by a holder of matured coupons of township bonds against the county commissioners of the county who were the official agents of the township, for a mandamus requiring them to levy a tax for the payment of such coupons, determining the bonds to be invalid, is a bar to a subsequent action at law against the township on such coupons to recover payment thereof. Gorham v. Broad River Twp. 109 Fed. 772.

And a determination in two actions tried together, one brought against a board of supervisors to obtain a writ of certiorari to test the authority and power of the board to pass a certain resolution declaring a tax abated and directing the county treasurer not to collect it, and the other brought against the treasurer to obtain a writ of mandamus to compel the collection of the tax, that the tax was valid, and that there was no authority in the board of supervisors to abate it, is conclusive, in the absence of fraud or collusion, against a proceeding by petition of taxpayers in whose interest the defense in the former actions was made by their officers, brought against the treasurer of the county to enjoin the collection of the tax on the ground that it was illegal and void, the issues being identical, since the former actions were brought to enforce the tax, collection of which was sought to be enjoined in the subsequent action, and it cannot be said that there was no privity between the taxpayers and the officers who were made defendants in the former action. Lyman v. Faria, 53 Iowa, 498, 5 N. W. 621.

Likewise, in Glaze v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 116 Ind. 492, 18 N. E. 450, it was held that a determination, in an action by a husband against his wife for the recovery of moneys which were the proceeds of lands sold, and which came to the possession of the wife and were deposited by her and afterwards drawn after notice by the husband to the bank that the moneys belonged to him, rendered in favor of the wife, establishing title thereto, in her, after which she obtained a divorce, in effect determines that the husband had no title to the moneys, and is a bar to a subsequent action brought by him against the bank for the recovery thereof.

So, a mere difference in the mode of stating the same fraud in two actions brought therefor, in the former of which the agent recovered judgment and the principal was afterwards sued by the same plaintiff, or in stating the acts done in furtherance and execution of the same alleged fraudulent purpose or design, does not prevent the judgment in favor of the agent from being res judicata. Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401.

And a judgment in favor of an agent or servant of a mortgagee, in an action brought against the agent or servant for seizing property under the mortgage under directions of his principal, is not prevented from being conclusive against a title claimed by a third person derived from the mortgagor by purchase, so as to bar a claim in a second action that the mortgage was fraudulent and void as to creditors, by the fact that the bona fides of the mortgage was not passed upon or decided in the former case. Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329.

Or by the fact that the subject-matter of the second action was different from that of the other. Ibid.

And the fact that the act of a servant or agent in seizing lumber on behalf of his principal constituted a trespass does not prevent a judgment in his favor, in an action brought by the party from whom it was taken against him for the seizure from being conclusive against the same claim of title in a subsequent action by or against the principal or master, where the agent acted in good faith and in obedience to the express direction of his principal, as in such case the law would imply a promise on the part 22 N. E. 14; Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Cummings, 106 U. S. 702, 27 L. ed. 267, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Brown v. Coae Bros. & Co. 75 Fed. 689; Phelps v. Wait, 30 N. Y. 78; Harriman v. Stowe, 57 Mo. 93; Oreagh v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. 88 Fed. 1; Bliss, Code Pl. § 83a; Doremus v. Root, 94 Fed. 760.

The Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company at no time denied that Root was liable to this plaintiff, and the real purpose of the instructions asked was to produce an inconsistent verdict. If it wanted a judgment over against Root for contribution it could and would have had it but for its own requested instructions.

The jury might return a verdict against one defendant though they could not agree as to the others.

Lockwood v. Bartlett, 27 N. Y. S. R. 93, 7 N. Y. Supp. 481; Ward v. Taylor, 1 Pa. St.

of the principal to indemnify his agent, and the case would not fall within the rule prohibiting contribution between joint trespassers. Ibid.

But the general rule is, that a former judgment in favor of a servant or agent is conclusive in a subsequent action against the master or principal only upon a matter which was directly in issue upon the former trial. King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 675.

And the matter in issue, within the meaning of the rule that a judgment is a bar to a subsequent action as to the matter in issue in the former trial, is the matter upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action, and which the defendant controverts by his pleadings, and not the facts offered in evidence to establish the matter in issue, though they may be controverted on the trial. Ibid.

And where suit was brought against an agent, and the agent recovered judgment therein, and suit is subsequently brought by the same party against the principal, if there is any fact which must have been established in the former suit to authorize a verdict and judgment which the complainant is not obliged to prove to entitle him to a decree in the latter suit, or if the decree in the latter suit may pass upon proof of any of the allegations of the bill not necessarily determined against the complainant in the former suit, then the judgment in the former suit is no bar. Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401.

And a judgment rendered in favor of agents in an action brought against them for damages for fraud in procuring a contract in which, in order to make the facts a basis for recovery, the jury must have been satisfied by a fair preponderance of the evidence that the fraudulent acts alleged to have been done were done with an actual intent to defraud the complainant, is not a bar to a subsequent action brought by the complainant against the principal for a rescission of the contract, where such rescission might be had without proof of any such fraudulent intent. Ibid.

So, a judgment and verdict in favor of a servant or agent may be used as evidence between the same parties and their privies as a bar in another action against the master or principal for the same cause, and the matter may be pleaded, if there is any opportunity to plead it, and when thus pleaded it is conclusive; and where there is no opportunity to plead it, it may be given in evidence, and is equally conclusive of the matter which is established by it, and if from the general nature of the pleading the matter which has been before tried does not appear upon the face of the record, it may be shown by other evidence, and it may be shown 54 L. R. A.

If the meaning of the jury can be ascertained, and on the point in issue made out, the court will mold it into form and make it serve.

No exception was taken either to the form or the substance of the verdict, either before or after it was returned into court by the appellant railroad company.

Unless an objection is taken to the form by parol evidence, if necessary, upon what ground a verdict in a former judgment proceeded, in order to determine whether the same matter was in issue. King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 675.

IV. Effect of action beyond or without authority.

The foregoing rules apply only where the servant or agent was authorized to act and bind his master or principal with reference to the matters complained of (estoppels being mutual). If the person procuring the judgment in the former action was not the servant or agent of the person sought to be proceeded against in the subsequent action, or if he acted in excess of his authority with reference to the subject-matter of the actions, there is no estoppel; and an agent or servant cannot estop his principal or master by procuring judgment in his own name without authority on claims of his principal or master, so as to prevent the principal or master from himself seeking a recovery thereon.

Thus, where notes of a deceased person are delivered by the holder to an agent with a limited agency for the purpose of collecting them, but no agency, real or apparent, to sell or dispose of them, and the agent procures the allowance of the claims against the estate of the deceased in his own name, and afterwards assigns them to a bank, the allowance of the claims by the county court does not constitute an adjudication in favor of the agent's ownership which will bar an action by the owner and holder of the notes against the bank for the procurement of a declaration of trust in favor of the owner in that portion of a judgment held by the bank thereon representing such notes. Lederer v. Union Sav. Bank, 52 Neb. 133, 71 N. W. 954.

And a judgment of a probate court allowing a demand of an agent and treasurer of a religious corporation against an insolvent partnership for moneys belonging to the religious corporation which had been deposited by him with the partnership without the knowledge of the president of the corporation, the claim for which was made in his own name, does not bind the religious corporation so as to prevent a proceeding by it in equity to charge the partnership estate with a lien for such moneys and interest thereon, under the allegation that they were the moneys of the religious corporation which had been converted by the partnership, where, in presenting the claim for allowance, of a special verdict before the verdict is rendered and recorded, it will not be considered on appeal.

Alhambra Addition Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. 379.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the respondent against the appellant, the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and the defendant Samuel Root, to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligence of Root while acting as conductor on one of the appellant's freight trains. The respondent and the defendant Root were employees of the appellant, the one in the capacity of fireman and the other as conductor. On November 13, 1898, a freight train known as "Extra 149," drawn by the engine on which respondent was acting as fireman, left Starbuck, in Columbia county, and proceeded in the direction of Winona, in Whitman county, both places being in this state. At about the same time a freight train known as "Extra 151," on which Root was conductor, left Winona, and proceeded in the direction of Starbuck. The conductor and engineer on each train were notified, before leaving their respective stations, of the approach of the other train, and were instructed to meet and pass at a station known as "Canyon Siding," where there was a side track, by means of which trains running in opposite directions could pass each other with safety. The rules of the company, as shown by the evidence, required the train first reaching a station where opposing trains were ordered to meet to enter the side track, and the treasurer acted without authority from the corporation, and the corporation at no time approved or in any way ratified his action. Evangelical Synod of N. A. v. Schoeneich, 143 Mo. 652, 45 S. W. 647.

So, a nonsuit in an action to recover the possession of a horse on the alleged ground that it had been taken and wrongfully detained from the plaintiff by the defendant, granted on the ground that the plaintiff was estopped from prosecuting the defendant for the recovery of the horse by a judgment before rendered in an action brought by the defendant against the sheriff who had taken the horse from him by virtue of an execution issued upon a judgment in favor of a third party against the plaintiff, is not proper, as the sheriff, who was defendant in the former action, was not in a legal sense the agent or trustee of the plaintiff in the latter case in regard to the property, but was the agent of the plaintiff's adversary, and there was no privity as master and servant or principal and agent between him and the plaintiff. Yorks v. Steele, 50 Barb. 397.

Likewise, in Worley v. Heath, 1 Mo. App. 378, it was held that a judgment in an action of trespass brought against an officer for seizing goods, rendered in favor of the officer, is not such an adjudication as will bar proceedings against the sureties on a bond given for the security of the person whose property was taken.

And in Bailey v. Sundberg, 1 C. C. A. 387, 1 U. S. App. 101, 49 Fed. 533, which was a libel in admiralty in personam for a collision, brought against the master of a steamship, in which a previous proceeding had been had against the owner, it was said that the master and owner were not in privity within the rule which binds privies as well as parties to the estoppel of a judgment; privity denoting mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property.

And Lockett v. Buckman, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 242, 1 S. W. 391, holds that a judgment rendered in an action of trespass against two school trustees sued, not as trustees, but jointly with patrons of the school, is not res judicata against the school district so as to estop the district from asserting title to grounds upon which the schoolhouse was erected, or so as to divest the titles of the district to them under the rule of law that one acting in one right cannot be benefited or injured by a judgment for or against him when acting in some other right, but the former judgment was against, and not in favor of, the trustees.

V. The rule in the principal case.

to be that where a verdict is rendered in an action against a principal and agent for an act of the agent against the principal, but saying nothing as to the agent, it is to be construed as a verdict in favor of the agent, and that such a determination in favor of the agent would amount to an adjudication which would preclude a judgment against the principal on the verdict against him. The only similar case found in which the relation of master and servant or principal and agent existed is Schweickhardt v. St. Louis, 2 Mo. App. 571, which supports the principal case, holding that a verdict finding the issues against the city and some of the other defendants, but saying nothing as to a contractor, should not be reversed, and a judgment rendered on such a verdict will be reversed.

Master and servant and principal and agent, however, are treated in actions against them for the wrongful act of the agent as joint tortfeasors, and rules laid down in actions against joint tortfeasors might therefore be deemed to be applicable on the question of the correctness of the rule of the principal case, though the joint tortfeasors were not principal and agent, or master and servant. Taking such cases into consideration, a conflict of authority appears, some of the cases taking the ground that a judgment may be entered in favor of the one party and against the other.

Thus, in Williams v. McGrade, 13 Minn. 46, Gil. 39, on the one hand, and in partial support of the rule of the principal case, the rule was laid down that in actions of tort, as trespass, etc., where the wrong is joint and several, and the plea of one of the defendants is such as shows that the plaintiff could have no cause of action against any of them if the plea be found against the plaintiff, it will operate to the benefit of all the defendants, and the plaintiff cannot have judgment for damages against those who let judgment go by default; but the action was one of replevin, and the acts constituting the wrongful taking were alleged to be levies upon property by one of the defendants as deputy sheriff under and by virtue of executions, and it was claimed that the deputy sheriff was the only defendant who had pleaded the judgment and executions and justified the taking under them, and that therefore he only could review the rulings of the court upon the questions arising in the case.

Upon the other hand, in Brown v. Burrus, 8 Mo. 26, the rule was laid down that if several persons are sued in trespass, and some are acquitted and others are found guilty, the latter may move for a new trial without being joined in such motion by the former, and the verdict there wait until the opposing train passed. For some reason Conductor Root did not obey his orders, but permitted his train to run past Canyon Siding, and collide a short distance from that place with extra 149. The collision caused the injury to the respondent for which this action was brought. In his complaint the respondent alleges that Root, by virtue of his employment, had the charge and control of all trains on which he was employed as conductor, and of all persons employed on it, and is responsible for its movements while on the road; that as such conductor he had charge of the train hereinbefore mentioned known as extra 151, and negligently, carelessly, and recklessly permitted said train to run past Canyon Siding, well knowing that the same was liable to collide with the train on which the respondent was acting as fireman; that "by reason of the carelessness, negligence, and recklessness of the said Samuel Root, and through no fault of this plaintiff whatsoever," the injuries suffered by said plaintiff were received. While there is a general allegation in the complaint that the appellant itself was negligent, the complaint as a whole negatives the idea that there was any negligence on the part of the appellant, or any of its officers or employees other than the negligence of the defendant Root. Issue was taken upon the allegations of the complaint by both the appellant and the defendant Root, each answering separately, denying the allegations of negligence. A trial of the cause was had on the issues as thus framed, and the following verdict was returned by the jury: "We, the jury sworn and impaneled to try the above-entitled cause, find for the plaintiff and against the defendant the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, and assess his damages at the sum of $15,100 and the costs of this action." After the verdict was read, but before the jury were discharged, the attorney for defendant Root inquired of the court what construction the court would place upon the verdict with respect to the defendant Root, "and thereupon," to quote from the record, "the court ruled that said verdict was and should be considered as a verdict in favor of defendant Root." The verdict was then may be set aside as to those found guilty without affecting the validity of the finding as to the others; but the action was one of trespass brought against several for seizing and taking away a slave, and there is nothing in the case to show the relation of the defendants to each other.

And in Westfield Gas & Mill. Co. v. Abernathy, 8 Ind. App. 73, 85 N. E. 399, which was an action for a personal injury alleged to have been caused by the negligent construction and excavation of an open ditch along a highway, in which a verdict was found against two corporations which were defendants, without making any finding as to other individual defendants, thus constituting a finding of not guilty as to them, upon which the court entered judgment against all the defendants, it was held, on appeal, that the court should have sustained a motion of the individual defendants to arrest the judgment, since, though the injury was the result of independent acts of negligence, the plaintiff was entitled to but one recovery for the single injury, and the damages were not divisible, and judgment was reversed as to the individual defendants and affirmed as to the two corporations, thus in effect holding that the verdict in favor of the individual defendants was not res judicata so as to prevent the entry of a judgment upon the verdict against the corporation defendants.

Attention is called, however, to the fact that in case of ordinary joint tortfeasors the act of one is not necessarily the act of the other, as in case of master and servant. The act of one joint tortfeasor might not have been wrongful while that of another was. But if the act of the servant is determined not to have been wrongful the same act, treated as the act of the master through the instrumentality of the servant, could not be so. See infra, VI.

VI. Conclusion.

The sole question in this note is as to the application of the general rule that a verdict and judgment in an action is conclusive as to the matters in issue as between the parties and their privies in any subsequent suit, to judgments rendered in favor of a servant or agent, in actions for the act of the servant or agent with reference to subsequent actions for the same cause against the master or principal, and the general rule is that they are conclusive.

While servants and agents are not usually regarded as falling within the legal definition of privies, a previous determination in favor of a servant or agent is deemed conclusive upon a subsequent action against the master or principal as having been between the same parties, the term "parties" to an action within the meaning of the law of res judicata including, not only the persons named, but also persons whose rights have been legally represented by them. Some of the Missouri cases, however, seem to have adopted a somewhat more strict construction of the term "parties."

With reference to identity of the issues the matter in issue is that upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action, and which the defendant controverts by his pleadings, and not the facts offered in evidence, to establish the issue, though controverted. And the question whether or not the issues in the two suits are the same depends upon whether both might be determined upon the same testimony presented by the same parties or those by whom they were legally represented. A mere difference in the method of statement, or in the subject-matter, or the mere fact that other issues were involved, is of no effect.

The prior determination, to be a bar, however, must have been one on the merits, and of course the agency must have existed and included the right to represent the principal. The rule of the principal case, that a failure to find as to a servant in an action against a master and servant for an act of the servant is equivalent to a verdict in favor of the servant and a bar to a judgment upon a verdict against the master therein, is opposed by several cases of joint tortfeasors holding that judgment may be rendered in favor of one and against another. But while master and servant are held to be joint tortfeasors in tort cases it is thought that the rule of severance could not apply, since the act for which the master is proceeded against is the act of the servant, and a determination that that act is one upon which liability cannot be predicated must necessarily apply and be conclusive as to the master as well as to the servant.

recorded, and the jury discharged. Afterwards, and on June 19, 1899, a judgment was entered in favor of Root and against the plaintiff for the amount of Root's costs. Within the statutory time after the return of the verdict the appellant moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, which motion being overruled, it moved for judgment in its favor on the whole record, which was also overruled, and on July 23, 1900, judgment was entered against it for the amount of the verdict. This appeal is from the last-mentioned judgment.

The general rule undoubtedly is that, where one has received an actionable injury at the hands of two or more persons acting in concert, or acting independently of each other, if their acts unite in causing a single injury, all of the wrongdoers, however numerous, are severally liable to him for the full amount of damages occasioned by such injury, and he may enforce the liability in an action against them all jointly, or in any one of them severally, or against any number of them less than the whole. While the wrong committed is the joint wrong of the several parties participating therein, it is also, in contemplation of law, the several wrong of each of the participants. Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 153. On this principle, at common law, a jury in actions ex delicto against several persons, contrary to the rule in actions ex contractu, were permitted to find against one or more of the defendants and in favor of the others. The rule with regard to actions ex delicto remains the same under the Code; and the practice now permits the jury in an action for tort against several defendants to return a verdict against so many of them as the proofs show are guilty of the wrong charged and in favor of the others. As it is the peculiar province of the jury to determine the guilt or innocence of the several defendants, a verdict finding in favor of some and against others, even though there may be no very apparent reason for the distinction made, is not for that reason alone so far arbitrary or inconsistent as to require a reversal of the judgment entered thereon against those who have been found guilty. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. James, 73 Tex. 12, 10 S. W. 744. It seems to be equally well settled, also, that silence of the verdict as to one of the defendants will not vitiate it as against the others. Such a verdict is treated as a finding in favor of the defendant not named on all of the issues, on which he is entitled to a judgment that plaintiff take nothing by his action. Howard v. Johnson, 91 Ga. 319, 18 S. E. 132; Kinkler v. Junica, 84 Tex. 120, 19 S. W. 359; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. James, 73 Tex. 12, 10 S. W. 744; Jones v. Grinnet, 4 W. Va. 104; Westfield Gas & Mill. Co. v. Abernathy, 8 Ind. App. 73, 35 N. E. 399. These general rules are relied on by the respondent to sustain the judgments entered in the court below. It must be borne in mind, however, that there are wide distinctions between the ordinary action for injuries, where all of the defendants participated in the wrongful act which caused the injury, and actions like the one before us, where one is liable because he committed the act and the other by operation of law, both with respect to the relations of the defendants to each other and to the injured person. Joint tortfeasors are liable to the injured person (other than that he may have but one satisfaction) as if the act causing the injury was the separate act of each of them, and they have, except in certain special cases, no right of contribution among themselves. But the defendants in this character of action are in no sense joint tortfeasors, nor does their liability to the plaintiff rest on the same or like grounds. The act of an employee, even in legal intentment, is not the act of his employer, unless the employer either previously directs the act to be done or subsequently ratifies it. For injuries caused by the negligent act of an employee not directed or ratified by the employer the employee is liable because he committed the act which caused the injury, while the employer is liable, not as if the act was done by himself, but because of the doctrine of respondent superior,—the rule of law which holds the master responsible for the negligent act of his servant committed while the servant is acting within the general scope of his employment, and engaged in his master's business. The primary liability to answer for such an act, therefore, rests upon the employee, and when the employer is compelled to answer in damages therefor he can recover over against the employee. Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Compania Transatlantica Espanola, 134 N. Y. 461, 31 N. E. 987; note to Carterville v. Cook (Ill.) 16 Am. St. Rep. 248; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 242; 2 Van Fleet, Former Adjudication, p. 1162. So, where the employer is sued separately for the wrong, he can bind the employee in any judgment that may be obtained against him by notifying the employee to come in and defend the action. This rule is well stated in Littleton v. Richardson, 34 N. H. 179, 66 Am. Dec. 759, in the following language: "But when a person is responsible over to another, either by operation of law or by express contract, . . . and he is duly notified of the pendency of the suit, and requested to take upon him the defense of it, he is no longer regarded as a stranger, because he has the right to appear and defend the action, and has the same means and advantages of controverting the claim as if he was the real and nominal party upon the record. In every such case, if due notice is given to such person, the judgment, if obtained without fraud or collusion, . . . will be conclusive against him, whether he has appeared or not." See also Strong v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 62 Mo. 289, 21 Am. Rep. 417; Boston v. Worthington, 10 Gray, 486. So, also, in such an action, whether brought against the employer severally or jointly with the employee, the gravamen of the charge is, and must be, the negligence of the employee; and no recovery can be had unless it be proved, and found by the jury, that the employee was negligent. Stated in another way; if the employee who causes the injury is free from liability therefor, his employer must also be free from liability. This was held in New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Jones, 142 U. S. 18, 35 L. ed. 919, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109. In that case the plaintiff below was a passenger on the train of the defendant, and while such passenger was shot by the conductor of the train, and seriously injured. The trial court ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to recover compensatory damages from the company, even though it was made to appear that the conductor had reasonable cause to believe that an assault with a knife was about to be made on him by the plaintiff, and that it was necessary to shoot the plaintiff in order to protect himself from great bodily harm; holding that such belief on the part of the conductor would not relieve the company if the facts were that the plaintiff had no design to injure the conductor, and was not intentionally acting so as to indicate such design. This was held error by the Supreme Court. In the course of the opinion it was said: "It would seem, on general principles, that, if the party who actually causes the injury is free from all civil and criminal liability therefor, his employer must also be entitled to a like immunity. . . . If the immediate actor is free from responsibility because his act was lawful, can his employer—one taking no direct part in the transaction—be held responsible? Suppose we eliminate the employee, and assume a case in which the carrier has no servants, and himself does the work of carriage. Should he assault and wound a passenger in the manner suggested by the instruction, it is undeniable that, if sued as an individual, he would be held free from responsibility, and the act adjudged lawful. Can it be that, if sued as a carrier for the same act, a different rule obtains, and he be held liable? Has he broken his contract of carriage by an act which is lawful in itself, and which, as an individual, he was justified in doing? The question carries its own answer; and it may be generally affirmed that, if an act of an employee be lawful, and one which he is justified in doing, and which casts no personal responsibility upon him, no responsibility attaches to the employer therefor." See also Wharton, Neg. § 157. So, too, from the principle that there can be no liability on the part of an employer for the act of his employee in which he took no part, if the employer is free from liability, it follows that a judgment in favor of the employee in an action brought against him for an injury caused by such an act is a bar to a recovery against the employer in an action brought against him for the same cause of action. And it has been held that an employer can avail himself of a judgment in favor of his employee, when subsequently sued, without calling on the party primarily liable to come in and plead the judgment for him. In the case of Emma Silver Min. Co. v. Emma Silver Min. Co. 7 Fed. 401, the rule was announced as follows: "The weight of authority, however, is that where an agent in a transaction is sued after the termination of his agency, and upon a trial of the merits the issue is determined against the plaintiff, the principal, though not a party to the suit, can avail himself of the judgment as a bar, when he is sued by the same plaintiff on the same cause of action. While the principal, if he had no notice of the former suit, and no opportunity to defend it, may not be concluded by a judgment against his former agent, or made responsible for the agent's bad pleading or blunders in the trial of the cause because so to conclude him would be to deprive him of his property without due process of law, yet, as regards the plaintiff who has before sued the agent and been defeated, there is no reason why he should not be concluded upon that principle of public policy which gives every man one opportunity to prove his case, and limits every man to one such opportunity. He has had his day in court, and it is immaterial whether he has chosen to test his right as against the principal or the agent in the transaction, provided the issue to be tried was identical as against both." In Dill v. Bain, 15 R. I. 75, 23 Atl. 44, the action was for personal injuries received by plaintiff while driving on a highway, caused by coming into collision with an obstruction left in the highway by two persons named Budlong. The defendant pleaded in bar of the action a judgment in favor of the Budlongs, rendered on the verdict of a jury in an action brought by the plaintiff against them for the injury complained of, alleging that the Budlongs were the authors of the obstruction or defect. On demurrer this was held a good plea by way of estoppel. The court, after citing and reviewing a number of cases, said: "We think, on the authority of these cases, it is competent for the defendant town to set up, by way of estoppel in the case at bar, the judgment recovered by the Budlongs. Certainly, if the town had notified the Budlongs of the pendency of this action, and the Budlongs had, in consequence of the notice, assumed the defense, it would be competent for them, on the authority of these cases, to plead the former judgment in bar; for they would then be the real defendants, though defending in the name of the town, and ought not to be required to try over a question which they have already tried, with the result of a final judgment against the plaintiff in their favor. But the Budlongs, if they assumed the defense, would have to make it in the name of the town, and we see no good reason why the town should not be permitted to make, without calling upon them, any defense which they could make, if called upon, in the name of the town." In Featherston v. Newburgh & C. Turnp. Road, 71 Hun, 109, 24 N. Y. Supp. 603, the facts were similar to the case last cited. There it was said: "The statement in the answer shows that Shafer was the wrongdoer, and that his act was the cause of the injury sustained by the plaintiff. So it seems to follow that, if Shafer was not liable for creating and maintaining the obstruction, the de-defendant cannot be liable for the failure to remove them. If Shafer was not liable because the plaintiff's own negligence produced the injuries of which she complains, the defendant is not liable for the same reason. Shafer and the defendant were not joint wrongdoers, and the rule that one wrongdoer cannot recover against or compel contribution by another does not apply. The relation between Shafer and the defendant was analogous to that of principal and agent, or principal and surety, or master and servant; and the rule in such cases is that a judgment in favor of the principal or the surety upon a ground equally applicable to both should be accepted as conclusive against the plaintiff's right of action. Herman, Estoppel, 169; Castle v. Noyes, 14 N. Y. 329. . . . Under this rule of law the turnpike company would be entitled to recover from Shafer any amount the plaintiff might recover against it. Such right would rest upon the principles of subrogation. The turnpike company would be entitled to be subrogated to plaintiff's right of action against Shafer, but the judgment on the merits in Shafer's favor in the plaintiff's suit against him relieves him of all liability to the plaintiff, or any person claiming under her, for the same cause of action. The plaintiff, therefore, by being barred by the judgment in Shafer's favor, is equally barred from any action against the company under the rule that whatever discharges the principal discharges the surety. As she had no cause of action against Shafer, she can have no cause of action against the defendant, and therefore the portion of the answer to which the demurrer relates does set up, in our judgment, a valid defense to the action, and the order appealed from should be reversed." In King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 675, it was held that a judgment in favor of a deputy sheriff is conclusive evidence for the sheriff in a subsequent action, where both actions are for the seizure of the same goods. In Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326, 63 Am. Dec. 627, it was held that a judgment in favor of a master in an action against him for the act of his servant, rendered in a trial of the action on the merits, is a bar to an action against the servant for the same act. In that case the court said: "To permit a person to commence an action against the principal, and to prove the acts alleged to be trespasses to have been committed by his servant acting by his order, and to fail upon the merits to recover, and subsequently to commence an action against that servant, and to prove and rely upon the same acts as a trespass, is to allow him to have two trials for the same cause of action, to be proved by the same testimony. In such cases the technical rule that a judgment can only be admitted between the parties to the record or their privies expands so far as to admit it when the same question has been decided and judgment rendered between parties responsible for the acts of others. A familiar example is presented in suits against a sheriff or his deputy, which being determined upon the merits against or in favor of one will be conclusive upon the other." See also Atkinson v. White, 60 Me. 396; Spencer v. Dearth, 43 Vt. 98; Glass v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 116 Ind. 492, 18 N. E. 450; Williams v. McGrade, 13 Minn. 46; Gil. 39; Lower Alloways Creek v. Moore, 15 N. J. L. 146; Chicago & R. I. R. Co. v. Hutchins, 34 Ill. 108, 111; 2 Van Fleet, Former Adjudications, § 572.

From these considerations it is clear that the trial court erred in entering judgment against the appellant after it had entered judgment in favor of the defendant Root. It becomes important, therefore, to inquire what disposition shall be made of the case by this court. Were the judgment against Root void, or were it before us for review on this appeal, or on a separate appeal by the present respondent, we would have no hesitancy in reversing both judgments, and remanding the cause for a retrial on the whole of the issues. But the judgment in favor of Root is not void. True, the verdict of the jury was silent as to him, and it may be that the rule that silence of the verdict as to one of the defendants is a finding in favor of that defendant is not strictly applicable to this class of cases; yet the action of the trial court in construing the verdict as one in his favor, and entering judgment thereon, was at most error merely, rendering the judgment voidable, and subject to be vacated or reversed if seasonably attacked by some one or more of the methods pointed out by the Code for vacating or reversing erroneous judgments. Inasmuch, however, as it was not so attacked, so far from being void, it stands as a conclusive bar to a recovery against Root, not only in the present action, but also in any action brought against him for the same cause of action. As against a collateral attack it is as conclusive as a judgment would be entered upon a verdict finding directly or in terms in his favor. Nor is the judgment before us for review. This is true no matter what view we may take of the judgments entered by the trial court; that is, whether we consider them as separate judgments, or, taken together, as constituting but one judgment. Under the statutes of this state a party aggrieved may appeal from a part only of a judgment entered against him in an action not triable de novo in this court (Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, §§ 6500, 6503, 6521); hence, if the judgments are in law but one judgment, this appeal brings before us only that part of it which affects the appellant. We can, therefore, neither reverse nor ignore the judgment in favor of Root, and are powerless to order a retrial of the issues as between him and the respondent. This being so, there can be no retrial of the issues between the respondent and the appellant. We are aware that the principles of the cases above cited, in so far as they permitted the party secondarily liable to plead directly in estoppel a judgment in favor of his principal on the same cause of action, have been criticised as controverting the rule that estoppels, to be binding, must be mutual. See, particularly, Mr. Freeman's note to Hill v. Bain (R. I.) 2 Am. St. Rep. 873, 876. But, if we were to accept this criticism as just, it can have no application to a case presenting the conditions shown by the record before us. Here the judgment constituting the bar to a recovery was entered in the action then being tried by the court. Certainly there is no rule of law which requires that such a judgment should either be pleaded or proved in order to make it available to all of the defendants against whom or in favor of whom it operates. The contrary view would imply that the court could not judicially notice its orders and judgments entered in the very cause before it.

We have not overlooked the contention made by the respondent to the effect that the appellant cannot avail itself of the judgment in favor of Root because it did not except to the construction put by the court upon the verdict of the jury. This was not, however, a duty which devolved on the appellant. It was the respondent who was adversely affected by that construction, and, inasmuch as he consented thereto, he must abide by all the consequences which such construction entails.

We conclude, therefore, that the judgment appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter a judgment for the appellant in accordance with the prayer of its answer; and it is so ordered.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Re Estate of James M. MAYO, Deceased.

1. A railroad company against which a right of action exists for negligently killing a person is not entitled to be made a party to proceedings for the appointment of an administrator for his estate.
2. A railroad company against which a cause of action exists for negligently killing a person can attack the appointment of an administrator upon his estate for nonresidence or want of assets only in case want of jurisdiction appears on the record, under a statute forbidding the contesting of jurisdiction assumed by the probate court, so far as it depends on place of residence or location of the estate, except by appeal, or when the want of jurisdiction appears on the record, since it is not entitled to be made a party to the proceedings so as to have a right to appeal.
3. A cause of action against a railroad company for negligently killing a person, which under the statutes is not the old one belonging to decedent, but a new one created for the benefit of the persons named, and is enforceable only by his administrator, will give jurisdiction to the probate court of the county where the killing occurred and where the railroad company had its residence, to grant letters of administration on the estate, although the deceased was not a resident of the state, and owned no other estate within its limits at the time of his death, and the statutes provide, in case of a nonresident, for administration only in the county where the greater part of his estate may be.
4. A new action for the benefit of persons named, and not a continuation of that belonging to decedent, is created by Rev. Stat. 1893, §§ 2315, 2316, 2818, which provide that, in case of death by wrongful act which, had death not ensued, would have entitled the injured party to maintain an action, the person causing the death shall be liable to an action, notwithstanding the death, for the benefit of the next of kin and heirs at law, to the extent of their injury, to be brought by the executor or administrator, in case the injured person has not recovered judgment before death.

5. Nonresidents are within the protection of Rev. Stat. §§ 2315, 2316, creating a right of action for wrongful death to be enforced by the administrator, so as to justify the appointment of an administrator to enforce the liability, without requiring a resort for such appointment to the state of decedent's residence,—especially where there is no statutory permission for a suit by an administrator appointed there.

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Florence County denying its petition to revoke letters of administration which had been granted upon the estate of James M. Mayo, deceased. Affirmed.

The petition by which the revocation was sought was as follows:

"The Northeastern Railroad Company, petitioner herein, respectfully shows to this court: (1) That your petitioner is a railroad corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of South Carolina, carrying on the business of a common carrier on its line of road in this state. (2) That heretofore, on the 24th day of November, 1897, J. W. McCown filed his petition in this court in the above-entitled proceeding, praying that letters of administration be granted him by this court upon the estate of James M. Mayo, deceased, a copy of which petition is hereto annexed as a part hereof. (3) That on the 10th day of December, 1897, by final order or judgment of this court, letters of administration were granted in the above-entitled proceeding to the said J. W. McCown, as administrator upon the estate of the said James M. Mayo, styled and recited in said judgment as 'late of Florence county,' and the said J. W. McCown on the said 16th day of December, 1897, took the usual oath prescribed for administrators, as will appear by a copy of the said judgment and oath hereto annexed as a part hereof. Said judgment so rendered, and said letters so issued, were granted upon the said ex parte application of the said J. W. McCown. (4) That the said James M. Mayo, at the time of his death, on the 12th day of June, 1897, was not a resident or inhabitant of this state, nor a citizen thereof, but at the time of his death, and long prior thereto, was a resident, an inhabitant, and a citizen of the state of Florida, with his residence in the city of Ocala, county of Marion, in said state of Florida. (5) That the said James M. Mayo died intestate, leaving no estate or property of any description, real or personal, within the limits of the state of South Carolina, or within the jurisdiction of this court, either at the time of his death, or at the time of the grant of said letters of administration, or since. (6) That it is alleged in the said petition of the said J. W. McCown that the said James M. Mayo died intestate, leaving his widow and children named in said petition residents of the state of Florida, and that he left no property within the jurisdiction of this court. (7) That the said J. W. McCown, so styling himself as administrator of the estate of said James M. Mayo, on or about the 27th day of December, 1897, commenced an action as such against your petitioner for the sum of $25,000 damages in the court of common pleas for the county of Florence for the alleged negligent killing of said James M. Mayo by your petitioner in the city of Florence on the 12th day of June, 1897, in which action it is alleged by the said J. W. McCown that the said James M. Mayo 'was a stranger in the city of Florence.' Your petitioner has appeared and answered the complaint in said action, and your petitioner alleges that the death of the said James M. Mayo was not caused by the negligence of your petitioner, as alleged in the complaint of said action. By an order in said cause, made on the 8th of February, 1899, the place of trial of said action was changed from the county of Florence to the county of Williamsburg in this state, and said cause is now pending in said court. (8) Your petitioner was not a party to the proceedings herein culminating in the grant of said administration to the said J. W. McCown, and had no notice thereof, but said order was made and said letters were granted solely upon the ex parte application of the said J. W. McCown, unsupported by any evidence showing or tending to show that the said James M. Mayo was either a resident or an inhabitant of the county of Florence, or had any property or estate therein to be administered upon or within the jurisdiction of this court. (9) Your petitioner is interested in said final order made herein appointing the said J. W. McCown administrator of the estate of the said James M. Mayo, and is and will be injured thereby. The said final order and said letters of administration so made and granted are illegal, null, and void, and this court was without jurisdiction to issue the same. Under the authority of the said illegal appointment the said J. W. McCown has already put your petitioner to great inconvenience, costs, and expense by the institution of the said vexatious suit for damages. Said J. W. McCown has and can have no power or authority to commence or prosecute the said action for damages, which said action can only be brought by the party and in the manner prescribed in § 2316 of the Revised Statutes (1893) of South Carolina. Even if said unliquidated claim for damages was a valid claim,—which it is not,—such claim is not an asset of the estate of the said James M. Mayo. Wherefore your petitioner prays that the said final order appointing the said J. W. McCown administrator be vacated and set aside, and the said letters of administration issued to him be revoked and canceled."

NOTE.—As to right of action for death as assets which will give jurisdiction to appoint an administrator, see, in this series, Missouri P. R. Co. v. Lewis (Neb.) 2 L. R. A. 67, and cases in note to Manning v. Leighton (Vt.) 24 L. R. A. 684.

Mr. W. Huger Fitzsimons, for appellant:

There was error in holding that a probate court of this state can appoint an administrator to sue for an alleged wrongful killing of a resident of another state without property here.

The right of action given by Lord Campbell's act does not constitute a part of the estate of decedent.

Our probate courts have no jurisdiction or control over the estate of a nonresident, unless a part of the estate is in this state.

Reed v. Northeastern R. Co. 37 S. C. 53, 16 S. E. 289; Stewart v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 168 U. S. 445, 42 L. ed. 537, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105.

The damages recovered are no part of the estate of the deceased, and cannot pass by his will or be reached by his creditors.

Martin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 151 U. S. 673, sub nom. Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 38 L. ed. 311, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 834; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 859; Berry v. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. 29 Kan. 420; Hubbard v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Wis. 160, 80 N. W. 454; Bradley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Neb. 653, 71 N. W. 282.

The right of action not being part of the estate of the nonresident decedent, and there being no property of said decedent within the state, the probate court was without jurisdiction to grant the letters.

Administration is defined to be the management, by appointment of a court, of an intestate's estate.

Bouvier, Law Dict.; Jacob, Law Dict.; Croswell, Exrs. 30.

The existence of assets is a basis of administration in the case of nonresident decedents.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 762, note.

Mayo's administrator in Florida could bring an action here under our statute, even if Mayo left no property.

Memphis & O. Packet Co. v. Pikey, 142 Ind. 304, 40 N. E. 527; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bradley, 51 Neb. 596, 71 N. W. 283.

Administration implies death and goods to be administered.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 741.

The right of action is not a part of the assets of the deceased person, but is the property of "living persons," consequently the cases elsewhere which hold such rights of action alone sufficient to support administration hold, in effect, that a probate court may base administration upon the assets of a living person, which, under Moore v. Smith, 11 Rich. L. 569, 73 Am. Dec. 122, cannot be done.

There is respectable authority for the position that nonresidents without property are not protected by Lord Campbell's act.

Dani v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 525, 37 Atl. 558; Brannigan v. Union Gold Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164.

The administrator to sue in a case like that before the court is the nonresident administrator,—the administrator of the domicile,—for he is the only administrator who can sue.

Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C. 579, 37 Am. Rep. 737; Heywood v. Williams, 57 S. C. 241, 35 S. E. 503; Purple v. Whitted, 49 Vt. 187; Wilkins v. Ellett, 108 U. S. 256, 27 L. ed. 718, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 641; Wilson v. Keels, 54 S. C. 545, 32 S. E. 702; Tyer v. Charleston Rice Milling Co. 32 S. C. 598, 10 S. E. 1067; Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439; Memphis & O. Packet Co. v. Pikey, 142 Ind. 304, 40 N. E. 527; Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Hendricks, 41 Ind. 48; Union R. & Transit Co. v. Shacklet, 119 Ill. 232, 10 N. E. 896; McCarty v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 62 Fed. 437; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 903, 904.

Appellant is vitally interested in the validity of this administration. It was not a party to the proceedings culminating in the void administration, cannot attack the same collaterally in the damage suit, and has pursued the proper method to revoke this illegal administration.

Hankinson v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 41 S. C. 17, 19 S. E. 206; Hendrix v. Holden, 58 S. C. 495, 36 S. E. 1010; Hartley v. Glover, 56 S. C. 69, 33 S. E. 796; Moore v. Smith, 11 Rich. L. 569, 73 Am. Dec. 122; Bradley v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Neb. 553, 71 N. W. 282.

The invalidity of these letters could not be collaterally attacked in the damage suit, because, though void, the defect does not affirmatively appear on the face of the record.

Hankinson v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 41 S. C. 17, 19 S. E. 206; Hendrix v. Holden, 58 S. C. 495, 36 S. E. 1010; Overby v. Gordon, 177 U. S. 214, 44 L. ed. 741, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 603; 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 196 et seq.

Section 64 of the Code, and the following cases, lay down the rule that the proper method to attack the validity of the grant of administration is by motion in the case:

Gardner v. Chatham, 37 S. C. 73, 16 S. E. 368; Drake v. Steadman, 46 S. C. 490, 24 S. E. 458; Crooker v. Allen, 34 S. C. 452, 13 S. E. 650; Sullivan v. Shell, 36 S. C. 578, 15 S. E. 722; Parr v. Lindler, 40 S. C. 193, 18 S. E. 636; Sanders v. Price, 56 S. C. 1, 33 S. E. 731.

Messrs. Wilcox & Wilcox, also for appellant:

The appointment of an administrator of a deceased by a judge of probate in this state, without the existence of one of the two jurisdictional prerequisites, either residence or property, is void if the jurisdictional defects appear on the face of the record, and voidable if they do not appear.

Code, § 39.

It cannot be argued, because an administrator is authorized to bring a suit for a widow and children, that he acquires any such title in the proceeds as to give them the character of assets.

Reed v. Northeastern R. Co. 37 S. C. 55, 16 S. E. 289.

Every case holding that a foreign administrator cannot seek the jurisdiction of another state is based on the reasoning, not that he is a foreigner and an alien, but that, in addition to his being so, he is attempting to meddle with assets of an estate within the jurisdiction of a state foreign to his appointment, which must look after its own creditors in the administration of assets. In a suit under Lord Campbell's act, by a foreign administrator, no such situation exists, and this reason exists in every case which holds that a foreign administrator cannot sue.

Reynolds v. Torrance, 2 Brev. 59.

An administrator of Mayo in the state of Florida, properly appointed, could sue, in this state, for the death of Mayo, under Lord Campbell's act.

A nonresident cannot obtain letters of administration in this state.

A death claim is sufficient assets to confer jurisdiction on the courts of states where the death occurs and the defendant resides, without reference to the place of residence of the deceased.

When the administration is absolutely void, a defendant in a case like this will be allowed to move to have it so declared; but where it is merely voidable the petition will not be entertained, because payment to an administrator under an appointment valid on its face will protect the defendant from further demand.

James, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from the judgment of the circuit court affirming the judgment of the probate court of Florence county, which refused to revoke letters of administration granted to J. W. McCown as administrator of James M. Mayo, deceased. James M. Mayo died intestate in Florence county, South Carolina, on the 12th day of June, 1897. Letters of administration on the estate of Mayo were granted to McCown by the probate court of Florence county on the 16th day of December, 1897. The administrator commenced an action against the Northeastern Railroad Company on the 27th day of December, 1897, under the statute commonly referred to as "Lord Campbell's Act" for damages for the alleged wrongful killing of said intestate by the said company in Florence county. The said railroad company answered, denying the alleged negligence, and subsequently the cause, on motion, was transferred to Williamsburg county for trial. Then on the 29th day of January, 1900, the railroad company made this application for revocation of the grant of administration on the ground that the probate court was without jurisdiction in that said Mayo was a resident of Florida at the time of his death, and owned no estate in South Carolina for administration. The probate court, refusing the revoke, held: (1) That the order granting administration was valid on its face, since it recited the jurisdiction of facts contested, and that the railroad company had no such interests as would support its attack upon the judgment of the probate court; and (2) that upon the facts stated in the petition of the railroad company, viz., that Mayo was not a resident of this state, but was killed by a railroad train at Florence, South Carolina, while passing through this state, and that he left no assets in this state to be administrated other than the right of suit given to the administrator by §§ 2315 and 2316 of the Revised Statutes, the probate court of Florence county had jurisdiction to issue letters of administration, as such right of action was a sufficient property to authorize the appointment of an administrator. The circuit court on appeal held that the railroad company had the right to move for revocation of the administration, but affirmed the judgment of the probate court on the second ground. We are now to consider these questions.

1. We notice as first in logical order whether the Northeastern Railroad Company had the right in these proceedings to attack the grant of administration by the probate court. In this matter we agree with the view taken by the probate court. The probate court is a court of record, and has jurisdiction of the grant of letters of administration. Section 49 of the Code of Procedure expressly enacts as follows: "The jurisdiction assumed by any probate court in any case so far as it depends on the place of residence, or the location of the estate, shall not be contested in any suit or proceeding whatever, except in an appeal from the probate court in the original case or when the want of jurisdiction appears on the record." It is also provided in § 57 of the Code of Procedure that "any person interested in any final order, sentence, or decree of any probate court, and considering himself injured thereby, may appeal therefrom to the circuit court . . . within fifteen days after notice of the decision appealed from." The usual citation to kindred and creditors was given in the proceedings to appoint the administrator, and the Northeastern Railroad Company, by the service of the complaint alleging the order of appointment, received actual notice of the order eleven days after it was granted, but, as it does not appear that the said company was made a party to said proceedings, we will not hold that it was compelled to appeal therefrom, or be bound thereby for failure to appeal. Witte Bros. v. Clarke, 17 S. C. 323. The railroad company, however, was not entitled to be made a party to such proceedings. It was neither next of kin, distributee, nor creditor of Mayo, the intestate, and therefore does not fall within the class of those interested in the grant of administration. Its relation to the administration was only as a defendant in a suit for damages by the administrator, and its only interest is to defeat the action. Every debtor to an intestate's estate would have a similar interest to defeat administration, but we are not aware that a debtor was ever heard in a probate court in opposition to proceedings for administration of his creditor's estate. By analogy the position of the Northeastern Railroad Company is no better in this regard than it would be if it were a debtor to the estate of Mayo. Re Hardy, 35 Minn. 193, 28 N. W. 219; Record v. Howard, 58 Me. 225; Cummings v. Hodgdon, 147 Mass. 21, 16 N. E. 734. The effect, therefore, of § 49 of the Code, supra, is to exempt the judgment of the probate court in so far as jurisdiction depends on residence of the intestate or the location of assets from any attack by the Northeastern Railroad Company, except for want of jurisdiction appearing on the record. Such want of jurisdiction does not appear on the record. The petition for administration alleged that Mayo departed this life intestate on the 12th day of June, 1897, in the county and city of Florence, South Carolina, and did not allege that he was a resident of any other state. The petition also alleged that Mayo left no personal property within the jurisdiction of the probate court of Florence county, but did not allege whether he left any other estate either in Florence county, or elsewhere in the state, except the right of action for negligent killing of the intestate, which the petition alleged survived for the benefit of his widow and children named, and could only be prosecuted by the administrator. The order granting administration recites, "Whereas, James M. Mayo, late of Florence county, deceased, died intestate, having whilst he lived and at the time of his death divers goods, rights, and credits within the state aforesaid," etc. It could not, therefore, be said that want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record for leaving out of consideration whether there was any estate for administration, and leaving out of consideration whether the right of action under the statute is a survival one, or whether such right of action alone would constitute a sufficient asset or property to warrant administration in this state. Still the finding that James M. Mayo was a resident of Florence county, in this state, at the time of his death, would authorize administration. Rev. Stat. §§ 2001, 2023. The statutes, relating to the grant of letters of administration are as follows: "In case any person die intestate, the judge of probate of the county where the intestate resided, or he having no residence within the state in the county where the greater part of his estate may be, shall grant letters of administration of the goods, chattels, rights and credits of such person deceased to his or her relatives in the following order," etc. Rev. Stat. 1893, §§ 2001 and 2023 combined. "The granting of administration of the estate of any deceased person shall belong to the judge of probate of the county where such person was last an inhabitant; but if such person was not an inhabitant of this state the same shall belong to the judge of probate in any county in which the greater part of his or her estate may be." Code, § 39. It thus appears that residence in Florence county alone appearing on the face of the record was sufficient, under § 49, supra.

to justify dismissal of appellant's petition for revocation. This particular question is not to be regarded as affected by the following recital in the decree of the circuit court: "The fact is, Mayo was at the time of his death a resident of the state of Florida, and that was admitted by counsel for the administration, as well as by the pleadings." This was a misapprehension by the circuit court. The pleadings by the administrator resisting the application for revocation of his letters distinctly declare, "Not admitting any of the allegations of the petition [for revocation] upon which the said order is based which do not appear on the face of the record of the said proceedings in the court resulting in the judgment appointing him such administrator, and reserving the right to answer the same," and then proceeds to state four grounds why the petition should be dismissed upon the record in the probate court. Then as a fifth ground for dismissal the administrator alleged that, "even if all the allegations of the petition be taken as true, it appears on the face thereof that respondent's intestate left sufficient property within the jurisdiction of this court to confer jurisdiction to grant said letters," etc. It is only with respect to this last ground, which is in the nature of a demurrer to the petition, that it can with justice be said that the administrator admits that Mayo was not a resident of the state. Both before the probate court and the circuit court the counsel for the administrator contended that on the face of the record in the probate court in the proceedings for appointment of the administrator no want of jurisdiction appeared, and that the Northeastern Railroad Company had not such interest as warranted its attack upon such judgment, and the question was independent of the next question discussed, and to be determined by the record in the original proceedings.

2. On the other question we agree with the circuit court that, the right of action under the statute being enforceable only by the administrator of the intestate, was warrant for the grant of administration by the probate court of Florence county, where the intestate was killed, and where the railroad company charged with the negligent killing had its residence, even though the intestate was not a resident of this state, and owned no estate for ordinary administration in this state at the time of his death. In so holding we agree also with the circuit court and the contention of appellant that the act in question is not a revival of the old cause of action which belonged to the intestate, but creates a new cause of action for the benefit of the person named. This last point is only incidentally involved in the appeal, since the circuit court so holds, and no appeal is from that ruling; but, as the appellant relies on this proposition as the major premise of the argument for reversal, we notice it. The language of the statute is as follows:

"Sec. 2315. Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would if death had not ensued have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person or corporation who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured, although the death shall have been caused under circumstances as make the killing in law a felony.

"Sec. 2316. Every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and children of the person whose death shall have been so caused; and if there be none such then for the benefit of the heirs at law or distributees of the person whose death shall have been so caused as may be dependent on him for a support, and shall be brought by, or in the name of, the executor or administrator of such person, and in every such action the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action shall be brought, and the amount so recovered shall be divided among the before-mentioned parties in such shares as they would have been entitled to if the deceased had died intestate and the amount recovered had been personal assets of his or her estate.

"Sec. 2317. All such actions must be brought within two years from the death of such person, and the executor or administrator plaintiff in the action shall be liable to costs in case there be a verdict for the defendant or nonsuit, or discontinuance out of the goods, chattels, and lands of the testator or intestate if any, and if none then out of the proper goods and chattels of such executor or administrator.

"Sec. 2318. The provisions of the three last preceding sections shall not apply to any case where the person injured has for such injury brought action which has proceeded to trial and final judgment before his or her death."

In the case of Price v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 33 S. C. 556, 12 S. E. 413, the court held it competent for the defendant, in order to defeat the action by the administrator, to introduce in evidence a release for the injury, executed by the intestate in his lifetime, on the ground that whatever would have barred the intestate of recovery had he lived and brought action would bar his administrator; and on page 562, 33 S. C., and page 414, 12 S. E., the court used this language: "If the purpose was to create a new and independent cause of action, it is a little singular that the legislature should expressly provide as it has done in § 2186 [§ 2318, supra] for the defeat of one cause of action accruing to one person by the enforcement of another cause of action which had accrued to another person;" but the court did not deem it necessary to decide "whether the statute gives a new cause of action, or simply continues the original cause of action accruing to the party injured, which would otherwise terminate with his life, enlarging its scope so as to embrace compensation for the injury resulting from the death." In the case of Reed v. Northeastern R. Co. 37 S. C. 42, 16 S. E. 289, the court held that the administrator could maintain action under the statute notwithstanding the death of the intestate was instantaneous. The circuit court had ruled to the contrary on the ground that under the statute the right of action was not a new action, but a revival of such action as the intestate had, and, inasmuch as the intestate's death was instantaneous, he had, while living, no cause of action. Still the court did not expressly decide whether the right of action was a new cause of action or a revival of the right of action had by the intestate, although the following language by Mr. Justice Pope at page 53, 37 S. C., and page 291, 16 S. E., would seem to imply that the court thought the action was a new one: "That the act requires the personal representative (administrator or executor) to sue, need not trouble us. The legislature could as well impose that duty on the sheriff or coroner. The proceeds recovered are not for creditors or the family generally, or for the legatees, but are strictly confined to certain members of the family of the deceased." In the case of Lilly v. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. 32 S. C. 142, 10 S. E. 932, the court held it essential to a cause of action under this statute to allege that the intestate left surviving him a wife, or children, or parents, or that the action was for their benefit; and that to allow an amendment alleging such facts would entirely change the nature of the action alleged in the complaint. And in the case of Nohrden v. Northeastern R. Co. 59 S. C. 107, 37 S. E. 228, the court held that, in estimating damages under this statute, the jury could consider the wounded feelings of the beneficiaries named resulting from the death of the person killed by the wrongful act of another.

This review of decided cases shows that the trend of decisions in this state is towards the view that the right of action under the statute is a new one, and not a mere revival. This view, we think, is the correct one. It is true that under the statute the right of action in the administrator depends upon whether the deceased, if he had lived, would have had a right to recover. Price v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 33 S. C. 556, 12 S. E. 413, and Reed v. Northeastern R. Co. 37 S. C. 42, 16 S. E. 289. This, however, is the statutory condition upon which the right of recovery in the new created action is based, and does not indicate that the old cause of action is revived or carried forward into the new. The absence of any words showing expressly or by necessary implication an intention to make the action a survival one indicates a contrary intent; for, in the absence of such words, the rule of the common law that actions ex delicto die with the death of the injured person operates. In the next place, the damages recoverable are for only such injury as results from the death to the parties for whose benefit the action is brought, whereas, if it were intended as a survival action, the recovery would very likely have been confined to damages for the loss and suffering of the person directly injured. The object, scope, and measure of damages in the new statutory action are wholly different from the action as it would stand under the common-law action revived. The appellant concedes that, if the action merely survived the intestate, the cause of action would be a sufficient asset to warrant administration, but the contention is that, the action not being a mere revival of the original action, but a wholly new action, such right of action in the administration for the benefit of the statutory beneficiaries is not an asset or property of the intestate upon which administration could be granted. It is doubtless true, as a general proposition, that the existence of assets of the intestate in this state is essential to give the probate court jurisdiction to grant administration on the estate of a nonresident, and it is also true that the usual meaning attached to the word "assets" is any property applicable to the payment of debts. But, in view of the statute under consideration, a broader signification ought to be given to the term "assets," so as to include any right of action which cannot be enforced except by the administrator, and which is made distributable by the administrator under statutory directions. This statute creates a right which cannot be enforced except by grant of administration somewhere. It is argued that administration should be granted in the state where the deceased was domiciled,—Florida in this case. But it does not appear in the record before us what are the statutes of Florida governing such a case, and there is no presumption that the statutes of Florida are like ours in this matter. For all we know to the contrary, it may not be possible in Florida to secure an administration upon such a claim. And, in case administration could be obtained in Florida, the appointment there would not authorize a suit by the administrator in this state in the absence of a statute of this state permitting it, and there is none. Dial v. Gary, 14 S. C. 573, 37 Am. Rep. 737, and other cases that might be cited. We do not think the statute in question was intended to be dependent upon the statutes of any other state for its full execution, but is sufficient in itself to carry out its object. To hold that a foreign administration was proper or necessary in this case, when such administration need not be enforced in this state, would be to hold the statute inapplicable to nonresidents, especially to nonresidents owning no property in this state; whereas we think the statute is in terms broad enough to cover any person, resident or nonresident, with or without property in this state. To give such right of action to propertyless residents, and to deny its propertyless nonresidents would be a distinction which we think was not contemplated by the legislature, if, indeed, such a discrimination would be lawful. The statute is remedial, and should be liberally construed so as to accomplish its object. We therefore hold that the statute creating a right of action which cannot be enforced except by an administrator, and providing for a special distribution by said administrator of the proceeds, will warrant the probate court of the county where the intestate was killed in granting administration for the purpose of enforcing such right of action. This view is well supported by authority in other jurisdictions. Hutchins v. St. Paul, M. & M. E. Co. 44 Minn. 5, 46 N. W. 79; Findlay v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 106 Mich. 700, 64 N. W. 733; Woerner, Am. Law of Administration, § 205. In the case of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bradley, 51 Neb. 596, 71 N. W. 289, the court was unanimous in holding that under the authority of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Lewis, 24 Neb. 848, 2 L. R. A. 67, 40 N. W. 401, such a cause of action is sufficient to warrant the granting of letters of administration, although the proceeds of the action are not to be distributed according to the usual course; but a majority of the court further held that the appointment should have been made in the domicile of the deceased nonresident, since by statute in Nebraska an administrator duly appointed in any other state could prosecute an action in Nebraska in his capacity as administrator, it being conceded by the majority holding this last view that, if the law did not permit a suit by a nonresident or foreign administrator, such a state of affairs would fix the situs of the claim in such manner that administration must be granted where the claim could be reached. This we understand to be the holding of the Nebraska court in the case cited, which contains an interesting discussion of both sides of the question before us. So far as we have ascertained, there are only two cases to the contrary of the view we have announced: Perry v. St. Joseph & W. R. Co. 29 Kan. 420; and Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Swayne, 26 Ind. 477, cited by the appellant. Since the argument we have been referred by appellant to the case of Marvin v. Maysville Street, R. & Transfer Co. 49 Fed. 436, as supporting his contention, but the case was reversed by the circuit court of appeals of the sixth circuit (8 C. C. A. 21, 16 U. S. App. 236, 59 Fed. 91), which court held that the Kentucky statute "giving the 'personal representative' a right of action for the wrongful death of his decedent will not be construed to confer such right upon a foreign administrator, contrary to the common-law rule and the established policy of the state." See also on this point, Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brantley, 96 Ky. 297, 28 S. W. 477, 49 Am. St. Rep. 291, and note on page 300. It must be said, however, that in Kentucky the proceeds of such action are assets for creditors, and according to appellant's view in such case the right of action is an asset warranting administration. For this reason we did not cite the case of Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 97 Ky. 228, 30 S. W. 639, and cases from other states where the right of action is held to be a survival of the original action.

McIver, Ch. J., dissenting:

While I concur fully with Mr. Justice Jones in some of the views which he presents, I cannot agree with him in the conclusion which he reaches. The fundamental inquiry is whether the probate court for Florence county had any jurisdiction to grant letters of administration upon the personal estate of James M. Mayo, deceased, to J. W. McCown. The present Constitution, in § 19 of article 5, provides (passing by the county of Charleston, for which special provisions are made) that in all other counties of the state jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration shall be vested as the general assembly may provide; and the provision made by the general assembly, as may be found by reference to §§ 2023 and 2001 (Rev. Stat. 1893), is that, in case any person shall die intestate, the judge of probate of the county where the intestate resided, or, if he had no place of residence in the state, then of the county where the greater part of the estate of such intestate may be, "shall grant administration of the goods, chattels, rights, and credits of such deceased person," and the statute proceeds to indicate the persons to whom such grant shall be committed, as to which no question is raised. This is the only provision, so far as I am informed, which has been made by the general assembly vesting jurisdiction in any court or in any person to grant administration on the estate of an intestate. And under the express terms of this provision it cannot be disputed that the only person invested with jurisdiction to make such grant is the judge of probate of the county where the deceased resided, or, if he had no place of residence in this state, then the judge of probate of the county where the greater part of his (the intestate's) estate may be. The practical result would be that, unless the intestate, Mayo, resided in the county of Florence, or had an estate in that county, the judge of probate of such county would have no jurisdiction to grant letters of administration to McCown, as he undertook to do. So that the next inquiry in logical order would be whether it has been made to appear, either that Mayo was a resident of Florence county, or that he left an estate therein.

It is contended, however, by the counsel for respondent that the appellant is shut off from any general inquiry as to those two facts, and that we are confined by §§ 49 and 57 of the Code to the inquiry whether it appears on the record (meaning the record in the probate court granting the letters of administration to McCown) that there was a want of jurisdiction. So far as § 57 of the Code is concerned, it is very clear, from the decision of this court in Witte Bros. v. Clarke, 17 S. C. 313, that it does not shut off inquiry, and it seems to me that upon the same principle upon which that decision was rested we should hold that § 49 cannot have the effect claimed for it. The principle upon which that decision was rested is that, as no person who is not a party to a proceeding is bound by any judgment rendered therein, such person could not appeal from such judgment, for, if he undertook to do so, the appellate tribunal could very well say to him, "You have no standing in this court, as your legal rights have not been affected by the judgment which you are seeking to reverse." For this reason it was there held that the language used in § 57 must be regarded as referring only to persons who were parties to the proceeding. I see no good reason why the same may not be said in reference to the language used in § 49, for it manifestly presupposes that there was a right of appeal. Again, it is contended by counsel for respondent that the present case is a proceeding in rem, and not a proceeding in personam, as was the case in Witte Bros. v. Clarke, 17 S. C. 313; and hence that decision does not apply here. I suppose that there could be no proceeding in rem unless there was a res; and the res in a case like this would, as I understand it, be the estate of the intestate; and, if there is no estate of the intestate within the jurisdiction of the court, as I shall hereafter undertake to show, then there would be no res, and consequently no proceeding in rem. But, even assuming, for the sake of argument, that we are confined to the inquiry whether the want of jurisdiction appears on the record, it seems to me that the record of the proceeding in the court of probate, fairly and properly construed, does show on its face a lack of jurisdiction. That record does not consist only of the letters of administration, from which certain stereotyped words, which are sometimes used merely as descriptio personae, have been extracted for the purpose of showing that Mayo was a resident of Florence county at the time of his death,—a statement that everyone knew was not true. Those words, I must suppose, were in the printed form used for letters of administration, and were inadvertently allowed to remain there; for I cannot suppose that such a high-minded and honorable man as the judge of probate for the county of Florence is known to be would intentionally make a misstatement of a fact. It will be noted that the judge of probate, in making his decree in this case, makes no allusion to the recital in the letters of administration that the deceased, Mayo, was "late of Florence county," but undertakes to vindicate his jurisdiction to grant such letters by the fact that upon the death of Mayo, by virtue of the statute, a right of action would accrue to his administrator under the circumstances stated in this case; and this he thought was sufficient to invest him with jurisdiction to grant administration upon the estate of the deceased. I do not mean to say that he bases his conclusion that the application to revoke the letters of administration should be refused solely upon that ground. All I mean to say is that he claims to have acquired jurisdiction only in that way. But the petition for letters of administration is just as much a part of the record as the letters granted in response to such petition. Indeed, as it seems to me, that petition is the proper source from which to obtain the facts neo-essary to confer jurisdiction. When a suitor invokes the jurisdiction of any judicial tribunal, he must take such a case as shows that the tribunal whose jurisdiction he invokes has jurisdiction of the case thus made. Especially is this so as to the probate court, which, while not a court of inferior jurisdiction, is a court of limited jurisdiction; and hence, when the jurisdiction of that tribunal is invoked, the suitor must show, by the case which he makes, that it is a case falling within the limits of the jurisdiction prescribed by law for such tribunal. Now, in a case of this kind the petition for letters of administration is the mode by which the petitioner makes his case, of which the court of probate is asked to take jurisdiction. Looking to the petition for letters of administration, which is set out in the "case," it is quite certain that it does not state either the fact that the deceased was a resident of the county of Florence or that the greater part of his estate was in that county, one of which was necessary to invest the judge of probate of Florence county with jurisdiction of the case. On the contrary, it seems to me that the allegations of the petition, fairly and properly construed, show that the deceased was not a resident of Florence county, but was a resident of the state of Florida, and that he left no personal property in Florence county. First, as to the matter of residence, in paragraph 1 of the petition the allegation is that the deceased departed this life intestate in the city and county of Florence, leaving surviving him as his only heirs at law and distributees his widow and his children, therein named, and that all of said heirs at law and distributees were residents of the state of Florida. Now, in the absence of any allegation to the contrary (and there is none in the petition), the only inference that can properly be drawn from the allegation in the petition is that the deceased was a resident of the state of Florida, for the presumption is that a husband resides with his wife; the domicile of the wife is that of the husband. Next, as to the location of the estate of the husband, the allegation in the second paragraph of the petition is distinct "that at the time of his death the said James M. Mayo left no personal property within the jurisdiction of this court" (meaning, of course, the probate court of the county of Florence). It is true that the petition in this paragraph proceeds to allege certain facts which he claims would, if Mayo's injuries had not proved fatal, have given him a cause of action, and that under the statute a cause of action survives for the benefit of his widow and children which can only be prosecuted by the administrator of the estate of the said Mayo. It will be observed that there is no inconsistency between these additional allegations and the distinct allegation made in the outset of the paragraph that said Mayo died leaving no property in the county of Florence; for these allegations do not assert that this right of action therein referred to constituted any part of the estate of said Mayo, but rather implies the contrary. It seems to me, therefore, that the record of the proceedings in the probate court under which the letters of administration were granted, looked at as a whole, and fairly considered, do show on their face a want of jurisdiction on the part of the judge of probate for Florence county to grant the letters of administration.

But there is another view of this matter, which, it seems to me, deserves consideration. It appears from the "case" as prepared for argument here that the North-eastern Railroad Company, the appellant herein, filed a petition in the court of probate for Florence county alleging, among other things,—which I do not set out here, as I think a copy of such petition should be included in the report of the case,—that the judge of probate for said county had, upon the ex parte application of McCown (of which application the appellant had no notice), unsupported by any evidence tending to show that the said Mayo was a resident of the county, or that he had any property therein, granted letters of administration upon the personal estate of the said Mayo to the said McCown; that the said Mayo at the time of his death was not a resident of this state, but was, at the time of his death, and long prior thereto, a resident of the state of Florida; and that the said Mayo died, leaving no property or estate of any description whatsoever within the limits of this state, either at the time of his death or at the time of the grant of letters of administration or since; wherefore the petitioner prays that the grant of administration to the said McCown be revoked and canceled. Upon the filing of this petition the judge of probate granted an order requiring the said McCown to show cause why the letters of administration previously granted him should not be revoked and canceled. In obedience to such order, the said McCown made his return, in which he uses the following language: "Not admitting any of the allegations of the petition upon which the said order is based which do not appear on the face of the record of the said proceedings in this court resulting in the judgment appointing him such administrator, but reserving the right to answer the same, respectfully shows to the court that the said petition should be dismissed on the following grounds;" and then proceeds to state five grounds, in which not a single fact stated in the petition was denied or in any way questioned, but these grounds raise nothing but legal questions. The return of the administrator must therefore be regarded as nothing more than a demurrer to the petition for revocation. It was so treated by the judge of probate and by the circuit judge, and there was no exception on that point. Hence the question cannot be raised here. But, even if the question could be raised, I think that the view which both of those officials took was correct. The words "not admitting any of the allegations of the petition," etc., which I have quoted from the return, may be regarded by some as an ingenious mode of avoiding the necessity of denying allegations of fact which are known to be true, but there is no system of pleading with which I am acquainted which would recognize that mode as sufficient to raise an issue of fact. Indeed, counsel who drew this return evidently recognized the correctness of my view, as they took care to reserve the right to answer the allegations of the petition, of which reserved right, however, the administrator has never availed himself. So that, as the case comes before us, all the allegations of fact in the petition must be regarded as admitted by the demurrer, and the only questions presented by this appeal are the legal questions raised by the demurrer. There are only two of these questions which I deem it necessary to consider: (1) Whether the right of action conferred by the provisions of Lord Campbell's act can be regarded as such a part of the estate of the intestate Mayo as would invest the judge of probate of Florence county with jurisdiction to grant letters of administration upon the estate of said intestate. (2) Whether the provisions of Lord Campbell's act, as incorporated in §§ 2315-2318, Rev. Stat. 1893, can be regarded as a sufficient amendment of our statutes conferring jurisdiction on the judge of probate to grant administration upon the estates of intestates to warrant the appointment of an administrator of a deceased nonresident who dies leaving no property within the limits of this state.

In considering the first of these questions, the inquiry naturally presents itself whether the right of action conferred by this special statute in a case like this is a new right of action, or merely a continuance or revival of the right of action which the deceased would have had if his injuries had not been fatal. This inquiry is so conclusively disposed of by Mr. Justice Jones in his opinion that I do not deem it necessary to add anything (even if I could) to what he has so well said upon this point. But, even if the right of action conferred by the statute is not a mere revival or continuance of the right of action which the deceased would have had if he had not died, but is an entirely new right of action, the question still remains whether such new right of action can in any sense be regarded as a part of the assets or estate of the deceased. Now, this new right of action owes its origin exclusively to the statute. It never existed in this state until our act was passed in 1859 (12 Stat. at L. p. 825). It is therefore a creature of statute, and in determining its nature and effect we must look to the terms of the statute, read in the light of the provisions of the Constitution, which control the legislature, the courts, and the people, in order to ascertain the intention of the legislature in bringing into existence this new right which had never previously existed. Looking into the terms of this statute, we do not find a single word or phrase which even implies an intention on the part of the legislature to make this right or its fruits any part of the assets of the estate of the decedent. On the contrary, we do find there language which plainly implies that the legislature intended that the same should not be any part of the assets of the estate of the decedent. In that portion of § 2316 (Rev. Stat. 1893), which was originally taken from the 2d section of the act of 1859, prescribing how the amount recovered should be divided among the beneficiaries, these words are used: "Shall be divided among the before-mentioned parties in such shares as they would have been entitled to if the deceased had died intestate, and the amount recovered had been personal assets of his or her estate." These words which I have italicized necessarily imply that the legislature did not intend that the amount recovered should be the assets of the estate of the decedent, but should be distributed among the beneficiaries mentioned in the same shares as if they had been personal assets of his estate. It was the same thing as saying that, although the amount recovered is no part of the personal assets of the estate of the decedent, yet they shall be divided among the beneficiaries in such shares as they would have been entitled to if the same had been such personal assets. The only act which I have been able to find amending this section (act 1898 [22 Stat. at L. p. 788]), not only makes no change in this respect, but, on the contrary, uses precisely the same words which I have italicized above, and only makes certain changes in the persons mentioned as beneficiaries. Besides, to suppose that the legislature intended to make this right of action or the fruits thereof a part of the assets of the estate of a decedent, and at the same time to deny to the creditors of such decedents the right to have such assets applied to the payment of their debts, as both in law and good morals they are entitled to, would be to impute to the legislature an intention to lend its aid to the perpetration of a fraud upon such creditors; and this no court ought to do. It seems to me clear, therefore, that the right of action conferred by the statute, or the fruits thereof (as the one necessarily follows the other), can in no sense be regarded as any part of the assets of the estate of a decedent. These views have the support of high authority. See Stewart v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 168 U. S. 449, 42 L. ed. 539, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105; Martin v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 151 U. S. 695, sub nom. Gerling v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 38 L. ed. 311, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 533; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 859.

The second question above stated will next be briefly considered. I do not see how it is possible to regard the provisions of Lord Campbell's act, as incorporated in Rev. Stat. of 1893, as an amendment to any of our statutory provisions in regard to the appointment of administrators. The two subjects are entirely foreign to each other, and there is no hint or suggestion in any of our statutory provisions that the one was intended as an amendment to the other. On the contrary, §§ 2001 and 2023 of the Revised Statutes of 1893, hereinabove referred to, are contained in the same volume which contains the sections of Lord Campbell's act, and I am unable to discover any indication whatever in these or any other sections of an intention to extend the limits of the jurisdiction conferred upon the judge of probate by §§ 2001 and 2023, or in any way to modify or qualify the same. It is contended, however, that the result of the view which I have taken would be to deny to the beneficiaries mentioned in the statute the benefit of the statute whenever a person is killed in this state by the wrongful act of another who is not a resident of this state, and who dies leaving no estate within this state. But it seems to me that there are two conclusive answers to this contention: (1) That the heirs at law of such a person would be in the same position in which everyone was prior to the passage of the act of 1859; and if the legislature, in passing that act, and the several acts amendatory thereof, have omitted to make such provision as would enable the heirs at law of a nonresident who is killed in this state by the wrongful act of another, and dies leaving no estate within the limits of this state, to avail themselves of the benefit of such legislation, the court has no power to supply such omission. And I am not prepared to concede that such a result would follow from the view which I have taken; for there is certainly high authority for saying that in such a case the administrator of the decedent could bring the action. (2) The reason for the rule that a foreign administrator cannot sue in this state, as usually given, is that it is necessary for the protection of the rights and interests of the creditors of the decedent within the state; and, as the rights of creditors are in no way involved in a case like this, the reason for the rule ceases, and under the maxim, Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipse lex, that rule would not apply in a case like this.

It seems to me, therefore, that in any view which I am able to take of this case the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the case remanded to the court of probate, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the petition for revocation of the letters of administration granted to the said McCown, and with leave to answer said petition, if he so desires, raising such issues of fact as may be deemed pertinent to the case.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

Harry PAULTON et al.

v.

B. F. KEITH.

(.....R. I.....)

1. Declarations of the manager of a theater that he is acting under instructions of the owner in preventing the service of process on an actor engaged in the theater are not admissible in a suit to hold the owner liable for such act.
2. The manager of a theater has no implied authority from the owner to prevent the service of process upon actors employed in the theater, so as to make his declarations while doing so admissible against the owner as part of the res gestæ.
3. The owner of a theater cannot be held liable for the unauthorized acts of his manager in obstructing the service of process upon an actor employed in the theater.
4. The failure of an officer who has entered the outer doors of a theater to serve process on an actor, to force an entry to the stage, which is necessary to effect the service, and not the act of the owner's servants in obstructing the officer, is the cause of injury resulting from the failure, so that the owner of the theater cannot be held liable for such injury.

PETITION by plaintiffs for a new trial after verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for wrongful obstruction of an officer in the discharge of his duty. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James A. Williams, for plaintiffs:

There were two distinct offenses committed by the agent Fynes,—a criminal act against the officer, for which the agent alone was liable and for which he was arrested, and a civil wrong done to the plaintiffs by preventing the officer from making service of the writ.

Fynes by the very nature of his employment, and from the fact that his principal rarely came to Providence, had as absolute control over his principal's property as the principal himself could possibly exert.

When a principal chooses to deliver up the entire control of a public place to an agent he cannot escape liability by reason of the agent's exercise of unlawful authority over that property. The act of the agent is the act of the principal.

Rep. 337.

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that authority from master to do an illegal act cannot be inferred, see Staples v. Schmid (R. I.) 19 L. R. A. 824.

As to rule that servant must have been acting within scope of his employment in order 54 L. R. A.

to render master liable for his wrongful or negligent act, see note to Ritchie v. Waller (Conn.) 27 L. R. A. 161.

As to liability of owner of theater for assault by employee, see Dickson v. Waldron (Ind.) 24 L. R. A. 483.

Mr. Nathaniel W. Smith, with Messrs. Edwards & Angell, for defendant:

For all acts done by the servant under the express orders or direction of the master, as well as for all acts done in the execution of his master's business within the scope of his employment, the master is responsible; but when the act is not within the scope of his employment or in obedience to the master's orders, it is the act of the servant, and not of the master, and the servant alone is responsible therefor.

Wood, Mast. & S. § 279; Staples v. Schmid, 18 R. I. 224, 19 L. R. A. 824, 26 Atl. 193.

To obstruct an officer is not within the scope of the employment of the manager of a theatre.

Owen*, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 270; Green v. Woodbury, 48 Vt. 5; Vanderbilt v. Richmond Turnp. Co. 2 N. Y. 479.

The declarations of a person assuming to act for another are not admissible to prove either the existence or the extent of the agency. In other words, declarations of an agent are admissible only when the agent is acting within the scope of his employment.

A ministerial officer armed with due process of law and acting within it is the servant of the state, and not of the plaintiff. Resistance to him is resistance to the public authority, and is a penal offense.

Western R. Co. v. Thomas, 60 Ga. 313, 27 Am. Rep. 411.

It was the officer's right and duty to break open doors and to overcome all unlawful opposition, in the service of plaintiffs' writ.

Clark v. Wilson, 14 R. I. 11; Kelley v. Schuyler, 20 R. I. 432, 44 L. R. A. 435, 39 Atl. 893.

If he failed to do so, such failure, and not the refusal of admittance, was the proximate cause of injury to the plaintiffs.

Stimess, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs brought this suit against the defendant, the proprietor of a theater in Providence, to recover damages upon the charge that the defendant's manager prevented an officer from serving a writ in their behalf upon an actor engaged in said theater. The evidence showed that the officer, with another officer and the plaintiffs' attorney, entered the outside door of the rear part of the theater; where they were met by the manager with two other men, who stood against the door to the stage, and refused to allow the officers to enter it. The employment of the manager by this defendant 54 L. R. A.

was admitted, but no authority from him to refuse admission to the officer was shown, other than the officer's testimony that the manager said that he was acting under the direction of the defendant. This testimony was objected to, but, after the plaintiffs' case was in, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs ask for a new trial on the ground of error in such direction.

It is a general rule that the declarations of a person assuming to act as the agent of another are not admissible to prove his agency. He may be called as a witness to state what orders he has received, and upon that point he would be subject to cross-examination, from which a limitation of his authority might appear. But to allow his statement to others upon a vital point, as to which he cannot be cross-examined, is obviously hearsay testimony, and contrary to the well-settled rules of evidence. The plaintiffs do not controvert this rule, but they claim to be within this qualification of it; that, when the agent is acting within the scope of his authority, and during the continuance of the agency, his declarations may be given, as to matters then occurring, as a part of the res gestæ. The question presented in this case, therefore, is whether the manager, in refusing entrance to the officer, was acting within the apparent scope and implied authority of his employment. The plaintiff's argue that the defendant is liable by analogy to cases such as these: If the manager had assaulted a patron of the theater and wrongfully ejected him; if a conductor of a street car or steam train should assault a passenger, and put him off, without right to do so; if a motorman should run his car at an unlawful speed, and injure a passenger, or a traveler upon the street,—the master would be liable. Doubtless this is so, but upon very different principles from any which are applicable to this case. In the cases supposed, a proprietor of a theater and a company running cars are held to guarantee some protection to their patrons, and to assume a liability if employees, either wilfully or negligently, injure them; and a motorman, engaged in his proper duties of running a car, carries with him, like the driver of a horse, the master's responsibility that it shall not be driven wrongfully upon another. As to a master's responsibility to others for a wilful act by his servant, there has been some conflict in decisions. In many cases it has been held that a master is responsible for the torts of his servant, done with a view to the furtherance of the master's business, whether the same be done negligently, wantonly, or even wilfully, but within the scope of his employment (14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 817, note 3); but we need not examine those cases, because the controlling question before us is that of the agent's authority. In Staples v. Schmid, 18 R. I. 224, 19 L. R. A. 824, 26 Atl. 193, this subject was carefully considered, and one of the principles recognized in determining liability was that it cannot be inferred as matter of law that a master has authorized his servant to do an act which he could not lawfully do himself in the circumstances supposed by the servant to exist. In that case the proprietor of a store was held to be liable to a customer, whose arrest the defendant's salesman and custodian had caused on a wrongful suspicion of stealing goods from the store. The court said that the master would have no right to arrest and search an innocent person, but that he had the right to detain a thief, and to recapture his property from him. Hence the act of the servant might be lawful or unlawful, according to the facts. As the master's substitute he had to make a decision of his duty, which, as to third persons, was the master's act, for which he was answerable either for excess of force or mistake in regard to the occasion for it. In the present case it could not be lawful for the defendant to obstruct an officer in the discharge of his duty, in any event, if the refusal of admission amounted to obstruction; and so it could not be lawful for his servant to do so. The cases relied on by plaintiffs, so far as they support them, are based upon lawful authority to a servant to do the act from which the injury arose, and upon an excess of force or bad judgment in doing it. This is clearly right. If one employs another to do a certain thing as his servant, retaining the right of control, oversight, and discretion in the performance of the act, the servant acting in place of the master, and not independently, the master is responsible for the way in which the thing is done. But it is a very different thing to hold a master responsible for an act which he has never authorized a servant to do, simply because the latter is his servant, and on the strength of it to allow the statements of the servant to be put in to bind the principal. The plaintiffs' claim goes to this extent, but the cases cited do not. In Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597, the action was for kicking a boy off a baggage car by a brakeman. It was conceded that the removal of the plaintiff, who was a trespasser, was within the scope of the brakeman's authority, and hence the company was held to be liable for the injury caused by exercising that authority improperly by kicking the boy off against a wood pile, from which he fell back under the cars. Hoffman v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 25, 41 Am. Rep. 337, was to the same effect, the court saying: "The authority to remove the plaintiff from the car was vested in the defendant's servants. The wrong consisted in the time and mode of exercising it. For this the defendant is 54 L. R. A. responsible, unless the brakeman used his authority as a mere cover for accomplishing an independent and wrongful purpose of his own." In Adams v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 74 Mo. 553, 41 Am. Rep. 333, the question was whether the statements of the fireman and engineer of a railway train were admissible in evidence in an action against a railroad company for negligence, and the court held that they were not. Hynes v. Jungren, 8 Kan. 391, was a suit for false imprisonment, in which the plaintiff in the original case, together with the constable serving the writ carried the defendant in the original writ to the county jail, and kept him there for a part of a day, before taking him before the justice, as required by the precept. In that case the principal was an active participant in the wrong. In Cantrell v. Colwell, 3 Head, 471, Mrs. Cantrell requested a relative to turn Colwell's mare out of her inclosure. In doing so he threw a rock at the mare, and broke its leg. The court held that a request to turn out the mare could not be tortured to imply a request to injure or destroy it. In the case at bar, there being no inference of authority as a matter of law from the defendant to his servant to do the act here complained of, and no evidence of express authority, the statements of the servant were inadmissible, and, there being no other evidence of authority, the direction of a verdict for the defendant was right.

The verdict was also rightly directed upon another ground. The building in which the affair took place was not a dwelling house, and the officer had entered the outer door. If he had a valid precept, he had the right to break doors, and command sufficient force to enter, having requested admittance, which had been refused. Clark v. Wilson, 14 R. I. 11. The cause of the plaintiffs' injury, if any, was not the refusal of the defendant's servant to allow the officer to enter, but the failure of the officer to serve his process as he might and should have done. To this may be added the fact that the plaintiffs offered no proof of the judgment set out in their declaration, nor any evidence to show that they had suffered any pecuniary loss in the case. On the contrary, the defendant put in a discharge in bankruptcy of Seabrooke, the defendant in the original writ, subsequent to the plaintiffs' judgment, to show that the plaintiffs had no right of action against him, and consequently had suffered no damage.

The petition for a new trial is denied, and case remitted, with direction to enter judgment for the defendant.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Edward S. ANDREWS et al., Appts.,
v.

D. H. ROBERTSON, Respnt.

1. Parol evidence is proper to explain the meaning of words used in a writing which are ambiguous when applied to the subject which gave rise to such paper, as well as when the meaning of the writing is uncertain looking only at the language thereof.
2. A person is conclusively presumed to have had notice, actual or constructive, of all the doings of his agent within the actual or apparent scope of the agency, and to be bound thereby.
3. The holder of a promissory note, taken for him of the maker by an agent

*Headnotes by MARSHALL, J.

NOTE.— Rights of payee of note after repurchasing it from bona fide holder.

The question which is involved in the subject of this note is founded upon the exception to the general rule that a purchaser of negotiable paper, even if he had notice that there was fraud in the inception of the paper, or that it was lost or stolen, or that the consideration has failed between some anterior parties, or the paper is overdue and dishonored, is, nevertheless, entitled to recover, provided his immediate indorser was a bona fide holder for value unaffected by any of these defenses; in other words, as soon as the paper comes into the hands of a holder unaffected by any defect, its character as a negotiable security is established. The exception mentioned is that if the note were invalid as between the maker and payee, the payee could not himself, by purchase from a bona fide holder, become a successor to his rights, it not being essential to such bona fide holder's protection to extend the principle so far.

The rule above mentioned is the same as the rule laid down in equity in regard to the purchase and sale of real property, and which, as stated by Judge Story in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, arose in a case decided in 1695, in which A purchased an estate with notice of an encumbrance, and then sold it to B, who had no notice, and B afterwards sold it to C, who had notice, and the question was whether the encumbrance bound the estate in the hands of C. The master of the rolls having held that it would, on appeal to the lord keeper it was urged that in such case an innocent purchaser without notice might be forced to keep his estate, and could not sell it. The lord keeper held this to be true, and decided that if B had not notice at the time of his purchase that the estate was redeemable, the plaintiff could not be relieved through A although A and C had notice. Harrison v. Forth, Prec. in Ch. 51.

This equitable principle is further illustrated in Sweet v. Southcott, 2 Bro. Ch. 66, Dick. 670; Brandlyn v. Ord, 1 Atk. 571, 1 West, 512.

That there is the same exception to this equitable rule in regard to real property is shown in Kennedy v. Daly, 1 Sch. & Lef. 879, where it was held that if a trustee conveys to a person with notice, and takes a reconveyance, it operates nothing. So if the person to whom he conveys has no notice, yet on the reconveyupon a condition not disclosed to such holder and outside the scope of the agency, cannot repudiate the condition and insist upon holding and enforcing the note. He is bound, if he does not intend to abide by such condition, to restore or offer to restore the note within a reasonable time after discovering the facts.

4. The general rule is that if a person, with knowledge of facts which will defeat a promissory note in the hands of the payee, purchases it from a bona fide holder thereof, he may recover thereon upon the strength of such bona fides; but that rule does not apply to a purchaser who is the payee of the note. If he sells such paper to an innocent third person and repurchases it for value, he does not thereby become possessed of any better right as against the maker than he possessed in the first instance.

ance the trust would attach, though it did not attach on the person to whom he conveyed, and would not have attached if that person had conveyed to another without notice.

And the decision in the last case was adopted and followed in Church v. Euland, 64 Pa. 432, where it was held (illustrating both the rule and the exception) that undoubtedly if a person, though with notice, purchases from one without notice, he is entitled to stand in his shoes, and take shelter under his bona fides. If it were not so the bona fide purchaser without notice might be unable to dispose of the property, and thus its value in his hands would be materially deteriorated. But if the second purchaser in such case be the original trustee, who reacquires the estate, he will be fixed with the trust. To the same effect, Ely v. Wilcox, 26 Wis. 91.

There are a number of American cases supporting the doctrine as to the equitable rule in regard to real property as above stated, but as they are not considered within the immediate scope of this note it is not deemed necessary to cite them.

The rule in regard to the rights of purchasers from a bona fide holder of negotiable paper, and the exception thereto, which is the immediate subject considered in this note, and the reasons for both the rule and the exception, are so completely and admirably stated in the decisions which follow that it is deemed unnecessary to speak further of them here.

The general rule is, that a bona fide holder of negotiable paper is entitled to the entire world as a market, and to secure this it is necessary that all the rights and advantages possessed by him shall pass to his assignee, even though the latter may have notice of such facts as would have defeated any right of recovery had the instrument remained in the hands of the original payee. An exception to this rule is, that if the paper returns to the original payee it is not shielded, as it was in the hands of the bona fide holder without notice, or would have been in the hands of any other person holding under him, but is subject to any defense that could have been made had it never been transferred at all. Elwell v. Tatum, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 397, 24 S. W. 71, 25 S. W. 434.

While the general rule is that a bona fide holder of negotiable paper may pass it to an assignee, even if the latter may have notice of such facts as would have defeated the right APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dane County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action on a promissory note. The defense was that plaintiffs, as agents of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, acting through their sub-agent, one Forsting, delivered to defendant two insurance bonds duly issued by such society, on his application made through such agents, and that he at the same time delivered to Forsting for the agents the note in suit, the same being for the down payment for such bonds, and that the delivery was coupled with an agreement which Forsting had authority to make to the effect that defendant might, at his election to be made within thirty days, return the bonds, and in that event that the note should be delivered to defendant; that such election was made, notice thereof given to plaintiffs, a demand made upon them for the note and a tender of the bonds made to them, all within the thirty days agreed upon. The evidence was to the effect that defendant dealt with Forsting believing him to be the authorized agent of plaintiffs, received from him the bonds mentioned in the answer, and delivered to him the note in suit, receiving at the same time a writing signed by Forsting as follows: "Received of D. H. Robertson note for $600 balance due on bonds Nos. B836,811 and 851,882. It is understood and agreed that should the above-numbered bonds be returned not accepted within thirty days duebill will be to recover had the instrument remained in the hands of the original party, an exception to the rule is that, if the paper returns to the original party, it is not shielded, as it would have been in the hands of another person, but is subject to any defense that could have been made had it never been transferred at all. This exception rests on the principle that one cannot take advantage of his own wrong. Hoye v. Kalaashian (R. I.) 46 Atl. 271.

If a patent is worthless, and consequently furnishes no consideration for a note, such note in the hands of the payee is void; and if, being negotiable, he sells or transfers it to an innocent holder before maturity, for value, he, by that act, perpetrates a fraud upon the maker, for which he is liable to the full extent of the injury caused by such sale and transfer. Upon the same principle, and as a sequence from it, where the payee transfers negotiable paper, void in his hands, to an innocent holder, and repurchases from him or a subsequent holder, the paper becomes affected with the original infirmity, and the payee cannot recover. Tod v. Wick Bros. 36 Ohio St. 370.

Probably the best statement and illustration of the general rule in regard to the rights of a purchaser from the bona fide holder, and also of the exception to that rule, which, as has been stated, forms the subject of the note, as well as the reasons for both the rule and the exception, is that contained in a case decided by the supreme court of Michigan, in which the opinion of the court was delivered by that eminent jurist and commentator, Judge Cooley, as follows: It is perfectly true, as a general rule, that the bona fide holder of negotiable paper has a right to sell the same, with all the rights and equities attaching to it in his own hands, to whoever may see fit to buy of him, whether such purchaser was aware of the original infirmity or not. Without this right he would not have the full protection which the law merchant designs to afford him, and negotiable paper would cease to be a safe and reliable medium for the exchanges of commerce. For, if one can stop the negotiability of paper against which there is no defense, held by another, it is obvious that an important element in its value is at once taken away. But this rule has never been applied to a purchase by the original payee, and it is not essential to the protection of the innocent indorsee that it should be. It cannot be very important to him, that there is one person incapable of succeeding to his equities, and who consequently would not be likely to become a purchaser. If he may sell to all the rest of the community, the market value of his security is not likely to be affected by the circumstance that a single individual cannot compete for its purchase, especially when it is considered that the nature of negotiable securities is such that their market value is very little influenced by competition. Nor is there any rule or principle of law that would be violated by permitting the maker to set up his defense against the payee, when he becomes the indorsee, with the same effect as he might have done before it had been sold at all; nor is there any valid reason against it. Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515.

A firm of Niagara Falls, New York, were payees and holders of the note in suit. It was a negotiable promissory note, payable to their order. It was sold before maturity to a savings bank in Detroit, under circumstances which admittedly made the bank a bona fide purchaser. It was sold to this bank by the attorney of the payees, to whom it had been sent for collection. It did not appear whether or not the payees directed such sale. The attorney indorsed the note before sale in blank, as the payees had previously done. The note went to protest for nonpayment, and subsequently it was indorsed to "any bank or order" over the signature of the savings bank, and transferred to a state bank, which sent to the savings bank its check for the amount due upon the note. Plaintiff was the cashier of the state bank, and testified that he was not the owner of the note, and had brought this action for the benefit of the bank. The defendant, who was the maker of the note, sought to show that the note was obtained by fraudulent representations made by an agent of the payees. The attorney of the payees before mentioned, called as a witness for the defendant, testified that he received the note before maturity for collection, and indorsed and sold it to the savings bank, and received payment of the consideration, which he put in the bank to his own credit, and checked out, as he did other money. That he sold the note because he wanted to, and did not know that he was directed to do so by the payees. It was shown that after protest of the note this attorney had a conversation about the note with a stockholder and director of the state bank, who was also its attorney, who said that his bank would take it. The attorney of the payees before mentioned also wrote plaintiff, who was cashier of that bank, about the note, as did also the city bank after the attorney of the payees had told its officers that the state bank, of which plaintiff was cashier, would take the note. The court permitted the jury to find that the purchase of the note by the state bank, of which plaintiff was cashier, was collusive, as agent for the payees, holding returned to D. H. Robertson." Forsting was in fact the duly authorized agent of plaintiffs to deliver to defendant the bonds mentioned and receive payment therefor. Evidence was given under objection that the word "duebill" in the receipt referred to the note in question. Evidence was excluded as to the authority of Forsting being limited to delivering the bonds and receiving payment therefor in cash. Proof was made that defendant did all that was necessary on his part to entitle him to a return of his note if the writing was binding on plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs did not know of the agreement between Forsting and defendant mentioned in the receipt until after they parted with the note as hereafter mentioned; that they received the note supposing the delivery thereof to Forsting for them was unconditional, and that upon the faith thereof they paid full value for the same to the assurance society, keeping the paper as their own property; that they thereafter parted with the note for value, but discovering defendant's attitude in respect thereto before the maturity thereof, they repurchased the paper so as to enforce it in their own names and preserve their credit; that defendant knew when he gave the note that it was negotiable and was payable to plaintiffs as principals; also that the bond, according to the contract between him and the assurance society, required payment in cash. A verdict was rendered in favor of defendant and judgment was rendered accordingly.

Messrs. Bashford, Aylward, & Spensley, for appellants:

The payees named in a negotiable instru-that, if it was not a purchaser in the ordinary sense, it would not be entitled to set up the bona fides of the savings bank, and refused to direct a verdict for the plaintiff. In considering this question on a writ of error from a judgment in favor of the defendant, the supreme court said: "The plaintiff's counsel say that, being indorsed in blank, the possession of the note was sufficient proof of plaintiff's right to sue, and that it was error to permit the jury to defeat the plaintiff upon this ground, which they may have done under the charge. In the case of Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, it was held that the payee of a note could not avoid the equities in favor of the maker by repurchasing the note from a bona fide holder, to whom he had sold it. This rule should apply in this case, if, as claimed, the transfer to the Crosswell bank [the bank of which the plaintiff was the cashier] was colorable only, to cover an actual payment or repurchase by Myers & Co. [the payees] or by their attorney on their behalf." The supreme court, however, reversed the judgment, and ordered a new trial upon another ground, etc., that the court had committed an error in charging the jury to the effect that the plaintiff had no right to bring the action. Battersbee v. Calkins (Mich.) 8 Det. L. N. 778, 87 N. W. 760.

In Clark v. McNeal, 114 N. Y. 287, 21 N. E. 405, the court after deciding that the rule that if one who has purchased real estate with full notice of an equitable claim of another thereto transfers it to a bona fide purchaser, the latter not only takes a good title, but can transfer such title to one who purchases with full knowledge of the fact, is subject to the exception where the transfer is back to the original purchaser, who was guilty of constructive fraud in transferring the property; if it becomes re-vested in him, the original equity will re-attach to it in his hands, and, quoting from Story, Eq. Jur. § 410, and Pom. Eq. Jur. § 754, in support thereof, said: "The authorities are uniform upon the subject, so far, at least, as they apply to the facts of this case," and then cited in support of the statement, among others, Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515; Dan. Neg. Inst. § 805.

This case does not relate to negotiable paper, but is one of the cases illustrating the correlative rule in regard to the rights of a bona fide purchaser of real estate from one who has full notice of the equitable claim of another thereto, and of the right of such purchaser to transfer a good title to one who purchases with full knowledge of the fact of such claim, and of the exception that the rule does not apply when the transfer is back to the original purchaser; yet as the court of appeals cited Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, which was a case relating purely to negotiable paper, it is deemed proper to insert it here both as an affirmation by the New York court of appeals of the rule laid down in Kost v. Bender, and also in support of the assertion of the statement made in the introduction hereto, that the rule and exception in regard to negotiable instruments, and the rule and exception in regard to the purchase of real property, are identical.

Section 2296, U. S. Rev. Stat. provides: "No lands acquired under the provisions of this chapter shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor."

A patent was issued to the appellee in 1878. Previous thereto he had become indebted to the appellant, who had afterward recovered a judgment against him, and an order was made by the county court reviving the judgment. The appellee brought this action, alleging facts which he claimed rendered the land exempt from liability for the satisfaction of the judgment, and praying that it be decreed to be free from the apparent lien thereof. A decree was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant and appellant appealed. The patent was issued in 1878. In 1885 the appellee, the patentee, and wife conveyed the lands to another person, who in 1886 conveyed it to the wife of the appellee. She afterward died, and the county court set aside the land in question as the homestead of her husband, the appellee. It was conceded that the land was not subject to the payment of the debt of the appellant before the appellee (the patentee) conveyed it; and that it did not become liable for the debt in the hands of his grantees; but it was urged that, having again reached him, it was liable. That while it was not liable as long as he retained it, or in the hands of anyone deriving title through him, still whenever he should acquire a new title to the land, it would then become liable. The court said: "We cannot find that the precise question has ever been determined. In the absence of direct authority, the apparent analogy of the law of commercial paper at once suggests itself. It is a familiar rule that if a negotiable instrument once reaches the hands of a bona fide holder for value, it is discharged from equities, although he should transfer it to a third person with notice of such equities; but still, if the transferee should happen to be the original payee of the instrument, it would be subject to the equities in his hands. This rule and the reasons therefor are strongly stated by Judge Cooley in Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515. By ment are bona fide holders when they accept the same innocently for a valuable consideration, although the maker may have been fraudulently induced to sign the same, unless the fraud was such as to destroy the paper as a monetary obligation.

The paper had a valid legal existence at the time it came into the hands of the plaintiffs and with no actual notice to them of any condition whatsoever.

Lytle v. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co.

examining that case it will be seen that the reasons for the rule are, that, while the protection of the innocent holder requires that those taking from him should also be protected, it is not very important that there should be one person in the world incapable of succeeding to his equities. The rule protecting innocent purchasers is for the benefit of the purchaser, and not for the benefit of the culpable payee. Against him the payor, were he compelled to pay the paper, would have his remedy by action, and to avoid circuity of action if the paper comes back to his hands, the payor should be permitted to set up the defense." The court then held that the reason for changing the rule in regard to commercial paper when it returned to the original payee was not applicable to the case before it. Brandhoefer v. Bain, 45 Neb. 781, 64 N. W. 213.

This case is taken because of its very positive indorsement of what was said by Judge Cooley in Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, in regard to the general rule, and the exception thereto which forms our subject, as applied to negotiable paper, and its statements in regard thereto are undoubtedly correct, and in a case to which they applied would be extremely appropriate; but, inasmuch as the court wound up by holding that the reason for changing the rule in regard to commercial paper when it returned to the original payee was not applicable to the case before it, it is somewhat difficult to see why the judge who delivered the opinion went into the rule in regard to negotiable paper to such length; unless it is found in his statement in the beginning that he did it in the absence of direct authority in regard to the precise question before the court.

Plaintiff conveyed to defendant an interest in patents for $10,000, and took in payment from the defendant three notes; $3,000 payable in three months, $3,500 payable in nine months and $3,500 payable in fourteen months. The note of $3,500 payable in nine months was before its maturity indorsed by the plaintiff to another person for a valuable consideration. Thereafter an arrangement was made between plaintiff and the person to whom he had transferred the note, by which the plaintiff agreed to transfer to such person certain interests in the same patents, and to take therefor the defendant's notes for $1,000, which such other person agreed to procure. Accordingly, by request of such other person and with the plaintiff's knowledge, the defendant gave as a substitute for said note of $3,500, two notes, one for $2,500 which was paid, and the note in suit, which was dated back to the day of the sale of the patents and of the three original notes. The plaintiff contended that, even if the original note of $3,500 was invalid in its inception, by reason of fraud, yet as it passed before its maturity into the hands of a bona fide holder, and as the note in suit, given in part substitution therefor, was negotiated to the plaintiff upon a new and valuable consideration, the action might be maintained; and that the last sale and transaction constituted a sufficient consideration to support the note in suit, and that the alleged frauds of the former transaction could not be used to impeach it. The trial court declined so to rule, and instructed the jury that the fact that the note had, under the circumstances of the case, passed through the hands of the third person, would not confer upon it any additional validity in the plaintiff's hands; and that if the last agreement was made in ignorance by the defendant of the fraud in the first transaction, such fraud would not be purged by the second transaction, so far as to render the note valid on its return into the hands of the original perpetrator of the fraud. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff alleged exceptions, in overruling which the supreme judicial court said: "It is urged by the counsel for the plaintiff that the defendant would have been compelled to pay the whole amount of the note in suit to the indorsee to whom the plaintiff negotiated it for value before its maturity, and that he could not have set up the ground of defense on which he now relies if an action had been brought upon it by him. This is certainly true; but we do not see that the suggestion has any material bearing on the rights of the parties to this suit. While the notes were in the hands of the indorsee, the defendant still retained his claim for damages against the present plaintiff. The transfer of the note in no way affected or impaired the right of the plaintiff to recover those damages. It affected only the form of his remedy, limiting it to a right of action against the plaintiff. But on the redelivery of the note to the plaintiff, and the commencement of an action by him to enforce it, the remedy by recoupment revived. Nor can we see that it is at all material that the plaintiff, when he took back the note in suit, paid a valuable consideration for it to the person to whom he had previously negotiated it. The rights of the defendant could not be affected by the dealings of the plaintiff with third parties with whom he had no concern. The plaintiff could not purge the fraud with which the note was tainted so as to get rid of the claim for damages on account thereof, which the defendant had against him. This still remained to be enforced, either by a separate action, or by recoupment, according as the rules of law might make either form of remedy appropriate and applicable, when the defendant sought to avail himself of it." Sawyer v. Wiswell, 9 Allen, 89.

The mere borrower of a note does not become a holder for value, and stands no better than a mere donee, and gets no superior equity to that of the payee. If in any case a partnership can take a note from one of its members free from the equities binding him, this result does not follow when the note is merely lent for the accommodation of the firm. And although, by pledging it, the pledgee might acquire the rights of a bona fide holder for value without notice, yet, upon its coming back into the firm's hands again, the equity of the maker would revive. King v. Nichols, 138 Mass. 18, citing Sawyer v. Wiswell, 9 Allen, 89.

Certain officers of a national bank, who were also officers of a real-estate corporation or company at the instance of one of them, who was the cashier of the bank, upon a pretended claim of the bank against the company of $20,000 which the evidence in the case did not sustain, procured a note for that amount with interest, and a mortgage on all of the real estate it owned to secure it, to be executed in the name of the company to a loan and trust company. The company was not indebted in any amount to the loan and trust company, but the name of the latter was used to deceive the officers of the government, who should be directed to examine into the affairs of the national bank. The pretended proceedings in the way of a resolution to execute the note and mortgage on the part of some of the officers of the company were entirely irregular and illegal although done by a majority of the directors thereof. The note was immediately indorsed without recourse to the before-named national bank, and it negotiated the note to another national bank before maturity, for value, in the usual course of trade, on two different occasions—both occasions without notice, and in good faith. The note and mortgage were afterwards taken up, and at the time of the trial were owned by the first-mentioned national bank. The relationship between the different persons, who were officers both of the company and the bank, left no doubt that the circumstances attending the contraction of the debt of $20,000 covered by the note and mortgage, and the manner in which it was executed, were known to all of them; and they were undoubtedly executed at the instance of the cashier and manager of the bank for its benefit. It was held that the receiver of the national bank, for whose benefit the note and mortgage were so executed, 54 L. R. A.

Forsting never was an agent of the company, and he did not represent himself so to be. He was a special agent with limited authority, as the defendant is presumed to have known. held the same subject to the same defenses that applied to the bank itself, and that that bank took the note and mortgage with notice of all defenses thereto. It was executed for a pretended indebtedness to a third person,—the loan and trust company,—although it was known by the parties who acted for the bank that nothing was due to the loan and trust company by the company executing the note and mortgage, and it was used to enable the bank to protect itself against loss on a debt of one of such persons. Nor was anything cured or strengthened by the negotiation of the note before maturity, as collateral security for future advances, to the other national bank, on two different occasions. It finally came back into the hands of the original payee charged with the same equities and defenses as applied to it when first issued. Hatch v. Johnson Loan & T. Co. 79 Fed. 828.

In an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to secure two promissory notes, the court found that one of the notes (both of which were tainted with usury which was a defense to them except they were held by a bona fide holder) was sold and indorsed to a national bank as collateral security for a loan made to a state bank of which the payee of the note was cashier, or to the cashier and president of the bank, they then being the sole owners of the stock in the state bank, and that such sale and indorsement were without knowledge or notice on the part of the national bank of any defense thereto, and the note was received by it as collateral security in the ordinary course of its business, and for value; that prior to the purchase of such note by the plaintiff it had been returned to another national bank, or to the president and cashier of the state bank. Upon the organization of the national bank last mentioned the president of the state bank was made president thereof and the cashier of the state bank vice president thereof. The note was purchased by the plaintiff after the maturity thereof, and he paid a valuable consideration therefor and its full market value, and purchased or obtained it from the last-mentioned national bank, or of its president and vice president, who were as aforesaid respectively president and cashier of the state bank, the latter of whom was the payee of the note. The trial court found that at the time of the purchase he was chargeable with full notice of the consideration for which the note was given, and the testimony showed that it was returned to the president of the state bank and the cashier (the payee) by the national bank, to whom it was negotiated before maturity before the plaintiff obtained it. The principal is not bound by the unauthorized acts of a special agent, or by the acts of a general agent which are beyond the scope of his authority.

Kelly v. Troy F. Ins. Co. 3 Wis. 254;

the supreme court held that the plaintiff purchased the note of the payee, and not from the national bank, who was a bona fide holder, and, having purchased the note after maturity from the payee, he was not an innocent holder, but took the paper subject to the same defenses that existed between the original parties thereto. Koehler v. Dodge, 31 Neb. 329, 47 N. W. 913.

In Eckbert v. Ellis, 26 Hun. 668, Hardin, J., in delivering the opinion of the general term of the supreme court in holding that a purchaser of a promissory note before or after its maturity may avail himself of the title of his assignor, after quoting from Field, J., in Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 59, 24 L. ed. 686, "that whenever negotiable paper has passed into the hands of a party unaffected by previous infirmities, its character as an available security is established, and its holder can transfer it to others with like immunity," said: "There is one exception to this rule, which arises where the purchase is made by the original payee, as he is not entitled to the protection which the rule gives to the innocent indorsee or purchaser."

Plaintiff, as agent of a corporation engaged in manufacturing grain separators, sold to defendant a separator for threshing small grain, for which the notes sued on were executed. There was a general warranty that the machine properly handled would thresh and clean grain as well as any other separator of like size. The notes in suit were executed by the defendant and assigned to the plaintiff before maturity. The notes were indorsed by him to a national bank, but were afterward, and before the commencement of the action, reindorsed to the bank by appellant. (It would seem that the last is a misstatement, and that it should read, "reindorsed by the bank to appellant.") The defendant alleged a breach of the warranty, and that the plaintiff knew it at the time he purchased the notes. The defense prevailed, and judgment was entered against the plaintiff. On appeal therefrom it was contended on the part of the appellant that, even if it should be held that there was a failure of consideration by reason of the breach of the warranty, then such defense could not prevail, because appellant, when he received the notes from the bank, received them purged of all defense. Held that a party having full knowledge of the defense which a maker may have to a promissory note at the time he received it, may not purge it of an equitable defense by merely assigning the notes to a third party and receiving them back at a subsequent time. Dollarhide v. Hopkins, 72 Ill. App. 509.

Mr. H. W. Chynoweth, for respondent:

Andrews & Smith are not bona fide holders of this note and never have been. They deposited in the bank and got it discounted, if at all, with full knowledge that the note was not theirs and could not be until Robertson had accepted the delivery of the bonds as his property. If they paid the company money, they did it knowing that of an estate of which the president of the corporation was the executor, who thereafter indorsed it as such executor, and it was then indorsed by the plaintiff, who alleged that he was an accommodation indorser for the defendant at its request, and that the defendant did not pay the note, and the plaintiff was compelled to and did, pay to the national bank, the owner and holder of the note, the amount of it. A supplemental affidavit of defense made by the manager of the corporation stated, among other things, that the corporation was not indebted to the estate, which was the payee of the note, in any sum whatever; but, on the contrary, such estate was indebted to the defendant for more than the amount of the note, and that both the executor and the plaintiff well knew these facts; and that the note was made in pursuance of an arrangement between the executor and the plaintiff for the purpose of borrowing a large amount of money with which to pay a debt owing by the decedent whose estate was payee, to the receiver of another corporation, and that the plaintiff well knew, at and before the making of the note, that the defendant was not indebted to the estate of the decedent, and that he was not a bona fide holder of said note, but an accommodation indorser with full knowledge of all said facts before he indorsed said note and before he procured possession of the same. A rule for judgment for want of sufficient affidavit of defense was made absolute by the judge before whom the matter was argued, he holding that no facts were set out which would constitute a defense against recovery on the note at the suit of the bank. That the plaintiff, who was an accommodation indorser, could not have resisted the payment at the suit of the bank against him upon his indorsement. He was compelled to pay the bank. That the want of consideration and the fraud in the original transaction, alleged by the defendant, could not have availed him as indorser, or the defendant as maker, as against the bank. Having been compelled to pay, the plaintiff succeeded to the right of the bank, and was affected by such equities as it was affected by, and by none other. On a writ of error the judgment was reversed, the supreme court holding that, even if the bank was a bona fide holder, judgment could not be entered in favor of the plaintiff, in the face of the supplemental affidavit that he knew of and was a party to the fraudulent arrangement by which the note was made. The bona fide title of a holder protects all subsequent holders, as a general rule; but this protection does not extend to a party to the original fraud. Erie Boot & Shoe Co. v. Elchenlaub, 127 Pa. 164, 17 Atl. 889.

Plaintiffs were the agents of a manufacturer

the note had not yet taken effect, as they were bound by the knowledge of their agent. If the company has been paid money on these policies, appellants can recover it back. They have lost nothing by the transaction, they gave no consideration for this note, they are in the law parties to the whole transaction as it took place, just as though they made the agreement with Robertson themselves, and they cannot put themselves in an attitude under those circumstances where they can take advantage of their own wrong.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The view we take of this case renders it unnecessary to consider the question of whether the instrument sued on ever became the promissory note of respondent.

of guano, and as such, by their local agent, sold to the defendant a lot of guano, and warranted the same to be a good fertilizer, taking a note for the price payable to themselves. Afterwards, before the note became due, they became the real owners of the note by arrangement between themselves and the manufacturer. It was held that the plaintiffs were not such bona fide purchasers without notice of defendant's note as that defendant could not set up as a plea that the guano was of no value, even though it was not shown that plaintiffs knew it to be of no value at the time they became the real owners of the note. Bolt v. Whitehead, 50 Ga. 76.

P. sold a boat to E., May 8, 1889. E. mortgaged to P. on the same day. E. sold to B. some time thereafter. B. sold to a corporation, January 17, 1890. P.'s mortgage from E. was recorded March 6, 1890. The corporation sold to W. March 7, 1890, and the bill of sale was recorded March 8, 1890. Upon the same day W. gave his note at thirty days and mortgage to B., and the mortgage was duly recorded. B. sold this note and mortgage to O. March 28, 1890, before the note had fallen due. B. had notice of the P. mortgage when he bought from E. It did not appear that the corporation had any notice of that mortgage when it bought from B., and at that time the mortgage was not recorded. The court held that it was clear that the corporation was a bona fide purchaser of the boat from B., and, as its title was recorded before the P. mortgage was recorded, it did not take subject to that mortgage. It had neither actual nor constructive notice of the existence of that lien. Whether W. had notice of the lien or not, he took all the right in the boat which the corporation could convey, and therefore he also held his title to the boat free from the P. mortgage. When W. conveyed to B. the title to the boat as a mortgagee vested in him who had been guilty of the original fraud in selling a boat, which he knew to be mortgaged, free from that mortgage. As against him, P.'s equity was revived, and B. held the mortgage on the boat subject and junior to the P. mortgage. It was held, further, that O. was bound to know that if B., with actual notice of the P. mortgage, had sold the boat to the corporation free from the mortgage, the subsequent revesting of the title in B. would revive the equity which P. held against B. when he first purchased the boat from E., and would give P.'s mortgage priority over B.'s and that it therefore followed that O.'s position in receiving a mortgage from B. was exactly the same as if neither the corporation nor W. had intervened in the chain of title, for he was 54 L. R. A.

Conceding that it did, it is not enforceable in the hands of plaintiffs if the condition on which it was delivered to their agent, Forsting, is binding upon them, upon the ground that they are not bona fide holders of the paper. What that condition was is too clear for controversy. It was competent to show that the word "duebill," found in the receipt given by Forsting, referred to the note, upon the plainest principles of evidence; so there can be no question but that the delivery of the note was made upon condition that if respondent elected to and did return the bonds as not satisfactory, within thirty days, it should be delivered back to him.

It is said appellants became the bona fide holders of the note because they paid full value therefor to their principal without notice of the condition upon which it was bound to know that he could get from B. nothing more than a title affected by the same equity, in favor of the P. mortgage with which B.'s original title was affected. The W. B. Cole, 8 C. C. A. 78, 16 U. S. App. 334, 59 Fed. 183.

In 1882 the British Parliament passed an act to codify the law relating to bills of exchange, cheques, and promissory notes (45 & 46 Vict. chap. 61), in which it was provided, among other things:

Sec. 29. (1). A holder in due course is a holder who has taken a bill, complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions, namely:

(a) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonored, if such was the fact.

(b) That he took the bill in good faith and for value, and that, at the time the bill was negotiated to him, he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it.

(2) In particular the title of a person who negotiates a bill is defective within the meaning of this act when he obtained the bill, or the acceptance, by fraud, duress, or force and fear, or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration, or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud.

(3) A holder (whether for value or not), who derives his title to a bill through a holder in due course, and who is not himself a party to any fraud or illegality affecting it, has all the rights of that holder in due course, as regards the acceptor and all parties to the bill prior to that holder.

The foregoing sections all apply to bills of exchange, but by § 89 of the same act it is provided that their provisions apply to promissory notes.

In 1897 a uniform negotiable instruments act, copied substantially from the English act above mentioned, revised and amended by the conference of commissioners on uniform state laws, became a law in the states of Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, and New York. In 1900 eleven other states, and by act of Congress the District of Columbia, had adopted the same act.

It would seem from the foregoing that in Great Britain and in the fifteen states mentioned and in the District of Columbia the general rule as herein alluded to, and the exception to that rule which forms the subject of the note, have been confirmed and adopted by statute.

taken for them by Forsting. True, they did not have actual notice of such condition, but by well-settled principles of law they had constructive notice, if what Forsting did was within the actual or apparent scope of his agency; and if it was not, they are chargeable just the same and are bound accordingly, because they insisted on reaping the benefit of his transaction after having knowledge of the facts. Upon receiving such knowledge, if they did not intend to ratify such transaction, they should have promptly repudiated it and offered to return the note. McDermott v. Jackson, 97 Wis. 64, 72 N. W. 375; Wilson v. Groelle, 83 Wis. 530, 53 N. W. 900; Perkins v. Boothby, 71 Me. 91; First Nat. Bank v. Oberne, 121 Ill. 25, 7 N. E. 85; Mechem, Agency, § 167.

The further claim is made that plaintiffs are bona fide holders of the paper because they purchased it from their indorsee, who was an innocent holder thereof, paying full value therefor, and that the trial court erred in refusing to permit proof of such repurchase for value. In that, they invoke the familiar common-law rule, which has recently been added to the statute law of the state, § 1676-23, chap. 356, Laws 1899, that the holder of commercial paper may recover on the strength of the title of a precedent innocent holder, regardless of knowledge on his part of fraud which would defeat it in the hands of the payee named therein. Verbeck v. Scott, 71 Wis. 59, 64, 36 N. W. 600. That rule is stated in the books, particularly in judicial opinions, generally, in such a way as to lead one astray who is not familiar with the law on the subject, as to the extent of its application. It is not a universal rule. It does not apply to a case like this, where the payee of the paper, being so circumstanced at the start that he cannot recover thereon, transfers it to an innocent third party for value, and subsequently purchases it back for value. Under such circumstances the payee cannot lean for support on the innocence of his vendee. His position is the same when he comes into possession of the paper the second time as when he first possessed it. One would say that must be the law without reference to authority; otherwise a person might become possessed of the promissory note of another by the grossest of frauds and by selling it to an innocent third person for value and subsequently repurchasing it enforce the same against the maker. The law contains no such open door as that for the successful perpetration of fraud. Tod v. Wick Bros. 36 Ohio St. 370; Sawyer v. Wiswell, 9 Allen, 39; Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 518; Vorce v. Rosenberg, 12 Neb. 448, 11 N. W. 879; Charitan Plow Co. v. Davidson, 16 Neb. 374, 20 N. W. 256; Camp v. Sturdevant, 16 Neb. 693, 21 N. W. 449. We are unable to find that the rule contended for by appellants has ever been applied to a case like this. If authority to that effect could be found, we would be compelled to reject it as out of harmony with the settled law on the subject and contrary to every principle of justice upon which the law is founded.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

FIDELITY & CASUALTY COMPANY,
Plff. in Err.,
v.

T. H. FREEMAN, Admr., etc., of C. C. H.
Burton, Deceased.

(48 C. C. A. 692, 109 Fed. 847.)

1. Suicide of the insured is not so conclusively shown as to require the taking of an action on the policy from the jury, by evidence that, having been upon a train, he was found by the side of the track mortally wounded, that for some time he had been in straitened financial circumstances, his property being heavily encumbered and about to be sold, that he had failed in an attempt to effect a loan, had been guilty of forgery and false representations for which he was threatened with prosecution, and had recently been making efforts to secure as much accident insurance as possible, where it also appears that he had four daughters dependent upon him for support, for whom he had a strong affection, was a man of sanguine temperament, accustomed to carry considerable insurance, and that his property sold for enough to pay all his debts.

2. The refusal to instruct the jury that the burden of proving that the insured did not come to his death through causes from liability for which the policy excepts the insurer is upon the one suing on the policy cannot be questioned for the first time on appeal.

3. A new action is not brought by the substitution of plaintiff as administrator with the will annexed after the finding and probate of the will, for himself as simple administrator, in an action on an insurance policy, so as to give the insurer the benefit of the expiration of the time limited for the bringing of the suit, which occurs before the substitution is made.

4. A statute is not void for granting special rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, which, by not being applicable to companies doing business on the assessment plan, thereby exempts them from a provision that false representations in applications for life or casualty insurance shall not avoid the policy unless made with actual intent to deceive, or unless they increase the risk.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

Statement by Severens, Circuit Judge:

This is an action at law, removed into the court below from the circuit court for Wilson county, Tennessee, upon the petition of the above-named plaintiff in error. The plaintiff sued as the administrator of C. C. H. Burton, deceased, to recover upon an accident policy issued to the said Burton March 26, 1896, in the sum of $2,500, in case of death, with provision for a weekly indemnity for injuries not resulting in death; the policy to be in force for one year. Injuries self-inflicted, whether resulting fatally or not, were excluded by the terms of the policy. So, also, were all injuries received "while or in consequence of" the insured being affected by (among other things) "vertigo, fits, or any disease or bodily infirmity." One of the conditions was that "no suit should be brought upon the policy unless begun within six months from the time of death or other injury. The insured came to his death on the 8th of September, 1896, from injuries received by him from falling off, or throwing himself off, a railroad train on the 4th of the same month. Freeman was appointed administrator of his estate by the proper probate court, and qualified as such, it being then supposed that Burton died intestate. Upon a representation that the estate was insolvent, the administration thereof was removed under a provision of a state statute into the chancery court. The insurance company having denied its liability, Freeman brought this suit in January, 1897, having received his letters of administration. On April 19, 1897, a will made by Burton, which had meantime been discovered, was probated, and it was ordered that letters testamentary be issued to Freeman, as administrator with the will annexed, and on the same day he qualified as such. But on the 26th of April, 1897, in the proceeding pending in the chancery court, the heirs and distributees of Burton entered into an agreement that the will should "be set aside, and for nothing held, and that the estate of said Burton shall be settled as if no will was ever probated." Thereupon the chancery court, reciting this agreement, ordered that it be "in all things confirmed and approved, and is made the decree of this court. The estate of said C. C. H. Burton will be settled in accordance with said agreement, and without any reference to the will, which has been probated." Meantime, by leave of the court, the declaration in the present suit was amended by making Freeman, as administrator with the will annexed, a party plaintiff in the case, and it was ordered that "this cause will hereafter proceed in the name of Freeman in his double capacity of administrator and of administrator with the will annexed." To the maintenance of the suit the insurance company interposed several defenses, as follows: (1) That the deceased came to his death by suicide; (2) that, for aught that appeared, the defendant's falling off the train was in consequence of vertigo, fits, or some disease or bodily infirmity; (3) that the suit abated upon the probating of the will of the deceased and the appointment of Freeman as administrator with the will annexed, and that upon the amendment of the declaration by bringing in Freeman as administrator with the will annexed a new suit was brought, and this more than six months after the death of the assured. Another question arose upon the pleadings, involving the effect of the representations made by the deceased upon which the policy in suit was issued. The 22d section of chapter 160 of the Acts of Tennessee, passed in 1895, entitled "An Act to Govern and Regulate the Business of Insurance, Other Than Life and Casualty Insurance upon the Assessment Plan, and to Repeal All Laws, or Parts of Laws, in Conflict with This Act," is as follows: "No written or oral misrepresentation or warranty therein, made in the negotiation of a contract or policy of insurance, or in the application therefor by the assured, or in his behalf, shall be deemed material, or defeat or void the policy, or prevent its attaching, unless such misrepresentation is made with actual intent to deceive, or unless the matter represented increases the risk of loss." For the insurance company it was contended that this statute was unwarranted class legislation, and was unconstitutional. These are the four principal points here presented for review. The case was tried before a jury. At the close of the testimony the defendant prayed for an instruction from the court that a verdict should be rendered in its favor upon the ground that it was clearly established that the death of the insured was by suicide. This instruction was refused, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The insurance company brings the case here on writ of error.

Argued before Lurton, Day, and Severens, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Albert D. Marks, for plaintiff in error:

The court should have directed a verdict in favor of plaintiff in error, the evidence showing that the decedent came to his death by suicide, and not by accident, within the meaning of the policy.

The burden of proof was on the defendant in error to show that the injuries were not received as the result of decedent's falling from the train in consequence of vertigo, fits, or any disease or bodily infirmity.

The discovery and probate of the will revoked the grant of the letters of administration, and the suit could not be continued by T. H. Freeman as administrator; and, there being no privity between the titles which he took in his two representative capacities, his suit as administrator cannot inure to the benefit of himself as administrator with the will annexed; and the amendment allowing him to maintain the suit in the latter capacity does not relate to the suing out of the summons, but requires the suit to be taken as having been instituted on the date of the amendment.

The amendment permitting T. H. Freeman to sue in his new capacity as administrator with the will annexed was certainly an amendment changing the form of action, and its effect must be restricted to the time when it was allowed.

Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. Healy, 30 C. C. A. 11, 57 U. S. App. 513, 86 Fed. 245.

Severens, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is contended that the evidence established beyond doubt that the deceased committed suicide, and that the court should, for that reason, have instructed the jury that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The evidence upon which this peremptory instruction was asked tended to show that for some time prior to his death Burton had been in straitened financial circumstances; that his property was heavily encumbered; that his house, which was mortgaged, and his personal property, which had been seized on execution, were about to be sold; that he had just before been making strenuous efforts to borrow money to tide him over his distress, but had failed; that he had forged a mortgage, and the certificate of acknowledgment thereof, on which he had made an attempt to borrow money; that he had, a year before, borrowed money upon false representations in regard to the freedom of his property from encumbrances; that he was being threatened with prosecution for these offenses; that he had four daughters living at home with him, who were dependent upon him for support; and that just before his death he had been making efforts to secure as much accident insurance as possible in addition to that which he was then carrying, and had succeeded in effecting enough to make in all $16,000. But it was also shown that he was a man of sanguine temperament, that he had been accustomed to keep considerable insurance upon his life and against accidents, and that after his death his property sold for enough to pay off all his debts. At the time of his death he was returning home from an ineffectual effort to raise money to save his home and personal property from forced sale. He was last seen before his injury upon the platform of the car on which he was riding, and not long afterwards was found by the side of the track, mortally injured. No doubt these circumstances, taken together, were well calculated to excite grave suspicion that the assured had thrown himself from the train with intent to destroy himself, but they were by no means conclusive; nor did they so clearly demonstrate that conclusion as to compel the finding by the jury that it must be so. Taking into account, in connection with all the circumstances above enumerated, the common instinct of mankind to hold on to life, and his strong affection for his daughters, and his earnest purpose to care for and protect them, we cannot say that it would be unreasonable to conclude that the death of the assured was accidental, and not purposed. It was a question upon which the minds of jurors might fairly be convinced that the fact was one way or the other. The legal presumption was against the fact of suicide, and the burden of proof was upon the insurer. In these circumstances there was no error in refusing the instruction requested.

2. It is further contended here that the jury should have been instructed that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to prove that the deceased did not come to his death in consequence of, or while suffering from, vertigo, fits, or other disease. But we are unable to find in the record any request by the plaintiff in error to instruct the jury upon this point, or any exception to such part of the charge as might inferentially imply the contrary of what is now insisted upon as the correct theory upon the subject. This being so, the question is not before us. It is useless to cite authority upon a proposition so well settled. Moreover, the bill of exceptions indicates that, when the case came to go to the jury, it was, without objection by either party, reduced by the court, so far as the facts were involved, to the single question whether the assured came to his death by suicide or not.

3. Another supposed error assigned is that the probate of the will revoked the plaintiff's letters of administration, and that the amendment by which he was permitted to proceed with the case as administrator with the will annexed operated to the effect of enabling him to bring a new suit, and that the six months allowed for bringing the action had expired before the amendment was made. If this question had arisen upon the early common law of England, it might be attended with difficulty on account of the widely different character of an executor from that of an administrator at that time. The executor derived his authority from the will. He was not an officer of the court, but was regarded as a trustee for the purposes declared by the testator, and could, before probate, do nearly all things required for the settlement of the estate except that he could not bring suits in the courts. The probate was for the purpose of definitely determining his character, and establishing it once for all, and enabling him to make profert of his authority in the manner required by the practice of the courts. Ordinary administration was in derogation of his rights as executor, which could not be thus taken away. And it was at one time held that such an administration was void upon the subsequent production and probate of a will. But later on the rule was modified so as to apply only to those cases in which administration had actually deprived the executor of some right, and not to those cases in which only the rights of other persons interested in the estate were concerned, in which latter case the administration was voidable only. In this country the rule itself has been much further restricted, if not obliterated, by the effect of statutory regulations in all the states in regard to the settlement of estates of deceased persons. Here, for all the purposes of administering the estate, an executor is charged with the same duties as an administrator, although quite frequently he is, in addition, a trustee for certain purposes expressed by the testator. But those purposes are always subordinated to the paramount rights of creditors. Contrary to the English doctrine, he is here an officer of the court for the purpose of administering the estate, and cannot act without the sanction of his appointment by the probate court. Subject to certain limitations imposed by public policy, the testator may direct the disposition of his estate, and then the executor distributes the property according to the will, while an administrator distributes according to the statute. For the ordinary purposes of recovering the assets of the estate, the right and the method of procedure are precisely alike, whether of an administrator or an executor, and the same defenses may be made by the debtor. An administrator differs from an administrator with the will annexed, not in respect to his right to collect debts due to the estate, but only in respect to the disposition of the assets. Each represents the estate in all controversies with its debtors. If, before the discovery of a will, administration is granted and proceeded with, that which is done before the probate is valid and effectual for the purposes of administration. Upon the probate of the will, the executor takes up the settlement of the estate where the administrator left it, and proceeds with the administration according to law; the will, by consent of the law, supplying some part of the method by which he shall dispose of the estate; the court in the meantime giving such directions as are expedient for disposing of the assets, and as the law combined with the purpose of the testator require. Though the executor thus coming in is not in privity with the administrator in the sense that he receives the title by devolution of the estate from the latter, yet he is, to use the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Buttrick v. King, 7 Met. 20, "his successor in the trust," and is bound by what he has done in the lawful execution of the powers of his appointment. The cause of action in the suit which Freeman brought as administrator was the identical cause of action which continued upon his appointment as administrator with the will annexed. No other modification of the suit took place, except that a peculiar characteristic was added to the status of the plaintiff. This affected him only as it touched the disposition of what he should collect. The issues remained the same. The proof in support and in defense of the claim would be the same, and the recovery would be held by him as the representative of the estate, and subject to the orders of the court. By the terms of the policy the sum insured was payable "to the legal representative of the assured." Freeman was at all times the representative of the assured, and payment to him by the insurance company, whether before or after the amendment of the declaration, would have been a clear acquittance of the liability. In the case of Randolph v. Barrett, 16 Pet. 138. 10 L. ed. 914, suit was brought against the defendant as administrator. He pleaded in abatement that he was not administrator, but was the executor of the will of the deceased. Thereupon the plaintiff moved to amend by striking out of the writ and declaration the words "administrator of all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of Algernon S. Randolph, at the time of his death, who died intestate," and inserting "executor of the last will and testament of Algernon S. Randolph, deceased." The motion was granted, and the cause proceeded to judgment. The defendant sued out a writ of error, relying upon the ground that the amendment was improperly allowed. But the court said that, "whether he acted in one character or the other, he held the assets of the testator or intestate in trust for the creditors," and held that there was sufficient in the record to amend by, but that, independently of this, it was authorized by the 32d section of the act of 1789, which allows amendments of process and pleadings; that the granting of the amendment disposed of the plea in abatement; and that the amendment was properly allowed. It is obvious that the court regarded the cause of action as the continuing subject of the suit, and that the change in the official character of the defendant did not essentially affect it. If this be so as to a defendant, the reason is still stronger for its application to the case of a plaintiff, for in the latter case the position of the defendant is in no wise affected. The case referred to not only has the weight of authority, but is in harmony with later decisions, which have tended more and more to free the subject from the embarrassments which followed the attempt to carry the technicalities of the English doctrine into a system where, by the operation of statutes, an executor becomes an officer of the court, and as such administers the estate under the orders of the court in precisely the same way as an administrator does, except in respect to the specific trusts which the testator has designated, and which the law permits the executor to carry out. The defendant in such a case as this has no concern with those. It would be sacrificing justice to the merest form to permit the defendant to maintain this defense, where, in ignorance of the fact that there was a will, which might change the ultimate disposition of the fund, the suit had been lawfully brought within the time prescribed by the policy.

The Tennessee cases relied upon—Croft v. Cothran, 2 Sneed, 492, and Flatley v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 9 Heisk. 230—are not in point. In the former case the plaintiff had been permitted by amendment to change his suit from one in assumpsit to one in debt. Different defenses are open upon differing pleas in the one form of action from those in the other, and usually different limitations for actions are prescribed. In the other case a suit had been brought by a party who had no right at all to sue, and by the amendment a new party, who, in fact, had the right of action, was brought in. It is easy to see that there was no continuity of the cause of action, for none had existed during the time when the suit was by the former plaintiff. Other cases in Tennessee seem to hold that, if the cause of action continues, the variation of the position of the respective parties in relation to the right to pursue it would not abate it, and that in such case the suit would be deemed to have been commenced at the time when it was originally brought. See Nance v. Thompson, 1 Sneed, 321; Augusta Mfg. Co. v. Ver-trees, 4 Lea, 75; Burgie v. Parks, 11 Lea, 84. In the latter case a suit was brought against one of two executors upon a covenant of the testator. Pending the suit, and after the statute of limitations had run, the plaintiff was allowed to bring in the other executor by amendment. He pleaded the statute, but it was held that, the cause of action being the same, the amendment related to the commencement of the suit, and that the plea was not maintainable. It will be noticed that in that case the form in which the suit proceeded was changed to an action against two defendants jointly, but that, as here, the essential character and purpose of the suit were preserved. In Person v. Fidelity & C. Co. 35 C. C. A. 117, 92 Fed. 965, an administrator appointed by the probate court, who had given bond, but had not fully qualified, commenced a suit upon a policy of the company issued to the decedent. His appointment was afterwards canceled, and Person was appointed administrator, and by the order of the court in which the suit was pending was substituted as plaintiff. The defendant moved to dismiss the suit upon the ground, among others, that the policy required the suit to be begun within six months from the time of the death, and that Person had no standing in court until he was substituted as plaintiff, which was more than six months after the death of the assured. This motion was granted, the suit was dismissed, and the plaintiff brought a writ of error to this court. The judgment was reversed. Judge Thompson delivering the opinion of the court, in answer to the objection that the suit was illegally brought by the administrator in violation of a statute of the state, and conferred no jurisdiction upon the court, after referring to § 4589 of Shannon's Code (Tenn.), which reads as follows: "No civil suit shall be dismissed for want of necessary parties, or on account of the form of action or want of proper averment in the pleadings, but the courts shall have the power to change the form of action, strike out or insert in the writ and pleadings the names of either plaintiffs or defendants, so as to have the proper parties before the court, and to allow all proper averments to be supplied, upon such terms, as to continuances, as the court, in its sound discretion, may see proper to impose,"—says: "The question is not whether the suit could have been maintained in Lee's name, nor whether Lee was guilty of a misdemeanor in bringing the suit, but whether it should abate because of Lee's want of authority to prosecute it. . . . The defendant was in court to answer to a cause of action in favor of the estate of Hudson, which could only be prosecuted by the administrator of the estate; and, Person having been appointed and qualified as such administrator in the place and stead of Lee, . . . the court substituted him for Lee as plaintiff in the case."

The present case is distinguishable from that class of cases of which Sicard v. Davis, 6 Pet. 124, 8 L. ed. 342, is a leading one. That case was an action of ejectment. The plaintiff laid his demise as one from Sicard. He was permitted to amend by substituting a demise from other parties, who had derived title from Sicard's grantor before the grant to Sicard. This was permitting the plaintiff to assert a different title, depending upon the determination of wholly new issues. It was substituting a new cause of action. A comparison of this case with that of Randolph v. Barrett, 16 Pet. 138, 10 L. ed. 914, develops the distinction between the cases where, by an amendment, a new cause of action is asserted, and those where the amendment rests upon the cause of action which is already the subject of the suit, and is designed to facilitate the prosecution of the suit to a determination of its merits. We think that in the present case, the cause of action remaining the same, that the modification of the representative character of the plaintiff did not destroy the continuity of his representation; that the suit in which the judgment was rendered was therefore a continuation of the one originally commenced, and not a new one begun at the time when the declaration was amended.

There is another view upon which it should seem that the defense founded on the limitation of the time contained in the policy within which suit must be brought ought not to be sustained. When the contract of insurance was made, the company knew (as it must be presumed) that the law of Tennessee provided that in the suit which it required to be brought the court would be authorized to permit new parties to be brought in by amendment. It was in the contemplation of the parties that this might happen, and it could not have been expected that such a suit would not be subject to the general regulation applicable to all suits. Now, the statute was enacted for the very purpose of mending all such defects in the constitution of the suit as would permit it to go on to judgment, and one of such defects was that of proper parties. Manifestly, it was intended that the suit should continue, and not abate. If the parties are held bound to have contemplated such a contingency as the exercise of the power of the court to permit the amendment, the defendant ought not now to be heard to say that a suit lawfully brought to recover upon this policy for the benefit of the estate should be defeated by the event which made the amendment necessary and proper. It would be difficult to conceive of a case where such an amendment would be more just and proper. The defendant imposed a short limitation. By it the suit could not be brought within three months, but must be within six months. Its object, as we must suppose, was to enable the company to gather the evidence, and prepare for its defense, while the matter was fresh, and to have a speedy determination of its liability. This object was accomplished by the commencement of the suit, and it was a suit which, when begun, suffered no delays which were not incident to other suits which might be brought in the same court. If such an amendment could not be made except with the consequences of a new suit, then brought, the defendant in such a case would escape all liability if it should happen that the will should not be found within six months after the death of the insured, unless the administrator should have brought suit and enforced collection within the three months allowed by the policy for that purpose. We see no difficulty in holding that the suit required by the policy to be brought intended a suit subject to the exercise of the power of the court to remodel it as the law permitted and justice should require.

4. A question was raised by the defendant upon the pleadings in respect to the effect of the alleged falsity of the misrepresentation of the assured in his application for insurance that he had never had fits or disorders of the brain; the contention of the defendant being that, whether or not the representation was made with an actual intent to deceive, or the existence of the fact increased the risk of loss, the falsity of the representation defeated the policy. This contention was made upon the ground that § 22 of chapter 180 of the Acts of Tennessee of 1895, declaring that such misrepresentation, if not made with intent to deceive, and the matter thereof did not increase the risk of loss, should not be deemed material, or make the policy void, was in violation of § 8 of article 11 of the Constitution of Tennessee, which reads as follows: "The legislature shall have no power to suspend any general law for the benefit of any particular individual, nor to pass any law for the benefit of individuals inconsistent with the general laws of the land; nor to pass any law granting to any individual, or individuals, rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, other than such as may be by the same law extended to any member of the community who may be able to bring himself within the provisions of such law."

The ruling of the court, as we gather from the record, upheld the validity of the statute, and this ruling is now assigned as error. It is insisted that the statute in question is "a partial law, and vicious class legislation," because, as is said, it exempts from its burdens life and casualty insurance companies conducted on the assessment plan. But the gravamen of the complaint is rather that the statute imposes a burden upon this insurance company which is not imposed upon other companies engaged in a similar business, and it is charged that the classification of life and casualty insurance companies doing business on the assessment plan on one hand and mutual fire insurance companies, life and casualty insurance, and all other insurance companies on the other, and denying a privilege to one which it gives to the other class, is without any imaginable reason or justification. In so far as the law can be said to cast a burden upon mutual fire insurance companies which it lifts from "mutual life and casualty insurance companies," the mutual fire insurance companies themselves are the only companies who are in a position enabling them to raise the objection, if it be one. The defendant in the court below, not being a mutual fire insurance company, has no legitimate ground for complaint that another company is unjustly burdened. Only the party injuriously affected by unconstitutional legislation can be heard to allege its invalidity. The question, therefore, comes to this: whether it was competent for the legislature to change the rule of law in respect to the liability of a casualty company insuring for a fixed premium upon its policies thereafter to be issued, without at the same time imposing the same liability upon the contracts of mutual life and casualty companies. And we are of opinion that it was. Legislation is not open to the objection here made, provided it affects all persons alike who are within the description of those mentioned in the statute. The decisions of the Supreme Court upon that clause of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which forbids the denial by any state to any person within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws are strictly pertinent, there being a close similitude between that clause and the provision of the Tennessee Constitution in question. Those decisions are very numerous, and illustrate the subject by many examples. We cite at random a few of the cases, which sufficiently indicate the general doctrine. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. ed. 552, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609. In the last of these, many of the recent cases are collected. The rule declared in those cases in respect to the extent to which discrimination in classifying the objects of legislation may rightfully proceed is the same as that which we think applicable to the case before us. What this declaration of the Constitution of Tennessee means is that no discrimination shall be made in respect of burdens and privileges between persons whose interests and relations to the general public are so far identical that they would be affected in the same way by legislation which should comprehend all such persons. The division of such persons into classes, and making one law respecting burdens and privileges for one class, and a different one in regard to the same subjects for another class, would be purely arbitrary, and it is such discrimination that the Constitution forbids. We accept the doctrine as stated and approved by the supreme court of Tennessee in Stratton Claimants v. Morris Claimants, 89 Tenn. 497, 534, sub nom. Dibrell v. Lanier, 12 L. R. A. 70, 80, 15 S. W. 87, 97, "that whether a statute be public or private, general or special in form, if it attempts to create distinctions and classifications between the citizens of the state, the basis of such classification must be natural, and not arbitrary." But the power of classification will be upheld when such classification proceeds upon a difference which has a reasonable relation to the object sought to be accomplished. The distinction between insurance for a fixed premium, where the parties have no community of interest, and mutual insurance, where the insured is also the insurer, and shares in the management of his company, participates in the making of its by-laws, whereby the terms of its contracts with its members are prescribed, where the insurance is at its actual cost, and no profits taken out by a stranger, is not arbitrary. The nature and the incidents of the business of the two methods vary greatly. The laws of Tennessee in regard to mutual insurance companies contained provisions which are common to those of many of the states, and under which the relations of the member and the company were those above described. The legislature might well think it not unreasonable that the members of such associations should be left to determine for themselves whether they would adhere to the common-law doctrine in respect to the consequences of a misrepresentation of facts though made without any fraudulent purpose, and there was no increase of the risk by the untruth of the representation, or whether they would adopt the rule which the legislature proceeded to lay down upon that subject in respect to companies insuring upon the other plan. The rule itself was undoubtedly prescribed from a sense of the harshness of the former doctrine, and was designed to prevent the less astute of the parties from falling into a pit through having mistakenly made some representation the falsity of which did not increase the risk of loss. It is of a kind not uncommon in legislation for alleviating the perils to which the insured is often exposed. In mutual insurance the insured determines for himself whether he will expose his insurance to such hazard as would ensue from an incorrect representation. It was said by the Supreme Court, in considering the obligatory effect upon a member of one of the articles of a mutual insurance company, in Korn v. Mutual Assur. Soc. 6 Cranch, 192, 3 L. ed. 195, that, "whether [it was] just or unjust, reasonable or unreasonable, . . . to all concerned, was certainly a mere matter of speculation, proper for the consideration of the society, and which no individual is at liberty to complain of, as he is bound to consider it as his own individual act. Every member in fact stands in the peculiar situation of being party of both sides,—insurer and insured."

We think there was enough of dissimilarity in the character of the business of insurance for a fixed premium and that of mutual insurance to justify the legislature in laying down a rule regulating the former without also imposing it upon the latter. These views lead to an affirmance of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

TENNESSEE CENTRAL RAILWAY.

1. A state may provide for bringing before the court by publication non-residents claiming liens upon a railroad located within its jurisdiction, in a suit to wind up the railroad corporation and free its property from liens.
2. A purchaser of a railroad under a decree in a creditors' suit may intervene in a suit to enforce a construction lien upon the property by sale of the section to which it applies, to enforce its right to be relieved from the threatened sale, by which the unity of the railroad will be broken.
3. A section of a railroad cannot be sold under a decree of court, separate from the franchises, for the purpose of enforcing a contractor's lien.

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Middle District of Tennessee in favor of complainant in a proceeding to enjoin an effort to enforce a judgment establishing a lien on property of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company. Affirmed.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

The Tennessee Central Railroad Company is a Tennessee corporation, authorized to construct and operate about 60 miles of railroad beginning at Monterey, in Putnam county, Tennessee, and extending to a junction with the Cincinnati Southern Railway at or near Glen Mary. In September, 1893, said railroad company entered into a contract with the appellant, J. H. Connor, for the complete construction of said railroad, including the ironing of its road and the construction of depots, water tanks, switches, etc.; Connor to furnish all materials and obtain necessary rights of way. For this he was to receive a fixed sum, partly in money and partly in first-mortgage bonds, both payable in instalments as the work progressed. After grading a section of about 10 miles, beginning at Monterey, and extending east, he threw up his contract in April, 1894, claiming that the company had made default in payments, and was insolvent. May 25, 1894, he filed an original bill in equity in the circuit court of the United States at Nashville against the railroad company claiming a balance due him for work done and a lien therefor under the Tennessee statute giving to contractors a lien for work done in construction of any railroad. That bill averred that the said company was proceeding with the construction under contracts with other contractors, and asserted a lien for the balance due, not only upon the roadbed, bridges, trestles, culverts, etc., constructed by the complainant, but a lien upon the entire railroad, that constructed as well as that under construction, its franchises and property of every description. The bill prayed that the said railroad, including its franchises, should be sold for the payment of his debt and the enforcement of his statutory lien. It was not filed as a creditors' bill, and the only defendant was the railroad company. The railroad company answered and defended, and such proceedings were had as resulted on May 28, 1896, in a decree fixing the liability of the railroad company at $21,421.78. The decree then proceeded as follows: "The court is further of opinion that the foregoing judgment is a lien upon portion of the defendant railroad company commencing with the town of Monterey, in the county of Putnam, and continuing in a southeasterly direction for 10 miles; said strip of land being 100 feet wide, upon which there has been constructed a roadbed for said railroad, 14 feet wide at its crest; and that there are also within and upon said property various cuts, trestles, and bridges,—upon all of which said judgment constitutes a lien, the court being of opinion that complainant is entitled to have so much of said railroad sold for the satisfaction of the aforesaid judgment. It is therefore adjudged and decreed by the court that H. M. Doak, in his character as special commissioner under appointment heretofore made, will proceed at once to sell the above-described property after advertising the same as required by law or rule of this court. He will make said sale at the custom house in the city of Nashville, and will sell said property to the highest bidder for cash, free from any equity of redemption or repurchase. Said commissioner will make his report to the next term of this court how he has executed this decree." No step in execution of this decree was taken until October 28, 1899, when the order of sale was revived. On November 11, 1899, it was again revived, and the decree amended so as to require the property to be sold at the custom-house door in the town of Cookeville, in the county of Putnam, instead of at the custom house in Nashville. Before that decree of sale had been executed, the Tennessee Central Railway Company intervened, and by leave of the court filed a petition praying that the court would perpetually stay the execution of said order of sale, and protect its rights against the cloud which would thereby be thrown upon its title as the purchaser of the property and franchises of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company. A temporary injunction was granted, and Connor answered said petition, denying that he was ever a party to the Walker suit, and setting out that he was a nonresident of the state when that bill was filed, had never appeared in said suit, and was still a nonresident of Tennessee. He also took issue upon every material matter set up as a ground for restraining the execution of his decree. Upon the issues thus made up and the evidence the circuit court, upon final hearing, perpetually enjoined Connor from the enforcement of his lien by a sale of the roadbed described in his decree, but otherwise permitted the decree to stand unaffected. From this decree Connor has appealed.

The essential facts established and necessary to be regarded in the judgment to be pronounced are these:

Connor's bill was filed in the circuit court May 25, 1894. The bill was not a creditors' bill, and its sole purpose was to enforce the statutory lien of a railroad constructor for his exclusive benefit. While the bill prayed for the appointment of a receiver, none was in fact ever appointed, and the property against which he asserted his lien was never attached or otherwise taken into the actual custody of the court. On April 3, 1895, and before any final decree under Connor's bill, J. C. Walker and others, claiming to be creditors of the said railroad company, filed a general creditors' bill in the state chancery court for Cumberland county. The object of that suit was to set aside certain mortgages made by the company as fraudulent, and to have the company wound up as an insolvent corporation. The bill was filed for the benefit of all creditors, and sought to have all debts ascertained, all liens and priorities declared, and the property sold free from all liens and encumbrances, and the proceeds applied to the payment of debts in the order of their rank. October 23, 1895, the chancellor ordered the bill to stand as a creditors' bill, and that the clerk and master should make publication requiring all creditors to come in and make themselves parties on or before the first Monday in April, 1896, on penalty of being deprived of all the benefits of the suit. It was further ordered that the institution of any other suits against the said company be enjoined. On the same day a receiver was appointed, who was ordered to take into his possession all the property, and effects of the said company. At the date of the filing of this creditors' bill about 23 miles of the roadway of said company had been graded, and it is inferable that some bridge and trestle work had been constructed. Aside from this incomplete roadway and some cross-ties, bridge timbers, and commissary stores, it does not appear that said company owned any other property whatever, save certain conditional subscriptions to the stock of the company, dependent upon the construction of the railroad into or through certain mountain counties. The defendants named in the caption of the bill, other than the railroad company, included J. H. Connor & Co., described as "contractors of the defendant" railroad company "operating in Cumberland county." A final decree was rendered in the suit of Connor, May 28, 1896. Connor stood by and took no step to enforce this decree for a period of more than three years. In the meantime the creditors' suit in the state court was proceeding. General publication for four successive weeks was made in November and December, 1895, requiring all creditors to file their claims by April 1, 1896. January 12, 1897, an alias subpoena to answer issued to the sheriff of Cumberland county, requiring him to summon J. H. Connor & Co. to appear and plead to the February rules. This was returned January 15, 1897, "Search made, and the defendant not to be found in my county." On the day of this return an order was made on the rule docket by the clerk and master in these words:

J. C. Walker et al. v. Tennessee Central Railroad.

In the Chancery Court at Crossville, Tennessee.

In this cause it appearing by the sheriff's return that J. H. Connor & Co., one of the defendants, is not to be found in the county, and that search has been duly made by such sheriff, they are therefore hereby required to appear on or before the first Monday of March next before the clerk and master of said court at his office in Crossville, Tennessee, and make defense to the bill filed against them in said court by J. C. Walker et al., or otherwise the bill will be taken for confessed. It is further ordered that this notice be published for four consecutive weeks in the Crossville Chronicle.

H. G. Dunbar, C. & M.

This January 15, 1897.

Publication was duly made as required by this order, and in the mode and manner required by the statute of the state. It is further shown by the clear weight of evidence that the firm of J. H. Connor & Co. consisted of J. H. Connor and B. L. Jett. Whether Connor and Jett were partners at the date of the construction contract between the railroad company and J. H. Connor is not very clear. But it does appear that very shortly after that contract was signed Jett became jointly interested with Connor as a partner, and that the work was thereafter carried on by them as partners under the name of J. H. Connor & Co. The written contract stood in the name of J. H. Connor, and the suit in the circuit court was conducted in Connor's name alone, and the decree is in the name of J. H. Connor, but the decree is for and upon a partnership claim. The railroad company, in its answer, stated that B. L. Jett was associated with J. H. Connor, and should be a party. But no plea in abatement or bar was filed, and the issue seems to have been abandoned. April 17, 1897, an amended bill was filed by Walker and others, making more specific the objects and purposes of the suit, and specifically praying that all liens and priorities be ascertained, and the railroad sold free from liens or encumbrances, and the proceeds of sale applied to the payment of claims in their proper order and rank. In this amended bill J. H. Connor and B. L. Jett were named as defendants, composing the firm of J. H. Connor & Co. Jett was served with process. It does not appear that any further process issued for J. H. Connor, but a decree pro confesso was taken against him and Jett in these words: "In this cause it appearing to the court that publication has been made as provided by statute, requiring J. H. Connor to appear and make defense to the original bill filed in the cause of J. C. Walker et al. against The Tennessee Central Railroad et al., and has failed to plead, answer, or demur thereto within the time required by law, it is accordingly ordered and decreed that said original bill be taken for confessed as to said J. H. Connor, and set for hearing ex parte. It further appearing to the court that B. L. Jett has been duly served with process to answer under the amended bill in this cause, and has failed to plead, answer, or demur thereto, it is accordingly ordered and decreed that said amended bill be taken for confessed as to said B. L. Jett, and set for hearing ex parte." The answer of the railroad company to this amended bill included a schedule of the indebtedness of the company to J. H. Connor, and disclosed for the first time the liability of the company to J. H. Connor & Co., by stating that they had recovered a decree against the company in the circuit court of the United States for $21,421.78 for construction work, and that said court had declared said sum "to be lien upon 10 miles of the railroad of the said defendant, . . . extending from Monterey to Johnson's stand." Under a reference to a special master, a report was filed as to the indebtedness of said company of every class. Among other lien debts, that to J. H. Connor & Co. was reported, though same does not appear to have ever been filed. A final decree was rendered May 10, 1897, which found the railroad company insolvent, and ordered the sale of its entire property free from all liens and mortgages. The decree settled the order of liens, and directed that, after paying costs and receiver's debts, the proceeds should be applied equally in payment of claims which were liens under the Tennessee statute. Among the claims thus preferred was included the decree in favor of J. H. Connor & Co. in the circuit court of the United States, which was referred to in these words: "The judgment obtained by J. H. Connor & Co. in the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee, for $21,042.78, with interest from May 28, 1896, shall be entitled to the benefit of the foregoing provisions of this decree, and share ratably with the other judgments and decrees of the same character, and the special commissioner shall make distribution to said J. H. Connor & Co., or their assigns, upon said judgment, as fully as if they had intervened herein for the payment thereof." Next after these labor and material claims the mortgage bonds were preferred, for this embryo railroad had not only the dignity of receiver's certificates, but the added honor of a first-class mortgage. At the sale thus ordered the petitioner, the Tennessee Central Railway Company, became the purchaser of the entire property and franchises of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company. It has paid the entire amount of its bid of $125,000, and has received a fee-simple conveyance. Since said sale it has proceeded with the construction of said road, and for this purpose has made a mortgage to secure a large issue of bonds to be used in finishing and equipping its railroad. The proceeds of sale were nearly exhausted in paying costs and receiver's debts. The construction liens aggregated more than $100,000, and the pro rata applicable to the Connor claim was only a few hundred dollars.

Upon this state of facts the court below rendered a decree in these words: "That in the proceedings in the chancery court of Cumberland county, Tennessee, that court acquired jurisdiction over the entire properties of the defendant, Tennessee Central Railroad, including that portion or section thereof upon which the original bill in this cause was filed to enforce the contractor's lien, and that the said complainant in the original bill in this cause, after the jurisdiction of said Cumberland chancery court attached, and Connor was brought into that cause by publication, was required by law to present his claim for a final disposition to the chancery court of Cumberland county, Tennessee, and had not the right to enforce the decree by the process of this court, regardless of that suit. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the order of sale heretofore issued by the clerk of this court in the original cause above stated be vacated and annulled, and the said J. H. Connor and his agents, solicitors, attorneys, and counsel, and every person claiming by or under or through said Connor, and each of them, are hereby restrained and perpetually enjoined from suing out of this court any process for the purpose of enforcing the lien of said decree against the section or portion of said railroad therein described, or any part thereof, and the costs of this proceeding to be taxed by the clerk are hereby adjudged and decreed against the said complainant, J. H. Connor, for which let execution issue as in actions at law; but the decree of this court is not otherwise affected than to prevent enforcement of the lien." From this decree Connor has appealed.

Argued before Lurton, Day, and Severens, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Stokes & Stokes, for appellant: Connor was not a party to the proceedings in the state court.

In the original bill filed, the residence of Connor is not given, nor is it stated that he was a nonresident. So the publication was not made for him under the allegations of the bill.

On January 12, 1897, a subpoena issued for "J. H. Connor & Co.," directed to the sheriff of Cumberland county. He returned it on the 15th of January indorsed, "Search made and the defendant not to be found in my county." On the same day the clerk made the order directing publication to be made for "J. H. Connor & Co." The order of the clerk directing publication to be made was a nullity. By the very terms of the statute, § 6164, the clerk was precluded from making such an order until the necessary affidavit was filed with him, and there is no pretense that this was done.

The residence or nonresidence must be stated in the bill.

Walker v. Cottrell, 6 Baxt. 271.

It was certainly not the intention of the legislature to allow a complainant to name a party as defendant without giving his residence, and then issue process to any county he desires, and on the return "not to be found" make publication, and thus acquire jurisdiction of the party.

Carlisle v. Cowan, 85 Tenn. 165, 2 S. W. 26.

The statute permitting publication to be made on the return of the summons that the defendant is not to be found not only requires that the summons shall issue to the county of the defendant's residence, but also that the sheriff shall exercise diligence in serving the same, and shall not return it until the time allowed in the summons has been consumed in trying to find the defendant, and that publication shall not be resorted to as a means of acquiring jurisdiction unless such facts appear.

Soule v. Hough, 45 Mich. 418, 8 N. W. 50, 159; Clayton v. Clayton, 4 Colo. 410.

J. H. Connor was not made a party to the proceedings in the state court in his individual capacity, but the firm styled "J. H. Connor & Co." was made a defendant.

If the court by publication acquired any jurisdiction, it was of J. H. Connor & Co., and it had no right to render a decree under such acquired jurisdiction, destructive of the individual rights of J. H. Connor.

17 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 90.

The original bill in this cause, in legal effect, recognized the lien of Connor's judgment, and did not seek in any way to disturb it. The publication that was made for Connor & Co. directed them to appear and answer that bill. Afterwards the amended and supplemental bill was filed, seeking to destroy or vacate the lien. It would be a great injustice for any court to hold that Connor was bound by the decree predicated upon allegations of the amended and supplemental bill, when he was only technically, if at all, before the court by publication made under the original bill.

on certain property, and this property the court ordered sold to satisfy that lien. The state court vacated that lien, and ordered the property sold free from any encumbrance.

The action of the state court is a nullity, and presents no bar to Connor's right to enforce the order of the United States court.

The decree in favor of Connor in the Federal court was rendered May 28, 1896. It has not yet been enforced by execution or sale.

The Federal statute provides that judgments and decrees rendered in a circuit or district court of the United States within any state shall be liens on property throughout such state, in the same manner and to the same extent and under the same conditions only as if such judgments and decrees had been rendered by a court of general jurisdiction of such state.

25 U. S. Stat. at L. 357, § 1, chap. 729; 2 Deaty, Fed. Proc. 9th ed. § 492, p. 1197.

Shannon's Code, §§ 4708, 4709, 4710, provides: The lien thus given will be lost unless an execution is taken out and the land sold within twelve months after the rendition of the judgment or decree.

Connor having permitted the lien of his judgment to expire before any sale thereunder, the purchaser under the state court proceeding obtained the title, and Connor will not be permitted to disturb, cloud, or encumber the same.

Chouteau v. Nuckolls, 20 Mo. 442; Shannon's Code, p. 1185, note 3; 2 Deaty, Fed. Proc. 9th ed. p. 1199, notes to § 495.

It does not matter whether Connor was personally served with process from the state court or not, or that the special publication made as to him did not have the effect to bring him into court.

The proceedings to administer the assets of an insolvent corporation for the benefit of all creditors is strictly a proceeding in rem. The decree sustaining the bill as a general creditors' bill, the appointment of a receiver, and the publication made for all creditors to appear and present their claims and demands, operated as a warning and notice to all parties interested in the property sought to be administered, whether resident or nonresident of the state, and they would be bound by the action and dealings of the court in respect to such property.

The decision of the state court that the liens of the contractors who constructed the railroad rested upon the entire line, and not upon a part, and included a right to sell the franchise of the company, was strictly in accordance with law, even though the road was constructed in alternate or widely separated sections, and not consecutively.

Connor, knowing of the pending proceedings in the state court, and not objecting to the issue of receiver's certificates, is now estopped to question their validity and priority over his debt, or the wisdom of the court in issuing them.

Humphreys v. Allen, 101 Ill. 490.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. This court is not sitting as a court of error to review either the original decree of the circuit court in favor of J. H. Connor against the Tennessee Central Railroad Company, nor the decree of the state chancery court in the creditors' suit of J. C. Walker and others against the Tennessee Central Railroad Company, under which the present appellee the Tennessee Central Railway Company obtained its title. Those decrees are final. They are here only collaterally brought into question, and all the principles which relate to a collateral attack have application when we come to consider their force and effect. If they are not void, they must be given full effect and force, regardless of errors or irregularities which might have been remedied by a seasonable proceeding in error. The Tennessee Central Railroad Company was a corporation created by the state of Tennessee, and its entire projected line and all of its property was within the state of Tennessee. As an insolvent company, it was entirely competent that it should be wound up under a creditors' bill in a Tennessee court of equity as an insolvent corporation. Shannon's Code, §§ 5187, 6103, 6104; Marr v. Bank of West Tennessee, 4 Coldw. 471; Gleaves v. Davidson & W. Turnp. Co. 4 Baxt. 83; Smith v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 6 Lea, 564; Baxter v. Nashville & H. Turnp. Co. 10 Lea, 488, 491; Tradesman Pub. Co. v. Knoxville Car Wheel Co. 95 Tenn. 634, 31 L. R. A. 593, 32 S. W. 1097. The bill of J. C. Walker and others was filed and conducted according to the usual course of a general creditors' bill. The only non-resident creditor claiming to have any interest in the property of the company under the control of the court was the appellant, J. H. Connor, who, as a member of the firm of J. H. Connor & Co., composed of J. H. Connor and B. L. Jett, had at the time a bill pending in the circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee, in which he was asserting a contractor's lien against the railroad under the Tennessee statute giving a lien upon any railroad in behalf of contractors engaged in construction work.

Aside from any questions arising out of a possible conflict of jurisdiction by reason of the prior pendency of Connor's bill for the enforcement of his contractor's statutory lien in the circuit court, it was entirely competent for the Tennessee chancery court to bring J. H. Connor & Co. or J. H. Connor before the court, as persons claiming a lien upon an interest in the railroad property in the possession of the court, by publication as a nonresident, or as a resident who evaded service of process. Shannon's Code, § 6162. The power of the state to provide by statute for bringing into court nonresidents having interests in real property situated within the state, for the purpose of enforcing a lien, or clearing a title, or subjecting the property to the satisfaction of debts, can no longer be doubted. The whole subject has been thoroughly considered, and the limits of the jurisdiction defined, in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 723, 24 L. ed. 565, 569; Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. ed. 931; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 33 L. ed. 918, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 557, and Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 393, 44 L. ed. 520, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 410. In Arndt v. Griggs, Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The question is not what a court of equity, by virtue of its general powers, and in the absence of a statute, might do, but it is, What jurisdiction has a state over titles to real estate within its limits, and what jurisdiction may it give by statute to its own courts, to determine the validity and extent of the claims of nonresidents to such real estate? If a state has no power to bring a nonresident into its courts for any purposes by publication, it is impotent to perfect the titles of real estate within its limits held by its own citizens; and a cloud cast upon such title by a claim of a nonresident will remain for all time a cloud unless such nonresident shall voluntarily come into its courts for the purpose of having it adjudicated. But no such imperfections attend the sovereignty of the state. It has control over property within its limits; and the condition of ownership of real estate therein, whether the owner be stranger or citizen, is in subjection to its rules concerning the holding, the transfer, liability to obligations, private or public, and the modes of establishing titles thereto. It cannot bring the person of a nonresident within its limits, —its process goes not out beyond its borders, —but it may determine the extent of his title to real estate within its limits, and for the purpose of such determination may provide any reasonable methods of imparting notice. . . . Mortgage liens, mechanics' liens, materialmen's liens, and other liens are foreclosed against nonresident defendants upon service by publication only. Lands of nonresident defendants are attached and sold to pay their debts; and, indeed, almost any kind of action may be instituted and maintained against nonresidents to the extent of any interest in property they may have in Kansas, and the jurisdiction to hear and determine in this kind of cases may be obtained wholly and entirely by publication."

The appellant has strenuously insisted that he was not made a party to the creditors' bill in the state court, and that he did not appear, and is therefore in no way concluded by the decree of that court setting the Tennessee Central Railroad free from all liens and encumbrances, and that the lien declared by the circuit court to exist in his favor against a portion of that railroad has not been cut off or foreclosed by the proceedings in the state court. The question of the conclusiveness of the decree of the state court in respect to Connor's lien involves a number of questions. Among them are these: (1) The effect of the pendency of Connor's suit in the circuit court upon the jurisdiction of the state court over the property of the railroad company against which Connor was in that bill asserting a lien at the date of the institution of the creditors' bill in the state court. (2) The sufficiency of the publication made for "J. H. Connor & Co." as constructive service upon J. H. Connor. (3) The sufficiency of the publication made upon a return of an alias subpoena, "Not to be found in my county," under Shannon's Code, § 6162, subsec. 3, authorizing publication upon a return of "leading process" of "not to be found." Each of these questions bristles with difficulties, which we find it unnecessary to solve; for, if they should all be solved according to the contention of the appellant, there would still remain an insurmountable objection to the enforcement of the decree of sale awarded him by the circuit court. If we assume that J. H. Connor was not a party to the creditors' suit of J. C. Walker and others against the Tennessee Central Railroad Company, and that he is therefore unaffected by the decree which directed the property and franchises of the railroad company to be sold free from all liens and encumbrances, it would follow that the purchaser at the sale made in pursuance of the decree in that case has acquired the property and franchises of that company subject to the rights of J. H. Connor under the decree of the circuit court, whatever they may be. If we also assume that the circuit court had the constructive possession of the entire property and franchises of that corporation from the date of the filing of Connor's bill, and that it could not be properly deprived of that possession by a proceeding subsequently begun in the state court, it would at most follow that the possession by the receiver appointed under the order of the state court would be ineffectual to confer any rights upon a purchaser under the decree of that court, and equally ineffectual in its effect upon the jurisdiction of the circuit court over that property. The actual seizure of the property was wholly unimportant to the jurisdiction of the state court. An insolvent corporation may be proceeded against under a creditors' bill, and wound up, without appointing a receiver, and we may treat the fact that the state court appointed a receiver pending Connor's bill as a nullity. It is due, however, to the state court, to say that there was no intimation in the bill of Walker and others that there was any proceeding pending in the circuit court of any kind, and at no time was there ever made to that court any suggestion of a possible conflict of jurisdiction. The railroad consisted of a mere graded roadbed some 23 miles in length, so that there was at no time any such actual possession by the receiver as to oust the purely constructive possession of the circuit court. However extensive we may regard the constructive possession of the circuit court by reason of the relief prayed under Connor's bill, the hand of that court was withdrawn as a result of its final decree, which declared Connor's lien to extend only to a specific part of the property of said company, which the decree described as "that portion of the defendant railroad company commencing with the town of Monterey, in the county of Putnam, and continuing in a southeasterly direction for 10 miles;" "said strip of land being 100 feet wide, upon which there has been constructed a roadbed for said railroad 14 feet wide at its crest; and that there is also within and upon said property various cuts, trestles, and bridges,—upon all of which said judgment constitutes a lien, the court being of opinion that complainant is entitled to have so much of said railroad sold for the satisfaction of the aforesaid judgment." The necessary effect of this decree was to discharge the franchises and property of said railroad company from the possession and control of the circuit court, except in so far as Connor's lien was declared to extend. It was not until after this decree had been pronounced, and nearly a year had elapsed, that the state court ordered a sale of the property of said railroad company. The decree then made ordered the sale of the franchises and entire property of the railroad company. Twenty-three miles of railroad had then been graded. The railroad being ordered sold as an entirety included, of course, the 10 miles of roadbed upon which Connor's lien rested.

Having assumed that Connor was not a party to or concluded by this decree, we must also assume that neither the decree nor the sale were effectual to defeat any right, lien, or remedy he may have by virtue of the decree of the circuit court. After lying silent for more than three years after date of his order of sale, Connor obtained a revivor, and was about to have his decree of sale executed. In the meantime the purchaser under the decree in the creditors' suit has completed and put in operation about 40 miles of railroad. Acting upon the assumption of the validity of its title, it has made a first mortgage, and its bonds to a large amount have been negotiated. Under these circumstances it has intervened in the case of Connor against the Tennessee Central Railroad Company, and has set up the title so acquired under the chancery court sale as a bar to any proceeding to enforce the order of sale awarded to Connor for the enforcement of his lien. These assumptions put the Tennessee Central Railway Company in the attitude of a purchaser which has acquired, subject only to the unforesclosed lien of Connor, every right, title, and interest of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company and of its mortgagees and lienors foreclosed in the creditors' suit. Columbus, S. & H. R. Co.'s Appeal, 48 C. C. A. 275, 109 Fed. 177. In this attitude, and under these circumstances, it has intervened in the case of Connor against the Tennessee Central Railroad for the purpose of asserting the right and title thus acquired pending Connor's suit, and to prevent the dismemberment of its railroad by a sale which it claims will but cast a cloud upon its own title. We entertain no doubt that, if the appellee is entitled to be relieved from the threatened sale by which the unity of its railroad would be broken, the mode in which it has appealed to the circuit court to prevent the use of its power to its needless injury is appropriate. Krippendorf v. Hyde, 110 U. S. 276, 283, 28 L. ed. 145, 148, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 27; Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. 343, 18 L. ed. 280; Gumbel v. Pitkin, 124 U. S. 131, 31 L. ed. 374, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 379. If the execution of the decree of sale awarded to Connor will not confer a valid title to a purchaser, and will only result in casting a cloud upon the title of the intervener, Connor should be restrained from such an abuse of the process of the court, and remitted to such other remedy as may be open to him for the collection of his claim and the enforcement of his lien. The statute under which Connor asserted a lien is one which gives a lien to every contractor, subcontractor, and materialman who aids in the construction of a railroad. Shannon's Code, §§ 3570 et seq. That the statute, by prescribing a remedy at law and in the circuit court of the state, cannot defeat the jurisdiction of the Federal circuit court, sitting as a court of equity, of its jurisdiction to enforce a statutory lien upon property, such as the lien of a mechanic or railroad contractor, is well settled. Sheffield Furnace Co. v. Witherow, 149 U. S. 574, 37 L. ed. 853, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 936. The lien given by this statute is given equally to all who contribute to such construction, and the lien of each extends to the whole railroad, and is not limited to the particular section, bridge, or other part of the work. The lien extends to the entire railroad. The language of the statute is, "there shall be a lien upon such railroad." Statutes giving liens to builders of houses or furnishers of materials are construed as giving the lien upon the entire house or distinct structure. Steger v. Arctic Refrigerating Co. 89 Tenn. 453. 11 L. R. A. 580, 14 S. W. 1087. Under like statutes in respect to railroad contractors the lien is held for even stronger reasons to extend to the entire railroad. Brooks v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 101 U. S. 443, 25 L. ed. 1057; Knapp v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 74 Mo. 374; Midland R. Co. v. Wilcox, 122 Ind. 84, 23 N. E. 506; 2 Jones, Liens, §§ 1619, 1620; Elliott, Railroads, §§ 520, 1074. Connor's bill described the property as an unfinished railroad still in course of construction, and averred that the work was being carried on by other contractors. He properly prayed that he might be declared to have a lien upon the road finished and that in course of construction, and upon the franchises of the company. This the court denied by limiting his lien to "that portion of the defendant railroad company [sic] commencing with the town of Monterey, in the county of Putnam, and continuing in a southeasterly direction for 10 miles;" "said strip of land being 100 feet wide, upon which there has been constructed a roadbed for said railroad 14 feet wide at its crest; and that there are also within and upon said property various cuts, trestles, and bridges, upon all of which said judgment constitutes a lien, the court being of opinion that complainant is entitled to have so much of said railroad sold for the satisfaction of the aforesaid judgment." The decree then proceeds by directing that the commissioner will, after advertising, etc., "sell said property to the highest bidder for cash free from the equity of redemption or repurchase." It is plain from this decree that the contractor's lien declared by the court extends only to a specific strip of property constituting the right of way and roadbed thereon, and that for the purpose of enforcing this lien the circuit court ordered a sale of this specific property. What would a purchaser acquire under this decree? The franchise to construct and operate a railroad for tolls was a franchise to construct the line as an entirety. The franchise is a unit. A part cannot remain with the company and a part pass to a purchaser of a section of its railroad. It is not a case of where the work was abandoned after a part of the line had been constructed. Connor's bill averred that the work of construction was being carried on by the company when he filed his bill, and the decree itself recognizes that the sale ordered is only of "a portion" of the railroad. Neither does the decree of sale direct or authorize the sale of the franchise of the company, and it is clear that a franchise will not pass as appurtenant to a part of a roadbed. Wood v. Truckee Turnp. Co. 24 Cal. 474. It follows that the commissioner could not convey or deliver to the purchaser at his sale anything more than the right and interest of the railroad company in that portion of its right of way and roadbed described in the decree. That title and right is a mere easement acquired for the purpose of maintaining and operating a railroad thereon.

But if it be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that the fee to the described strip of land was in the company, the situation of a purchaser not owning the franchises would be no better. The general rule is that the physical property of a private corporation is as subject to be sold at judicial sale for the enforcement of a lien, or for the satisfaction of a judgment or decree for debt, as the property of an individual. But an exception exists, upon principles of public policy, in respect to the property of a quasi public corporation which is essential to the enjoyment of its franchises for the discharge of those public duties for which it was created. Property acquired and held as essential to the operation of quasi public franchises cannot be seized and sold separate and apart from the franchises, without which the latter would be inoperative. Thus, in Tennessee, without regard to the character of the title, the toll houses and roadway of a turnpike company are not the subject of execution, levy, and sale. "The weight of authority is," said Justice Cooper, speaking for the supreme court of Tennessee, "that the exemption of the franchise from levy will protect all property essentially necessary to its exercise, for the obvious reason that the franchise was conferred for a public purpose; and that there ought not to be any disposition of the property except in a mode which would secure a continuance of the use of the franchise for the benefit of the public. The rights of creditors are sufficiently secured by the right to attach or impound the tolls, and, if necessary, to sell the property and franchises together." Baxter v. Nashville & N. Turnp. Co. 10 Lea, 488, 493. This doctrine has received very general sanction. Elliott, Railroads, §§ 520, 1074; Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1125; Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 24 How. 257, 16 L. ed. 635; East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe ex dem. Visscher, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. ed. 136, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 869; Ammant v. New Alexandria & P. Turnp. Road Co. 13 Serg. & R. 210, 15 Am. Dec. 593; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Boney, 117 Ind. 501, 3 L. R. A. 435, 20 N. E. 432; Wood v. Truckee Turnp. Co. 24 Cal. 474; Dayton, X. & B. R. Co. v. Lewton, 20 Ohio St. 401; Overton Bridge Co. v. Means, 33 Neb. 857, 51 N. W. 240; Goock v. McGee, 83 N. C. 59, 35 Am. Rep. 558; Gardner v. Mobile & N. W. R. Co. 102 Ala. 635, 645, 15 So. 271. The case of Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 24 How. 257, 16 L. ed. 635, is closely in point. An execution had been levied upon "a homestead lot, sundry canal locks, a wharf, and sundry other lots," all of which property, the court in its opinion said, was admitted to belong "to the canal company in fee." The canal company enjoined the sale under the fieri facias, and on final hearing the injunction was made perpetual. It was admitted that the property so levied upon was essential to the proper and useful operation and working of the canal, and that without same the franchise would be valueless. Upon appeal the decree was affirmed, the court, speaking by Mr. Chief Justice Taney, saying: "The property seized by the marshal is of itself of scarcely any value, apart from the franchise of taking toll, with which it is connected in the hands of the company, and, if sold under this fieri facias, without the franchise, would bring scarcely anything, but would yet, as it is essential to the working of the canal, render the property of the company in the franchise, now so valuable and productive, utterly valueless. Now, it is very clear that the franchise or right to take toll on boats going through the canal would not pass to the purchaser under this execution. The franchise, being an incorporeal hereditament, cannot, upon the settled principles of the common law, be seized under a fieri facias. If it can be done in any of the states, it must be under a statutory provision of the state; and there is no statute of Maryland changing the common law in this respect. Indeed, the marshal's return and the agreement of the parties shows it was not seized; and, consequently, if the sale had taken place, the result would have been to destroy utterly the value of the property owned by the company, while the creditor himself would, most probably, realize scarcely anything from these useless canal locks, and lots adjoining them. The record and proceedings before us show that there were other creditors of the corporation to a large amount, some of whom loaned money to carry on the enterprise. And it would be against the principles of equity to allow a single creditor to destroy a fund to which other creditors had a right to look for payment, and equally against the principles of equity to permit him to destroy the value of the property of the stockholders by disavowing from the franchise property which was essential to its useful existence."

In East Alabama R. Co. v. Doe ex dem. Viischer, 114 U. S. 340, 29 L. ed. 136, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809, the facts were that a judgment creditor levied an execution on the right of way of a railroad company, and it was sold and conveyed to the execution creditor, by the sheriff. The court held that a right of way could not be sold under execution or otherwise to a purchaser who did not own the franchise. It is true that the court found that the right of way was a mere easement, and that the franchise had not been and could not be levied upon, being a mere incorporeal hereditament. But the court, among other things, said: "The sheriff's deed purported to convey, in words, 'the said tract of land or railroad bed, to wit, the right of way of the Opelika & Oxford Railroad, so far as the right of way has been obtained, from Lafayette to the edge of Lee county. . . . If the deed undertook to convey any land, or soil, or roadbed, it conveyed with it the right of way. The deed, in reciting the levy, states that it was made 'on the following tract or lot of land, as the property of the said railroad company, to wit, the right of way; . . . and, if they obtained a deed of anything, the right of way was included, or else they received nothing beyond, perhaps, a right to carry away from the land what the company had put upon it. . . . This court decided in Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 24 How. 257, 16 L. ed. 635, that a corporate franchise to take tolls on a canal could not be seized and sold under a fieri facias, unless authorized by a statute of the state which granted the act of incorporation; and that neither the lands nor the works essential to the enjoyment of the franchise could be separated from it and sold under such a writ, so as to destroy or impair the value of the franchise. This decision was put on the ground that the franchise or right to take toll on boats going through the canal would not pass to the purchaser under the execution on a judgment at law against the corporation, because it was an incorporeal hereditament, and upon the settled principles of the common law could not be seized on a fieri facias, and was made in a case where the corporation owned in fee the real estate, toll houses, $4 L. R. A.

canal locks, and wharf seized, all of which were necessary for the uses and working of the canal."

The principle running all through these cases is that the property of a public corporation, such as a railroad, cannot be sold separately and apart from its franchise if the property is so indissolubly linked to the franchise and to its public functions as that without it the franchise will be rendered inoperative. The remedy of a creditor who has exhausted property not necessary to the exercise of the franchises is to obtain a receiver, and sequester the tolls or income, or a decree subjecting the property and its franchises to sale as an entirety. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 1126; Baxter v. Nashville & H. Turnp. Co. 10 Lea, 488; Gleaves v. Davidson & W. Turnp. Co. 4 Baxt. 83; Covington Drawbridge Co. v. Shepherd, 21 How. 112, 16 L. ed. 38; Gue v. Tide Water Canal Co. 24 How. 258, 16 L. ed. 635.

The decree directing a sale of a portion of the roadbed of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company separate and apart from the franchises of the company is ineffective. The purchaser will acquire no right or title. To execute the decree will but cast a cloud upon the title of the Tennessee Central Railway Company, and operate only as an abuse of the process of the circuit court.

The decree perpetually enjoining the commissioner from proceeding is therefore affirmed, with costs.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

William STUBER.

(48 C. C. A. 149, 108 Fed. 934.)

1. The question of fellow service, in an action by an employee in a Federal court to recover from his employer for personal injuries inflicted through negligence, is not one of local law to be settled by the decisions of the highest courts of the state in which the cause of action arose.
2. A foreman of water supply of a railroad, whose duty requires him to be carried from place to place along the road to supervise water tanks and pumping machinery, is, when riding on a detached engine to a place where machinery needs repairs, a fellow servant of the engineer in charge of the engine carrying him, within the rule exempting the employer from liability for injuries negligently inflicted upon an employee by his fellow servant.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Tennessee to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

NOTE.—As to what servants are deemed to be in the same common employment, apart from suits where no questions as to vice principal arise, see also Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co. (N. J. L.) 50 L. R. A. 417, and note; and Spees v. Boggs (Pa.) 52 L. R. A. 983.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Lurton and Severens, Circuit Judges, and Clark, District Judge.

Messrs. Charles N. Burch and John W. Judd, for plaintiff in error:

Plaintiff was not a passenger, nor entitled to the rights of a passenger, but he was a fellow servant of those in control of the engine. The negligence of these fellow servants was one of the ordinary risks of his employment; and for the negligence of a fellow servant there can be no recovery against the common master, the defendant railroad company.

Cases where servants of the company were traveling free of charge on its trains, and were injured through the negligence of those in control of the trains, will divide themselves into three classes: (1) Those in which plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was traveling in the prosecution of the defendant's business, and in the discharge of his contract of employment; (2) those in which plaintiff was traveling on his own pleasure or business; (3) those in which the plaintiff, though apparently traveling free, yet in his contract of employment received transportation as a portion of the consideration for his labor,—in other words, where the transportation was not, in fact, free, but paid for by labor.

The case at bar belongs to the first class, and the overwhelming weight of authority, state and Federal, is to the effect that in such case there can be no recovery.

Mr. J. N. Thomason for defendant in error.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error, William Stuber, sustained a severe injury through the negligence of an engineer in charge of a detached engine upon which he was riding. Both the engineer and Stuber were at the time in the service of the railroad company. There was a judgment upon a verdict for defendant in error. 102 Fed. 421.

This case turns upon the single question as to whether the negligent engineer and Stuber were fellow servants. The facts were undisputed, and were as follows: Stuber for many years had been the "foreman of water supply" upon an extensive division of the railroad of the plaintiff in error, receiving $80 per month. His business was to supervise the water tanks and pumping machinery at the many water stations within his division, keeping same in good repair, and in condition to furnish water for the proper movement of trains. In the discharge of his duties he was obliged to pass frequently from one water station to another, and was authorized by a superintendent's order or pass to travel free upon any and all trains, and to stop them, when necessary, at any tank. To answer a call to repair the pumping machinery at Humboldt, Tennessee, Stuber boarded a detached locomotive at Guthrie, Kentucky, bound down the road. Through the negligence of the engineer in sole control of this engine, a collision occurred at Clarksville, Tennessee, with a train, whereby Stuber sustained a severe personal injury. The learned circuit judge was of opinion that the relation of fellow servant did not exist between defendant in error and the engineer, through whose negligence he had been injured, and instructed the jury to return a verdict against the plaintiff in error. A request to instruct the jury to find for the railroad company upon the ground that the engineer and Stuber were fellow servants was denied. The charge given and the request denied have been assigned as error. There is no statute in Tennessee defining fellow servants. The question is, therefore, one to be determined upon common-law principles. Under the decisions of the Tennessee supreme court, the liability of a railroad company to one servant who has sustained injury through the negligence of another has been made to depend upon the subordination of the one to the other, as well as upon refinements in respect to different departments of service.

Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Carroll, 6 Heisk. 347, 364; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bowler, 9 Heisk. 866; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lahr, 86 Tenn. 335, 6 S. W. 663; Coal Creek Min. Co. v. Davis, 90 Tenn. 711, 719, 18 S. W. 387; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. De Armond, 86 Tenn. 73, 5 S. W. 600; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Martin, 87 Tenn. 398, 3 L. R. A. 282, 10 S. W. 772. The question is, however, not one of local law to be settled by the decisions of the highest courts of the state in which the cause of action arose, but one of general law. So far as the Supreme Court of the United States has authoritatively determined the law applicable to such a case, it is the duty of this court to follow the law thus determined. But, so far as the question has not been thus authoritatively settled by that court, the common law applicable is to be determined by a consideration of all the authorities bearing upon the relation of master and servant. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914. There is no authority for regarding Stuber, while being carried to his work by his employer, as a passenger. To discharge the duties of his peculiar employment, it was necessary that he should be carried from one place of work to another, as occasion should require. His transportation to and from his work was part of his contract of service, and while being thus transported he was as much in the service of the company as when engaged in the repair or construction of a water tank or pump. He was traveling at the time under a single contract of service, and his right to be carried free to and from his work is inseparable from the contract to do the work, and no valid ground exists for saying that he paid his own fare, or was in any sense a passenger.

The rule is now well settled that railway employees, while being carried, as part of their contract of service, to and from their place of work, are fellow servants, and not passengers. Thus, in Gillshannon v. Stony Brook R. Corp. 10 Cush. 228, laborers being carried to and from their work upon a gravel train were held not to be passengers, but fellow servants of those operating the train. In Seaver v. Boston & M. R. Co. 14 Gray, 466, a carpenter, whose business it was to repair bridges and fences along the line of railroad, injured while being carried free to a place of work, was held to be a fellow servant, and not a passenger. In Ryan v. Cumberland Valley R. Co. 23 Pa. 384, a laborer on a gravel train was injured through the negligence of the conductor or engineer while being carried from his residence to his place of work. Held, that there could be no recovery. In McQueen v. Central Branch U. P. R. Co. 30 Kan. 689, 1 Pac. 139, a bridge painter, while being transported over the road to discharge the duties of his place, was held not to be a passenger. In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Smith, 31 L. R. A. 321, 14 C. C. A. 509, 30 U. S. App. 176, 67 Fed. 524, it was held that a civil engineer, charged with the duty of looking after the maintenance of bridges, trestles, and water tanks, was not a passenger when traveling over the road in discharge of his duties. In Tomlinson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 38 C. C. A. 148, 97 Fed. 252,—an opinion by the circuit court of appeals for the eighth circuit,—it was held that a bridge builder and repairer, whose duties called him to various places on the line of the railroad company employing him, was not a passenger when being carried over the road to place of work, but a fellow servant with those operating the train to which his car was attached. To the same effect are the cases of Tunney v. Midland R. Co. L. R. 1 C. P. 291; Ross v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 5 Hun, 488, Affirmed in 74 N. Y. 617, and cited in 95 N. Y. 272; Russell v. Hudson River R. Co. 17 N. Y. 134; Vick v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 267, 47 Am. Rep. 36; Abend v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 111 Ill. 203, 53 Am. Rep. 616; Kumler v. Junction R. Co. 33 Ohio St. 150. On this record there can be no question as to the right of the defendant in error if he had been injured while traveling for a purpose disconnected with his employment. He was not so traveling. The cases of Doyle v. Fitchburg R. Co. 162 Mass. 66, 25 L. R. A. 157, 37 N. E. 770, 166 Mass. 492, 33 L. R. A. 844, 44 N. E. 611; McNulty v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 182 Pa. 479, 38 L. R. A. 376, 38 Atl. 524; and State use of Abell v. Western Maryland R. Co. 63 Md. 433,—are cases in which it appeared that at the time of the injury the employee was not in the service of the company, but was traveling for his own purposes, and therefore a passenger. The learned trial judge and the counsel for the defendant in error seem to place the liability of the railroad company upon the theory that only those servants engaged in the same department of the service of a common master are to be regarded as fellow servants.

Stuber, it is said, had nothing to do with the actual movement of trains or engines, and was, therefore, in a different department of service. The ground upon which those courts proceed which hold an employer liable to his servants for the negligent acts of other servants in a separate and distinct department is that the servant only accepts the risk of the negligence of those so closely associated with him as that he may be supposed to have contracted with reference to the possibility of their negligence, they coming through such association to some extent under his influence. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Carroll, 6 Heisk. 348, 362 et seq.; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. §§ 237, 238. But under this rule it is difficult to see its application here. If Stuber had been hurt by those engaged in operating a train or locomotive while he was repairing a tank or pump on the side of the track, he might with more plausibility have urged that he could not foresee, when accepting employment, that he would be exposed to the negligence of servants operating trains. But in the case of Morgan v. Vale of Neath R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. 149, the plaintiff was employed by the railway company to do work as a carpenter. He was injured while standing on scaffolding at work on a shed close to the line of railway, and was injured by the carelessness of some train hands in shifting a locomotive on a turntable so that it struck a ladder supporting the scaffolding, by which means the plaintiff was hurt. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover, having been injured by a fellow servant. Pollock, C. B., said: "It appears to me that we should be letting in a flood of litigation were we to decide the present case in favor of the plaintiff. For, if a carpenter's employment is to be distinguished from that of the porters employed by the same company, it will be sought to split up the employees in every large establishment into different departments of service. Although the common object of their employment, however different, is but the furtherance of the business of the master, yet it might be said . . . that no two had a common immediate object. This shows that we must not over-refine, but look at the common object, and not at the common immediate object."

In the case at bar Stuber's employment required him to pass over the line of railway continuously upon all kinds of trains. Thus he was brought continuously in contact with those operating the trains, and must, upon the association rule, be regarded as having foreseen that he would be exposed, at least while being carried to and from his place of work, to the negligence of those operating trains. The general rule is that the master is not liable in the absence of negligence in respect to those duties which he is universally regarded as having undertaken; such as the obligation to exercise care in the selection of those to be associated with him, or of a place to carry on his work, and proper tools or materials with which to do it. In the decisions of the Supreme Court we find no sanction for taking a case out of this general rule of nonliability for the negligent acts of a fellow servant by refined distinctions as to who are fellow servants, based upon the subordination of one servant to another, or upon the circumstance that two servants are engaged in different departments of a common service. Thus, in Quebec S. S. Co. v. Merchant, 133 U. S. 375, 33 L. ed. 650, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 397, the department theory was repudiated in respect to those in service upon the same steamship, and the ship's carpenter held to be the fellow servant of the stewardess, though in distinct departments. In Northern P. R. Co. v. Hamby, 154 U. S. 349, 360, 38 L. ed. 1009, 1013, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 983, 986, a section hand was held to be the fellow servant of those engaged in operating trains. Mr. Justice Brown, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "To hold the principal liable whenever there are gradations of rank between the person receiving and the person causing the injury, or whenever they are employed in different departments of the same general service, would result in frittering away the whole doctrine of fellow service. Cases arising between persons engaged together in the same identical service—as, for instance, between brakemen of the same train or two seamen . . . in the same ship—are comparatively rare. In a large majority of cases there is some distinction either in respect to grade of service or in the nature of their employments. Courts, however, have been reluctant to recognize these distinctions unless the superiority of the person causing the injury was such as to put him rather in the category of principal than of agent,—as, for example, the superintendent of a factory or railway; and the employments were so far different that, although paid by the same master, the two servants were brought no further in contact with each other than as if they had been employed by different principals."

In New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 328, 44 L. ed. 181, 184, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85, Ross's Case, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, was expressly overruled, and the last vestige of authority for supposing that the master's liability depended upon the nonsubordination of the injured servant to the one negligently inflicting the injury disappeared. Distinctions based upon gradations of rank and service in separate departments stand upon the same misconceptions as to the ground upon which a master's responsibility to his servant at common law rests. Thus Shaw, Ch. J., in Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, replying to the argument which had been advanced in favor of limiting the exemption of the master to his servants to injuries resulting from the negligence of those directly associated with the injured servant, said that the argument in favor of the distinction rested "upon an assumed principle of responsibility which does not exist. The master, in the case supposed, is not exempt from liability because the servant has better means of providing for his safety when he is employed in immediate connection with those from whose negligence he might suffer, but because the implied contract of the master does not extend to indemnify the servant against the negligence of anyone but himself; and he is not liable in tort, as for the negligence of his servant, because the person suffering does not stand toward him in the relation of a stranger, but is one whose rights are regulated by contract, express or implied." In New England R. Co. v. Conroy, cited above, this reasoning was approved, and the rule touching the master's responsibility to his servants was thus stated for the court by Justice Shiras: "Unless we are constrained to accept and follow the decision of this court in the case of Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, we have no hesitation in holding, both upon principle and authority, that the employer is not liable for an injury to one employee occasioned by the negligence of another engaged in the same general undertaking; that it is not necessary that the servants should be engaged in the same operation or particular work; that it is enough, to bring the case within the general rule of exemption, if they are in the employment of the same master, engaged in the same common enterprise, both employed to perform duties tending to accomplish the same general purposes, or, in other words, if the services of each in his particular sphere or department are directed to the accomplishment of the same general end; and that, accordingly, in the present case, upon the facts stated, the conductor and the injured brakeman are to be considered fellow servants within the rule."

Applying this principle, it is clear that Stuber and the engineer, through whose negligence he was hurt, were servants of a common master, and, though not engaged "in the same operation or particular work," they were both employed to perform duties "tending to accomplish the same general purposes." The services of Stuber in supplying trains with water were just as important to the proper movement of trains as those of the engineer upon a locomotive. The services of each in his particular sphere were directed to the accomplishment of the same general end. They were, therefore, fellow servants, without regard to the intimacy of their association, though, as we have already seen, the duties of Stuber were such as to require that he should be constantly carried to and from his work by those engaged in the operation of trains and engines.

The failure to instruct for the plaintiff in error was an error, for which the judgment must be reversed.

1. An appeal by the owner of a vessel from a decree awarding the sum recovered for probable loss of earnings because of a collision, to the insurer, will not give the appellate court jurisdiction to review the portion of the decree which awarded appellant the amounts recovered for loss of freight under existing contracts and for loss of coal on board.
2. An insurer is not precluded from intervening to claim the amount decreed against the owners of vessels which damaged by collision the vessel on which his contract was written by waiting until after the liability has been fixed by the appellate court, if no issue was made in the case as to the distribution of the funds recovered, and the appellate court did not pass upon that question.
3. The recovery for loss of prospective earnings awarded because of injury to a vessel by collision is within the rule entitling an insurer who has received an abandonment of the vessel to the fund recovered on account of the collision from the vessel in fault, and the fact that the insurance did not cover the full value of the injured vessel will not require the insurer to share such recovery with the vessel owner.

APPPEAL by the owners of the steamship Ohio from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Michigan awarding a portion of a sum recovered as damages for its loss, to the insurers, to whom the vessel had been abandoned. Affirmed.

Statement by Severens, Circuit Judge:

This case came here on a former appeal from a decree of the district court finding the steamers the Ohio, the Siberia, and the Samuel Mather all at fault for a collision which resulted in the sinking of the Ohio. 33 C. C. A. 667, 62 U. S. App. 88, 91 Fed. 547. The decree of the district court was reversed by this court as to the alleged fault of the Ohio upon the ground that no negligence on her part was shown, and directions were given in the mandate to enter a decree against the Siberia and the Samuel Mather for the damages sustained by the Ohio. Upon the reception of the mandate, a decree was entered in favor of the libellants and against the claimants and sureties for the Siberia and the Samuel Mather for the sum of $71,409.74, with interest and costs. The amount of this decree was duly paid into the registry of the court, and on a subsequent date, upon stipulation of the parties concerned, a considerable portion of the sum was distributed. At the time of the loss the Ohio was insured in the following insurance companies, viz.: The Marine Insurance Company, the Reliance Marine Insurance Company, the Mannheim Insurance Company, the Commercial Mutual Insurance Company, and the Commercial Union Assurance Company, Limited, to the amount, in all, of $51,175 upon a valuation, stated in the policies, of $58,500. Promptly after the collision and damage occurred, which was on the 19th day of May, 1890, the owners of the Ohio gave due notice to the insurance companies of their abandonment of the vessel as for a total loss. The formal abandonment, with proofs of loss, were delivered to the insurers on May 30, 1890. On October 8, 1890, the full amount of insurance was paid, and a conveyance of the Ohio was delivered to the insurance companies. The insurance companies having these policies on the Ohio at the time of her loss, and which insurance they had severally paid to the owners, filed their petition in the district court, praying that there be ordered paid to the petitioners the sum of $7,879.20, the amount alleged to have been recovered in the decree against the Siberia and the Samuel Mather, and claimed in the original libel as damages in the nature of demurrage, or the probable value of the use of the vessel for a time subsequent to the collision, and while she was detained for repairs; also for the sum of $1,719.55, being the probable net earnings of the Ohio on her voyage in which the collision occurred; also the sum of $233.75 for the loss of fuel then on board the Ohio. The owners of the Ohio contested this petition, and upon the hearing the court decreed that the petitioners were entitled to the first of the above-mentioned sums, namely, $7,879.20, which had been recovered as the probable net earnings of the Ohio after the collision, but denied the claim for loss of freight and for loss of fuel, which latter were considered to belong to the owner of the vessel. A decree was entered in conformity with these views, and thereupon the owners of the Ohio appealed to this court. The petitioners have not appealed.

Argued before Lurton and Severens, Circuit Judges, and Thompson, District Judge.
Messrs. John C. Shaw, Byron S. Waite, William B. Cady, and Herbert K. Oakes, for appellants:

Petitioners are not entitled to any money under these proceedings because they neglected their opportunity to intervene, and slept upon their rights in that regard, the final decree having been entered pursuant to mandate from the appellate court.

Mr. George W. Wendock for appellant Mason.

Messrs. Harvey D. Goulder and O. E. Kremer for appellees.

Severens, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The supposed errors of which the appellants complain may properly be considered under the following heads: First. That the petitioners are not entitled to any recovery by these proceedings, because they lost their opportunity to intervene, and slept upon their rights in that regard until after the entry of the final decree entered upon presentment of the mandate from this court; and, if they are entitled to recover any of these moneys from the owners of the Ohio, it must be done in another court and case. Second. They claim that all moneys recovered against the Siberia and the Samuel Mather for loss of probable earnings after the collision belonged to the owners of the Ohio. Third. They claim that, if the insurers are entitled to the prospective probable earnings of the Ohio, they, the owners, are entitled to share with the underwriters by reason of the fact that the vessel was only insured by all the several policies to an amount considerably less than her valuation in the policies, and that as to this difference the owners carried the risk. The right to the damages recovered for loss of freight on the voyage, and also the sum recovered for loss of fuel, were allowed to the appellants by decree of the district court, and, of course, they have no ground for complaint here, so far as those matters are concerned. But counsel for the appellees contend that the court below erred in refusing to allow these last-mentioned claims to the petitioners, and in answer to a doubt expressed by the court here whether, not having appealed, they were entitled to now make this contention, they say that those items were a part of the things disposed of by the decree, and that the appeal of the owners of the Ohio brought up the whole matter of the decree, and that, therefore, the whole subject was before the court. But we are quite clearly of the opinion that this contention cannot be maintained. It is doubtless true that, where the decree awards a balance which is the result of an adjustment of mutual accounts between the parties, an appeal from such decree might open the case for the consideration of an objection to the particular items which make up the general balance, provided the proper steps had been taken to bring those matters under the cognizance and power of the court. But this is not such case. The claims pursued are several and distinct grounds of recovery, and there is nothing in the nature of a mutual account.

Recurring, therefore, to the questions which are before us, we observe, first, that, in our opinion, the objection that the petition of the insurance companies was not seasonably presented is not well founded. It was not necessary that they should have intervened in the case prior to the entry of the decree of the district court under the order of this court, when the cause was remanded. There was nothing in the order of the mandate directing what decree should be entered, which prevented a subsequent application for a distribution of the fund recovered. There had been no issue in the case upon any such matter when it came here upon appeal, and, of course, there was nothing decided here which had any relation whatever to that subject. What we determined was the liability of the Siberia and the Samuel Mather for the damages suffered by the Ohio, and the fixing of the amount for which the respondents were liable. There was no question before the court relating to the ultimate destination of the funds, though it did undoubtedly establish the right of recovery between the then parties to the suit; but it determined nothing more. When the money was paid into court, all the purposes of the decree, so far as the parties to the suit were concerned, were accomplished. The insurance companies had not been parties to the suit, and it was entirely competent for them, at any time before the final distribution of the fund was made, to intervene for the purpose of presenting their claim to an interest in the fund, and for its establishment by the decree of the court. Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. 45 C. C. A. 60, 105 Fed. 803-808; Re Howard, 9 Wall. 175, 19 L. ed. 634; Williams v. Gibbs, 17 How. 239, 15 L. ed. 135; The Elmbank, 72 Fed. 610. The question which we are required to determine upon the merits is whether that part of the damages recovered for the prospective earnings of the Ohio, and resulting from the collision, belong to the owners of the ship or to the underwriters. When the case was here on the former appeal, this court, in considering a question of pleading, referred briefly to this question, but as, in the then state of the case, it was not necessary to determine it, it was expressly passed over without expressing any definite opinion upon it. The question turns upon the effect under the maritime law of an abandonment of the ship by the owner to the underwriters as for a constructive total loss. The rule upon this subject is, as we think, correctly stated in 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 36, as follows: "An abandonment divests the property of the thing abandoned out of the insured, and vests it in the insurer, together with all the rights of property and rights of action incident thereto, and all the burdens and liabilities in respect thereof, from the moment of the casualty to which the abandonment refers."

This rule was accepted by the Supreme Court of the United States at an early day, and has been steadily adhered to. In the case of Chesapeake Ins. Co. v. Stark, 6 Cranch, 268, 3 L. ed. 220, there was an insurance of goods on board ship and in charge of the supercargo, Parker. The ship and goods were captured by a privateer, one of the perils insured against. Notice of abandonment was given to the insurance company. Parker, the supercargo, afterwards effected an arrangement with the owner of the privateer by which the vessel was released. The ship and goods were taken to the port of destination, where the latter was sold. Suit was brought upon the policy. It was held that no deed of cession was necessary, the notice of abandonment being sufficient, and that thereupon the title to the goods vested immediately in the underwriters. With respect to the effect of the abandonment, Chief Justice Marshall said: "If the abandonment was legal, it put the underwriters completely in the place of the assured, and Parker became their agent. When he contracts on behalf of the owners of the goods, he contracts on behalf of the underwriters, who have become owners, not on behalf of Stark, who has ceased to be one."

There was a question whether the notice of abandonment was seasonably given, and the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was reversed, and a new trial ordered, but upon that ground only. That was a case of insurance upon the cargo, but the rule is essentially the same as in the case of insurance upon the ship, so far as concerns the consequences of an abandonment. In the case of Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. 193, 7 L. ed. 108, which has always been considered a leading one, this subject was fully considered and elaborately discussed in an opinion by Mr. Justice Story. The object of the suit was to determine the ownership of a certain fund which had been distributed by the commissioners appointed by the United States in fulfillment of its stipulation in the treaty with Spain in 1819 to make satisfaction of the claims of our citizens upon the latter country for captures and losses enumerated in the treaty. Vasse had underwritten policies on several vessels and cargoes, which had been captured and taken into Spanish ports. The vessels had been abandoned to him, and he had paid the losses to owners, long before the date of the treaty. A material question in the case was whether the money distributed by the commissioners to satisfy the claim for these losses belonged to the owners of the captured vessels or to Vasse, the underwriter. This depended on the effect of the abandonment. And it was held that by that act the right to every sort of indemnity which might thereafter be awarded on account of the loss by reason of which the abandonment was made passed from the insured to the underwriter; and the doctrine of text writers was cited and approved, to the effect that the rights which pass are not limited to the specific property abandoned, or its proceeds, but include also "whatever may be afterwards recovered or received, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or otherwise, as a compensation for the loss." Almost contemporaneously with that decision the same rule, in substance, was laid down by Chancellor Kent in the third volume of his Commentaries, at page 319, where he says, in speaking of abandonment: "In such cases the insurer stands in the place of the insured, and takes the subject to himself with all the chances of recovery and indemnity. A valid abandonment has a retrospective effect, and does of itself, and without any deed of cession, and prior to the actual payment of the loss, transfer the right of property to the insurer to the extent of the insurance; and if, after an abandonment, duly made and accepted, the ship should be recovered, and proceed and make a prosperous voyage, the insurer, as owner, would reap the profits." And in the note to this passage: "The benefit of the specie re- cuperandi passes, and all that may be collateral or incidental to the ownership."

It will be noticed that the chancellor uses the comprehensive expression "chances of recovery and indemnity" in describing the things which pass. Obviously, from that and the context, he intended to include every species of indemnity, and among these would be the obligation of the wrongdoer to make atonement to the owner of the vessel to the full extent of his loss. There have been many decisions in the Federal courts since that time involving collateral points, and sometimes the rule itself, but that has always been considered as having been settled by the early authorities. It would not be profitable at this day to undertake particular discussion of them in detail. Some of the cases are these: The Monticello v. Molaison, 17 How. 152, 15 L. ed. 68; The Potomac, 105 U. S. 635, sub nom. The Potomac v. Cannon, 26 L. ed. 1194; Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 28 L. ed. 527, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566; Phœnix Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 117 U. S. 312, 29 L. ed. 873, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 760, 1176; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co. 139 U. S. 235, 35 L. ed. 154, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 554; The Ann C. Pratt, 1 Curt. C. C. 343, Fed. Cas. No. 409; Gilchrist v. Chicago Ins. Co. 44 C. C. A. 43, 104 Fed. 566.

In the English courts there is an unbroken line of authority in support of the general rule above stated in regard to the effect of an abandonment for a constructive total loss. From among their modern decisions we cite, as illustrating the English doctrine: Yates v. Whyte, 4 Bing. N. C. 272; Cammell v. Sewell, 3 Hurlst. & N. 617; Miller v. Woodfall, 8 El. & Bl. 498; North of England Iron S. S. Ins. Asso. v. Armstrong, L. R. 5 Q. B. 244; Simpson v. Thomson, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 279; Scottish Marine Ins. Co. v. Turner, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 334, reprinted in 9 Scots Rev. Rep. 312; Sea Ins. Co. v. Hadden, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 706. The rule is thus laid down by Cockburn, Ch. J., in North of England Iron S. S. Ins. Asso. v. Armstrong, L. R. 5 Q. B. 244, 248: "In the case of a total loss, that whatever remains of the vessel in the shape of salvage, or whatever rights accrue to the owner of the thing insured and lost, they pass to the underwriter the moment he is called upon to satisfy the exigency of the policy, and does satisfy it."

In Simpson v. Thomson, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 279, the lord chancellor, Lord Cairns, delivering the judgment of the House of Lords, says that the insurer becomes "entitled to succeed to all the ways and means by which the person indemnified might have protected himself against or reimbursed himself for the loss. It is on this principle that the underwriters of a ship that has been lost are entitled to the ship in specie if they can find and recover it, and it is on the same principle that they can assert any right which the owner of the ship might have asserted against a wrongdoer for damage for the act which has caused the loss."

acquired on abandonment: "This cession or abandonment which accompanies a settlement gives to the insurers a right to all the advantages, direct and indirect, or ownership of the thing insured. Not only may they take possession of, sell, or otherwise dispose of the wreck or remains, but, if the assured is entitled, in virtue of the ownership had before, to any rights of action or recovery from third parties as for a contribution to general average, to recovery of damages against the wrongdoer in a collision suit, or the like, these rights pass by the abandonment to the underwriter."

Germane to the question we are considering, it should be noted that, having regard to the effect of an abandonment upon the right to recover freight, the doctrine is firmly established, both in this country and in England, that freight already earned at the time of the disaster on account of which the abandonment is made goes to the owner of the ship, or to the insurers of the freight if it be insured. This harmonizes with the rule, because in such case the right has matured, and is no longer an incident of the vessel. Where the freight is still pending, the English rule is (or has been) that, upon abandonment, the whole freight goes to the abandoner. This doctrine goes upon the ground that the right is immature at the time the voyage is interrupted, and therefore not detachable from the ship. On the other hand, many American authorities, basing their ruling upon what seemed to them a more equitable basis, have established a variation from the English practice by awarding the pending freight, where it has been finally matured by the underwriter, to him and to the owner of the vessel pro rata itineris which each has accomplished. This American rule recognizes the fundamental doctrine by dividing the earnings of the vessel at the date of the disaster, the division itself being a device of equity in favor of the owner and the insurer of freight against a strictly legal and technical consequence. So far as we know, there has been no decision in either country that upon abandonment the owner may still assert against his abandoner the right to the prospective earnings of the vessel. A case very nearly in point is Miller v. Woodfall, 8 El. & Bl. 498, where the insured, after an abandonment, had gotten the ship off, and had carried part of his goods on board to their destination. It was held that the abandoners of the ship were entitled to be allowed at the current rate of freight for the carriage of that part of the cargo taken by the ship into port. A case much relied on by the appellants, and thought to be decisive of this, is that of Sea Ins. Co. v. Hadden, L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 706, also reported in 5 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 230. But the case is distinguishable. The question there was whether the insurers were entitled to recover from the owner of the ship money decreed to him by reason of his having been deprived of profits under a contract of affreightment, upon which there was another insurance by other underwriters. Now, the contract of affreightment is not an incident of the ship. Freight is of itself, and independently of the ship, the subject of a contract of insurance. They are two entirely separate things, and there are many cases in the books where the courts have been employed in protecting the interests of the owner in respect of the contract of affreightment, and, through him, of insurers of freight, in cases of this sort; as in the case of Hickie v. Rodocanachi, 4 Hurlst. & N. 455, where Lord Bramwell observed, having reference to the fact that the captain had fulfilled for the owner the contract of affreightment, that the captain in such a case as the present acts for the owners of the ship, and not for the underwriters, and they are not entitled to any benefit from the freight acquired. The underwriters may, indeed, be entitled to advantages attached to the ship, but not to those arising from contracts, the fulfillment of which can be and is detached from the ship, which, as often happens, the shipowners may fulfil by another ship. Considerations of this kind lie at the bottom of the rule in this country that the owner of the ship cannot recover as damages arising from collision the freight arising on a charter party. This was the ground on which the judgment in Sea Ins. Co. v. Hadden was rested. Brett, M. R., in giving his opinion, after quoting what was said by Lord Bramwell in Hickie v. Rodocanachi, said: "If the vessel is insured by one set of underwriters, and the freight is insured by another set, then whatever is salvage from the loss of the ship goes to the underwriters of the ship, and whatever is salvage from the loss of the freight goes to the underwriters of the freight. How, then, are the damages which have been recovered in this case from the owners of the colliding vessel made up? They are made up of damages given in respect both of the loss of the ship and of the loss of freight. Therefore one set of damages ought to go to one set of underwriters, and the other set to the other. It seems to me to be conclusive that the underwriters on the ship cannot recover what they here claim, because it seems clear that this recovery of damages in respect of the loss of freight is not a salvage which is a salvage out of the loss of the ship."

The difference in the facts, and consequently in the principle of law applicable thereto, between that case and this, is obvious. The claim there in question was founded upon a subject which was held to be not an incident of the ownership of the vessel, and which had in fact been separated therefrom by the owner. The right of the underwriter on the ship was derived from the owner, and was affected by his status. If he could recover against the wrongdoer upon it, the damage would, as the master of the rolls said, go to the underwriters of the freight. Here the damages in question were not for the loss arising upon a charter party, but for the loss of the prospective earnings of the ship, the charter party being used as evidence merely upon the question as to how much they would probably have been worth. The earning power of the vessel was an incident inhering in her ownership. That earning power passed with the ship, and, as we have already seen, the abandonees were entitled to the use of it from the moment of the disaster. If the ship had not been completely disabled, but had remained in such plight that she could have completed her voyage, there could be no question but that her earnings subsequent to the collision would have belonged to the underwriters. If that had happened, it would pro tanto have diminished the amount recovered by the owners from the insurers. In point of fact, the injury was so grave as to completely disable the ship from earning anything during the time of her detention, and it is for precisely that period of time that the owners have recovered for her prospective earnings, and it is that sum which the underwriters claim was recovered in trust for them. We do not see how that claim can be denied without overturning the settled doctrines which apply to an abandonment. And there is really no hardship to the owners of the ship. The right to abandon as for a constructive total loss is a privilege given by the maritime law to enable the owner of the ship to forthwith realize the substance of the value of the lost vessel, so that he may reinvest it in another ship by purchase or charter, and continue in his enterprises. The exercise of that privilege casts upon the underwriter an extraordinary burden. Both parties have all these consequences in view when the contract of insurance is made. The vessel owner can never be compelled to abandon. When he does so, he acts upon an estimate of the whole situation, and all the consequences; and, of course, he will not exercise his privilege unless it is for his advantage. In such a case the right of the insurer does not depend upon the doctrine of subrogation, as that term is understood in courts of equity, and which is employed in working out the right of the insurer in cases of partial loss only. In such cases there is no change in the ownership of the vessel, and the right to its earnings continues with the owner as an incident of his ownership. On the other hand, when the ship is abandoned to the insurer, the title to the ship passes by assignment immediately to the insurer, as from the moment of the disaster, with every right which is incident to it. The distinction is an important one, though it is sometimes confused in the language of judicial opinions. Inasmuch as it is a consequence of the abandonment that the underwriter becomes substituted to all claims and remedies for the loss, in addition to the title to the ship itself, it is impossible to say that the owner may still recover to his own use damages which depend upon his right to continued ownership. We have not been referred to any case where this precise question has been determined, nor have we been able to find any, and this has been the reason for our discussion of the subject upon the reasons and analogies suggested by the authorities.

It is further contended that, notwithstanding the abandonment, the owners of the ship retained an interest proportionate to the difference between the amount of the insurance and her valuation, and that, consequently, they are entitled to share in the sum in controversy as in the nature of salvage. This contention rests upon the ground that this difference represents an uninsured interest in the vessel, or, to put it in the way which is suggested by counsel, an interest in respect to which the owners were their own insurers. But it is a mere figure of speech to say that the owner is the insurer of his own property. In reality the only insurance is that which is contracted for. Nor is it true that, because the insurance is for less than the value, the insurance rests upon some fractional part of the ownership. The whole vessel, the body and tackle, apparel, and other furniture," to use the language of the policies, is the subject of the insurance. When an abandonment takes place, the entire ownership passes; and it is usually stipulated, as it was here, that the notice thereof, if accepted, must be efficient to convey to and to vest in the insurers "an unencumbered and perfect title to the subject abandoned." There is no suggestion that some aliquot part of an ownership is to be assigned. The owner does not continue to be an owner as a tenant in common. In the present case, before the acceptance of the abandonment and settlement as for a total loss, the underwriters required the whole title to be conveyed to them, which was done. We think, however, that that would have been the result if no deed of cession had ever been executed.

This question has never been expressly decided by the supreme court though there are several cases which employ language which, we think, implies that the understanding of the court has been in accordance with the rule which we suppose to be the correct one. For instance, in view of the fact that insurance is not ordinarily for the full value, we should have anticipated a qualification in the statement of the rule as to what would pass by an abandonment, if the owner were recognized as remaining a tenant in common as to part of the ownership by reason of the insurance being for less than the value of the ship. The rule applied by the district court has on several occasions been held to be the true one by the Federal courts, of first instance, and has been recently affirmed by the circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion. Mutual Safety Ins. Co. v. The George, Olcott, 89, Fed. Cas. No. 9,981; The Mary E. Perewé, 15 Blatchf. 59, Fed. Cas. No. 9,207; The Manitoba, 2 Flipp. 241, 30 Fed. 129; The Burlington, 73 Fed. 258; Gilchrist v. Chicago Ins. Co. 44 C. C. A. 43, 104 Fed. 566. The rule is also recognized in The St. Johns, 101 Fed. 469. There is some disagreement in state decisions upon this point, but, so far as we know, there has never been any difference of opinion in the Federal courts. It seems to us that the maintenance of this claim of the owners would be to introduce a new doctrine into the law of abandonment, and one wholly inconsistent with its long-established principles.

Counsel for the underwriters refer, in support of their claim, to a clause in the policy which requires the insured, upon accepting payment for any damage or loss, to treat as assigned to them all rights to indemnity which the insured may have. But we think this language in the policy was employed to denote what should happen or result in cases of partial loss only, for in the preceding paragraph the subject of liability in case of abandonment for constructive total loss was fully provided for.

We think the decree of the court below, so far as it is appealed from, is correct, and it is accordingly affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

Simeon E. LEONARD, Pf. in Err.,
v.

ORIENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

(48 C. C. A. 369, 109 Fed. 286.)

Liability for loss resulting from destruction by fire of a building insured by a policy exempting the insurer from liability for loss caused by explosions of any kind (unless fire ensues, and in that event for the damage by fire only), and providing that if the building or any part thereof falls, except as the result of fire, the insurance shall immediately cease, will attach under the former clause, and not be defeated by the latter, where one corner of the building is knocked down by an explosion in a neighboring building, and fire immediately appears in the exposed part, caused either by the flame of the explosion or by fires liberated thereby in the building insured.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern Division of the Northern District of Illinois to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

Statement by Woods, Circuit Judge:

This is an action of assumpsit upon a policy of fire insurance issued by the Orient Insurance Company to Simeon E. Leonard, the plaintiff in error, upon a stock of seeds kept for sale in a six-story brick building, 40 feet wide, fronting on Lake street, between Des Plaines and Union streets, and extending back about 170 feet to Pearl street on the east, in Chicago. The total insurance was $76,500; the total loss, $127,833.88. Suits are pending upon the other policies. The goods were destroyed mainly by fire, but partly by the falling of the northwest corner of the building in which they were kept. Next to that building on the west was a blacksmith shop, a frame building 20 feet wide, and next to that on the west was the New England Mill, consisting of a three-story frame in front, next to Lake street, and a brick structure some stories higher in the rear. The evidence showed, or tended to show, that at 4:45 o'clock P. M. of November 1, 1899, an explosion occurred in the mill, caused probably by ignition of mill dust, or dust powder, and resulting in the instant demolition of the mill and blacksmith shop, and the tumbling down, a few moments later, of the northwest corner of the seed store. The fire, which followed the explosion, spread at once to the ruins of the mill and shop, and within two or three minutes—probably within a few seconds—fire appeared in the exposed part of the store, to which in all probability it communicated from the outside, though it might have originated from a stove or from burning gas jets in the office room on the ground floor. No witness testified to seeing unrestrained fire in the seed store before the falling of the corner of the building, and all the testimony touching the point tended to show that from the fall to the appearance of flame in that building there was a lapse of a few seconds, or minutes, as the witnesses more frequently but probably mistakenly expressed it. Following the explosion the air was full of dust and flame, which the strong wind blowing from the northwest, once the wall was down, doubtless carried into contact with the inflammable material in the store. The policy sued on insured "against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as [t]hereinafter provided." The exceptions pertinent here are as follows: "This company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war, or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority, or by theft, or by neglect of the insured to use all reasonable means to save and preserve the property at and after a fire, or when the property is endangered by fire in neighboring premises, or (unless fire ensues, and in that event for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind, or lightning; but liability for direct damage by lightning may be assumed by specific agreement hereon. If a building or any part thereof fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance by this policy on such building or its contents shall immediately cease." At the conclusion of the evidence offered by the plaintiff the court sustained the motion of the defendant for a peremptory instruction directing a verdict in its favor, and error is assigned upon that action. In explanation of the ruling the court said: "The case is one of very great importance. It is a question of interpretation that is not entirely covered by any authority I have found, and I have looked them over with some diligence, as called to my attention by your briefs. . . . I am well convinced that, unless you reject absolutely the condition contained in the 36th and 37th lines, there is no escape from the condition of the policy which declared it at an end,—the insurance at an end when the walls fall, except by fire. That the walls fell by the force of the explosion in the mill is the uncontradicted testimony. That being so, I can see no escape from the condition of the policy that there was no insurance upon the building at the instant the fire occurred which destroyed the property. I think there is no escape from the view that a verdict should be directed accordingly."

Argued before Woods, Jenkins, and Grosscup, Circuit Judges.

Messrs. Henry W. Magee and Myron H. Beach for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. D. J. Schuyler, Thomas Bates, and Monroe Tulkerson for defendant in error.

Woods, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In Dows v. Faneuil Hall Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 346, 34 Am. Rep. 384, where the action was upon fire policies containing a clause concerning explosions like that in the policy before us, it was said, on the authority of Scripture v. Lowell Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. 356, 57 Am. Dec. 111, that, "the explosion in the upper story having been caused by fire, the insurers, if no clause had been inserted restricting their liability for losses by explosion, would have been liable for the losses, whether by the explosion or by the subsequent fire, to the amount of the insurance." One of the policies also contained the provision, "If a building shall fall, except as the result of a fire, all insurance by this company on it or its contents shall immediately cease and determine," in respect to which it was said: "The question is whether this last provision is applicable to the facts of the case, and, in the opinion of a majority of the judges, it is not. The provision, being introduced by the insurers and for their benefit, is, by a familiar rule, to be construed, in case of ambiguity, most strongly against them. It appears to us to have had in view the case of a building falling by reason of inherent defects, or by the withdrawal of the necessary support, as by digging away the underlying or adjacent soil. It might, perhaps, include the case of a building thrown down by a storm or flood or earthquake. But it would be construing this provision too liberally in favor of the insurers to hold it to include the case of the destruction of a building by an explosion within the building itself, and of a fire immediately ensuing upon and connected with such an explosion, the measure of the liability for which has been carefully and precisely defined in the previous provision of the policy."

The fact that in the present case the explosion occurred outside of the building in which the insured goods were kept cannot affect the liability of the insurer, if otherwise liable, for the loss by fire which immediately ensued. If there had been no fall of the building or of any part of it, and the flame attending or ensuing upon the explosion had reached the insured goods through an open door or window, liability under the policy for the loss would be beyond dispute. Is it to be said that there is no liability simply because the first effect of the explosion was to break a passageway into the building for the fire which in a few moments followed? Confessedly, there would be liability if the flame had entered through any opening, caused or not caused by the explosion, if no part of the building had fallen; but should there be no liability if a piece of glass falling from a window shattered by the explosion had given admission to the flame? The language of the contract is clear that if any part of the building shall fall, except as the result of fire, all insurance on building or contents "shall immediately cease." The words are surely, as they have been declared to be, "terse and expressive." They are unqualified and universal, admitting of neither interpretation nor construction, and, if applicable, it would seem, should be allowed their literal significance. It is not to be said that they are applicable, and yet not to be applied literally. It may not be said that "any part" of a building must be deemed to mean an important part, or such a part as might cause, or be supposed likely to cause, or at least to enhance the danger of, loss by fire. "It was competent for these parties to fix the terms of their agreement." Where they wrote and subscribed "any part," they must be presumed to have meant any part, great or small, if observable or readily discoverable. Even if it could be said that the part must be large enough to cause, or to be likely to enter into, the risk of loss by fire, the qualification could mean little, because conditions are readily supposable, and are not improbable, in which the fall of material of small weight or bulk would be enough to start a fire. Not much is necessary to overturn a stove or to scatter the fire of an open grate or hearth, and still less to ignite a match. If there had been a window on the west side of the building in question, the falling of a shutter or of a pane of glass would probably have been followed by the same loss to the plaintiff in error which ensued upon the falling of the corner of the building. On the theory of strict adherence to the meaning of plain words, these propositions cannot well be denied; and upon that theory the case of Fred J. Kiesel & Co. v. Sun Ins. Office, 31 C. C. A. 515, 60 U. S. App. 10, 88 Fed. 243, is urged upon our attention in support of the ruling below. The case, however, is not in point. The policy there in suit contained the clauses now under consideration; but, there having been no explosion, the building fell, and the goods insured were burned, and the question was whether the fall was caused by the fire or by a gale of wind. It is perhaps worth while, however, to observe that the literal significance of the contract seems to have been departed from when it was said in the opinion that if the building "was on fire, and if it would have fallen by force of the wind if there had been no fire, then its fall could not be said to have been the result of the fire, and the defendant was not liable." Any question of non sequitur in the statement aside, it is certainly not inconsistent with the express terms of the contract that in such a case the insurer should be liable for the damage done before the fall occurs, though not caused by the fire. The insurance ceases only at the instant of the fall, and it follows, on a strict construction, that "the cause of the fall" can be the test of liability only from that instant. The case before us is one of destruction by fire, which immediately followed, and with propriety may be said to have been caused, by an explosion. Whether that explosion was caused by fire, it is not necessary for the present purpose to consider. See Briggs v. North American & M. Ins. Co. 53 N. Y. 446. The liability of the insurance company for fire immediately ensuing upon an "explosion of any kind or lightning" was "carefully and precisely defined" in a clause devoted to the subject; and we agree with the opinion in Dows v. Fancuil Hall Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 346, 34 Am. Rep. 384, that the succeeding clause, whatever its construction when applicable, should not be deemed "to include cases of destruction by explosion and by fire ensuing upon and immediately connected therewith." In this way the two clauses may well stand together, neither interfering with the legitimate office of the other; while if the latter is to be applied and enforced according to its literal meaning in every case where by reason of the explosion or otherwise the building, or a part of it, falls just before or during a fire, which otherwise would be within the contract, it will lead to results which the parties to policies may not both be supposed to anticipate, and which the courts need not and should not approve.

The judgment below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to grant a new trial.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

C. A. KING, Admr., etc., of J. W. Smith, Deceased, Plff. in Err.,

1. The circuit court of appeals may review the question whether or not a finding of facts in an action at law in the circuit court has any evidence to support it.
2. A gift of personalty placed in possession of a third person for delivery to the donee is not defeated by the fact that the delivery is not effected until the donor has become finally unconscious in his last illness.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain railroad bonds. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Gilbert, Circuit Judge, and Hawley and De Haven, District Judges.

Messrs. W. M. Cannon and Whitworth & Shurtleff, for plaintiff in error: The evidence falls far short of establishing a legal gift, even without considering the relation of trust and confidence existing between the parties.

White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 327, 49 Pac. 129, 52 Pac. 723; Gisselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8; Re Rathgeb, 125 Cal. 302, 57 Pac. 1010.

The law raises no presumptions in favor of gifts, and where a claim of gift is asserted after the donor's death it must be proved by clear and satisfactory evidence.

Denigan v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389; Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 127 Cal. 142, 59 Pac. 390.

But it takes other evidence than mere words to establish a gift. There must be a delivery or its equivalent.

Daniel v. Smith, 64 Cal. 346, 30 Pac. 575, 75 Cal. 547, 17 Pac. 683; Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 27 L. ed. 500, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 415; Dow v. Gould & C. Silver Min. Co. 31 Cal. 629; Zeller v. Jordan, 105 Cal. 143, 38 Pac. 640.

Death before completion of a gift by delivery will operate as a revocation.

So long as anything remains to be done to complete a gift it may be revoked by the donor.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1016; Ruis v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867.

NOTE.—For a case in this series as to validity of gift where deed is delivered to agent, who delivers to grantee after grantor's death, see Peck v. Rees (Utah) 13 L. R. A. 714.

As to delivery of personalty to third person to constitute sufficient delivery to complete gift, see Walker v. Walker (N. H.) 27 L. R. A. 799, 54 L. R. A.

When J. W. Smith last closed his eyes upon this world, the alleged gift was not complete.

Can it be possible, therefore, that a delivery afterwards, but before death succeeded the stupor, is of any legal effect or value to complete the gift or give it vitality?

Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 426, 53 Pac. 931; Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267.

A mere intention to give is a nullity.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1017.

Such a gift is presumptively illegal, and the burden is upon the donee to overcome it by clear and positive testimony.

14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1036; Stewart's Estate, 137 Pa. 175, 20 Atl. 554; Collins v. Collins (N. J. Eq.) 15 Atl. 849; Shirley v. Shirley, 92 Cal. 44, 27 Pac. 1087; White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 327, 49 Pac. 129, 52 Pac. 723; Denigun v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389.

An admission by the donor, although evidence to be weighed by the jury as tending to establish a gift, is not in itself sufficient proof of the gift.

Rooney v. Minor, 56 Vt. 527.

Messrs. Galpin & Bolton and L. S. B. Sawyer for defendants in error.

De Haven, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action at law, in the form of replevin, to recover 190 bonds of the California & Nevada Railroad, of the alleged value of $50,000. A jury trial was expressly waived by the parties, and the cause was tried by the circuit court without a jury, and upon such trial the court found:

"(2) The plaintiff on the 26th day of September, 1900, was, ever since has been, and still is the owner and entitled to possession of the property described in the complaint; and said property was at all of said dates and times of the value of forty-seven thousand five hundred dollars ($47,500). The defendants at all said dates and times unlawfully withheld and now retain the possession of said property described in plaintiff's complaint from the possession of the plaintiff."

As a conclusion of law from this and other findings not necessary to refer to, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from defendants the possession of the bonds described in the complaint, and judgment was thereupon entered in his favor and against the defendants in accordance with such conclusion of law. The case is brought here on writ of error by the defendant C. K. King, as administrator of the estate of J. W. Smith, deceased. There are fifteen formal assignments of error, all directed against the findings of fact, and the judgment based upon such findings. With the exception of the first, relating to the citizenship of the parties, and which is not insisted upon by the plaintiff in error, the assignments of error really present but two questions, stated in different form; one challenging the legal sufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding above set out, and the other the sufficiency of the findings to sustain the judgment. There is in the record a bill of exceptions containing the evidence given upon the trial, and which also shows that an exception to the above finding was taken by the plaintiff in error, upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support it. One of the assignments of error, and the only one which need be noticed, is as follows: "That the court erred in finding that the evidence was sufficient to show that plaintiff was at any of the times mentioned in the complaint the owner or entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint, or any part thereof."

1. It is urged by the defendant in error that this assignment of error presents a question of fact, which this court has no power to review, and, as we understand the argument, that the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions cannot be examined for the purpose of determining whether the finding excepted to is sustained by any legal evidence. We do not understand that the rule is as broad as this contention. The finding that the plaintiff in the action is the owner and entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint is clearly a general finding of the ultimate facts of ownership and right of possession, and is conclusive here, unless there was an entire want of evidence upon which to base it. The 7th Amendment to the Constitution declares that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

Section 649, Rev. Stat., provides: "Issues of fact in civil cases in any circuit court may be tried and determined by the court, without the intervention of a jury, whenever the parties or their attorneys of record file with the clerk a stipulation in writing waiving a jury. The finding of the court upon the facts, which may be either general or special, shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury."

The findings of the court when a jury has been waived having, under the statute, the same effect as the verdict of a jury, it follows that such findings cannot be otherwise re-examined "than according to the rules of the common law;" that is to say, either by the "granting of a new trial by the court where the issue was tried, or to which the record was properly returnable, or by the award of a venire facias de novo by an appellate court for some error of law which intervened in the proceedings." Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Pet. 433, 7 L. ed. 732; Miller v. Brooklyn L. Ins. Co. 12 Wall. 285, 20 L. ed. 398; Hathaway v. First Nat. Bank, 134 U. S. 494, 33 L. ed. 1004, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608, was an action at law tried by a United States circuit court without a jury, and brought to the Supreme Court on writ of error. Some of the assignments of error assailed certain findings of the court as not sustained by the evidence, and in passing upon the question so presented the Supreme Court said: "The first three assignments of error allege errors merely in the findings of fact by the court. Those errors are not subject to revision by this court if there was any evidence upon which such findings could be made."

In Stanley v. Albany County, 121 U. S. 535, 30 L. ed. 1000, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1234,—a case in which the same question was involved,—the rule, without its qualification, was thus stated by the Supreme Court: "Where a case is tried by the court without a jury its findings upon questions of fact are conclusive here, it matters not how convincing the argument that upon the evidence the findings should have been different." See also Ryan v. Carter, 93 U. S. 78, 23 L. ed. 807; Hepburn v. Dubois, 12 Pet. 345, 9 L. ed. 1111; Zeller v. Eckert, 4 How. 289, 11 L. ed. 979.

The law as declared in the foregoing cases is the rule by which this court must be governed in the matter now before it. The judgment of a circuit court of the United States in an action at law can only be reviewed in the circuit court of appeals by writ of error. Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing circuit courts of appeals (26 Stat. at L. 826). This writ brings up for review only errors of law apparent on the face of the record; and for this reason, and also because of the 7th Amendment to the Constitution, and § 649 of the Revised Statutes, the circuit court of appeals, in the decision of a case on writ of error, is necessarily confined to the consideration of questions of law arising upon the record. Hill v. Woodberry, 1 C. C. A. 206, 4 U. S. App. 68, 49 Fed. 138; Graham v. Earl, 34 C. C. A. 267, 48 U. S. App. 691, 92 Fed. 155; Syracuse Twp. v. Rollins, 44 C. C. A. 277, 104 Fed. 958. This rule, however, when properly understood, does not deny to that court the right to inquire whether there is any evidence to support a finding; for when a fact is found upon no evidence whatever, and the record shows that the finding was excepted to upon that ground, an error of law is presented. The Francis Wright, 105 U. S. 381, sub nom. Duncan v. The Francis Wright, 26 L. ed. 1100; The City of New York, 147 U. S. 72, sub nom. Alexandre v. Machan, 37 L. ed. 84, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211; Laing v. Rigney, 160 U. S. 531, 40 L. ed. 525, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 366; Mason v. Lord, 40 N. Y. 476. In the case last cited it was said by Grover, J.: "An appeal to this court can only be taken upon the law. The question, then, is whether finding a fact without any evidence to sustain it is an error of law. The statement of the question would seem to suggest the answer: A finding of facts must always be based upon evidence, and, where none is given tending to show an affirmative fact, it is contrary to law to find such fact against a party traversing it."

The Francis Wright, 105 U. S. 387, sub nom. Duncan v. The Francis Wright, 26 L. ed. 1101, was a cause in admiralty, and it was held in that case that the act of February 16, 1875 (18 Stat. at L. 315), limited 54 L. R. A.

the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in admiralty causes to a review of "questions of law arising on the record." The court, however, added: "It is undoubtedly true that if the circuit court neglects or refuses, on request, to make a finding one way or the other on a question of fact material to the determination of the cause, when evidence has been adduced on the subject, an exception to such refusal, taken in time, and properly presented by a bill of exceptions, may be considered here on appeal. So, too, if the court, against remonstrance, finds a material fact which is not supported by any evidence whatever, and exception is taken, a bill of exceptions may be used to bring up for review the ruling in that particular. In the one case the refusal to find would be equivalent to a ruling that the fact was immaterial; and in the other, that there was some evidence to prove what is found, when in truth there was none. Both these are questions of law, and proper subjects for review in an appellate court."

The Supreme Court, in Hepburn v. Dubois, 12 Pet. 345, 9 L. ed. 1111, in discussing the effect of a verdict, and to what extent the evidence upon which it was based may be considered upon a writ of error, said "that where the evidence in a cause conduces to prove a fact in issue before a jury, it is competent in law to establish such fact. A jury may infer any fact from such evidence which the law authorizes a court to infer on a demurrer to the evidence. After a verdict in favor of either party on the evidence, he has a right to demand of a court of error that they look to the evidence only, for only one purpose, and with the single eye to ascertain whether it was competent in law to authorize the jury to find the facts which make out the right of the party on a part or the whole of his case."

And in Laing v. Rigney, 160 U. S. 531, 40 L. ed. 525, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 366, the judgment of the supreme court of New York was reversed on error because a material fact upon which the judgment was based was without any evidence to sustain it. We think, therefore, that, upon the exceptions to the findings and the assignment of error above set out, we can look into the bill of exceptions for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any evidence before the circuit court having a legal tendency to prove the facts found by that court. The matter in issue related to the ownership of the bonds described in the complaint. The defendant in error claims title by gift from his deceased father, J. W. Smith. The plaintiff in error contends that no such gift was ever made, and claims the bonds as the administrator of the estate of the said J. W. Smith. The evidence contained in the bill of exceptions shows that at the time the gift is alleged to have been made on August 15, 1895, the bonds were held by Abner Doble in escrow, under an agreement by which they were to be delivered to one F. M. Smith upon payment of a stipulated sum of money. The rights of F. M. Smith under this agreement expired October 25, 1895. Of course, during the time they were in escrow there could be no manual delivery of the bonds to the defendant in error, and the evidence shows they were not in fact delivered to him by Doble until November 14, 1895. J. W. Smith, the alleged donor, died on November 15, 1895, and for a day or two previous to his death was unconscious. In support of his title the defendant in error offered in evidence a bill of sale to himself of the bonds in question, dated August 15, 1895, with proof tending to show that the same was signed and delivered to him by J. W. Smith. This instrument recited that the bonds were sold to the defendant in error "subject to the option given to F. M. Smith, which I also assign to C. H. Smith." Upon the question of the delivery of the bonds, Doble testified, in substance, that it was his impression that J. W. Smith, a short time before his death, told him that they belonged to the defendant in error, and to deliver the same to him, and the witness added, "I think that conversation was the groundwork of my delivering the bonds to his son." In addition to this, other witnesses testified to declarations made by J. W. Smith during his last sickness, and after August 15, 1895, to the effect that he had given the bonds to the defendant in error. It cannot be said that this evidence has no legal tendency to prove a gift of the bonds to the defendant in error. The fact that they were actually delivered to him while the donor was in a state of unconsciousness does not affect the question, if in fact the direction to deliver them to the defendant in error was given by the donor while he was capable of transacting business, and for the purpose of consummating the gift. Our conclusion upon this point is that there was evidence tending to show that defendant in error is the owner of the bonds in controversy, and that he acquired title thereto by gift from his father.

2. The findings are sufficient in law to support the judgment. This is so clear that no discussion of the question is necessary.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed; the mandate to issue forthwith.

PACIFIC POSTAL TELEGRAPH CABLE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

BANK OF PALO ALTO.

(48 C. C. A. 413, 109 Fed. 369.)

1. A telegraph company is liable for losses caused by a false telegram wilfully transmitted by an operator employed in its office, directing a bank to pay money on account of a correspondent bank.

2. Counsel fees expended in good faith in an effort to recover the money are not properly part of the damages to be recovered from a telegraph company by a bank which has been induced to pay out money by a false telegram forwarded by an employee of the company, either at common law or under a statute allowing as damages for the conversion of property a fair compensation for the money properly expended in pursuit of it.

NOTE.—As to liability of telegraph company for wilful act of its agent in sending false message, see, in this series, McCord v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Minn.) 1 L. R. A. 143.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of California to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages from defendant because of money erroneously paid out by plaintiff in response to a forged telegram sent by one of defendant's agents. Affirmed.

Statement by Hawley, District Judge:

Upon the trial of this case the court found, among other things: That on December 27, 1898, and for some time prior thereto, one Lee B. Minkler was in the employ of the defendant, as an operator, at its office in the city and county of San Francisco, and as such it was the duty and within the scope of his employment to send messages from the office of the company at San Francisco. That said company was known to the public and to the plaintiff to be operating a line of telegraph wires for the general transmission of messages between the city of Los Angeles, state of California, and the city and county of San Francisco, and between the last-named place and the town of Palo Alto. That prior to said date, and while the said Minkler was as aforesaid in the employ of defendant, the said Minkler made and entered into a criminal conspiracy with one Byron Hall Barclay for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff by causing the transmission of the false telegraphic order hereinafter mentioned, and for that purpose, and in pursuance thereof, and to that end, the said Minkler did on said date make criminal use of the instruments and wires of the defendant, and caused to be transmitted over the same, and to be delivered to plaintiff, the telegraphic message hereinafter referred to; that in transmitting the said false message the said Minkler acted in criminal violation of his duties as such operator, and the defendant had no notice, knowledge, or information of the conspiracy aforesaid, or of the carrying out of the same, or of the intention of said Minkler to perpetrate said, or any, fraud upon the plaintiff, except as the same was known to said Minkler. That all of said Minkler's conduct, acts, and doings aforesaid were wholly wilful, criminal, and in absolute violation of his duties as an operator or employee of the defendant, except that, if the said telegram had been genuine, it would have been within the scope of said Minkler's employment to transmit the same in the manner in which he did. That on said day said Minkler transmitted from San Francisco to plaintiff, at Palo Alto, a false telegraphic message in the words and figures, to wit:

Sent by M. Received by Ma. 15, paid. Dated, Los Angeles, 27. Received at Palo Alto Dec. 27, 1898.

To Bank of Palo Alto:

Please pay Harry L. Cator eight hundred and forty dollars. Waive identification. We remit to-day.

Farmers' and Merchants' Bank.

That said message was sent by said Minkler, while he was on duty as an operator of defendant, upon an instrument belonging to and in the office of defendant in San Francisco, over one of defendant's wires, connecting its office in San Francisco with its office in Palo Alto, was received by an operator of defendant in defendant's office in the last-named town upon one of defendant's instruments in the last-named office, and was transcribed and delivered to plaintiff by defendants' operator at Palo Alto. That, for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to part with its money, Minkler caused one Byron Hall Barclay to present himself to plaintiff at its place of business at Palo Alto, and represent to plaintiff that he was the party named as Harry L. Cator, and was entitled to receive the payment of said sum of money, and the said Barclay so represented to the plaintiff. That said representations were false, and were known by Minkler and Barclay to be false. That, believing said message to be true and genuine, and acting upon the same, the plaintiff paid to Barclay on the 27th day of December, 1898, the sum of $840 thereon. That plaintiff thereafter, on the 28th day of December, 1898, first learned that said representations were false, "and thereupon was compelled to and did immediately employ counsel to advise and direct plaintiff in the pursuit and recovery of, and to pursue and recover, on behalf of plaintiff, the said property fraudulently converted as aforesaid by defendant. That plaintiff properly expended in the pursuit of said property as aforesaid, and has paid for counsel fees, the sum of $250, $7.59 for telegraph and telephone messages, $18.05 for traveling expenses, and $2.70 for copying. That all of said sums are reasonable, and were necessarily and properly expended by plaintiff in pursuit of said property. . . . That, by reason of the premises, plaintiff has been and is damaged in the sum of $840, United States gold coin, with legal interest thereon from December 27, 1898, and also, by way of special damages, in said sum of $278.34, properly expended in pursuit of said property as aforesaid,"—and rendered judgment for said amount. 103 Fed. 841.

Eastin v. Bank of Stockton, 66 Cal. 123, 4 Pac. 1106.

Hawley, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The vital question involved in this case is whether or not a telegraph company can be held responsible in damages for the criminal use of its wires and instruments by a subordinate employee, to wit, a telegraph operator, as distinguished from the manager, agent, or superintendent of the business, acting in pursuance of a criminal conspiracy with an outside party, and in criminal violation of the duties of his position and employment. This question and the legal principles relating thereto are to some extent unusual, and are exceedingly interesting and important. The general rule as to the liability of a corporation for the acts of its agents, servants, or employees acting within the scope of their authority, and in the performance of duties regularly intrusted to them, is not called in question. In a certain sense it may be said that we are called upon to deal solely with the exceptions to the general rule. In another sense it may be said that the facts present the question whether telegraph corporations and companies stand upon a different plane from that of other corporations and companies engaged in other kinds of business. In any view which may be taken, grave responsibilities are involved. The decision in this case must be rendered with reference to the general principles of the law relating, by analogy or otherwise, to the particular facts and circumstances of this case, in order to reach the ends of justice and right between the parties. If there are no decided cases which march up to the standard of authority, binding upon this court, then sound reason, which is the soul of the law, must assert the rule which should govern and control cases of this character. The business of telegraph companies is in some respects different in its relations with the public from that of other corporations. It is important because of its instantaneous means of communication, and because it is intended to influence the action of the party to whom the telegram is directed. Such party is, in most cases, compelled to act upon the telegram which he receives, and has a right to trust to its correctness, and rely upon the representation made upon its face that the sender, whose name is signed to the message, has sent that particular telegram to the party named in the message. In these particulars, at least, it may be said that a telegraph company, in the eye of the law, stands in a position of its own.

Our attention has been called to numerous authorities where certain principles of law have been announced which, if not controlling upon the facts of this case, have more or less bearing upon the real issue herein, and are worthy of careful consideration. They have all been examined with care. Many of them will not be cited, and but few need be reviewed. There are but three telegraph cases which are specially relied upon, namely, Bank of California v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 52 Cal. 280; McCord v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Minn. 181, 1 L. R. A. 143, 39 N. W. 315; Elwood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140. It is proper to state that each of these cases is identical with the case in hand, in this: that the telegram was sent without authority, was false and forged; that the party sending it committed a criminal act; that the telegram upon its face appeared to be genuine and true, and was sent and received in the usual manner, and was calculated and intended to deceive and defraud the bank or party to whom it was directed. In the case of Bank of California v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 52 Cal. 280, the only distinguishable feature in the facts from this case is that the telegram was not sent by an employee of the telegraph company. In that case one Washburn was the sole agent of the telegraph company at Colusa, California, for the receipt and transmission of despatches over its telegraph wires. It also appears that he was at that time the agent for Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express, and acted as the agent of various insurance companies. In conducting his business he had in his employ a young man who went by the name of Crowell, who was a telegraph operator, and, in the line of his duties as an employee of Washburn, had free access to the office of the telegraph company, and to the apparatus therein for sending despatches, and was authorized by Washburn to send and receive despatches when he (Washburn) was absent. Availing himself of this authority, Crowell, during Washburn's absence, wrote out and sent over the wires the following false and forged telegram:

Colusa, Jan. 19, 1875.

To the Bank of California, San Francisco:

Pay Chas. H. Crowley twelve hundred dollars, gold.

[Signed] W. P. Harrington, Cashier.

Harrington was at that time the cashier of the Colusa County Bank, and well known to be such by the Bank of California. Crowell sent a telegram to himself at San Francisco, and then went to San Francisco, and procured the services of a friend who identified him, and drew the money from the bank and disappeared. The court held the telegraph company liable. It is true, as claimed by plaintiff in error, that the case virtually turned upon the ground that Washburn, the agent, was negligent in permitting Crowell, who had no authority from the telegraph company, to have access to the wires. In the course of the opinion the court, among other things, said: "If the fraudulent acts committed by Crowell had been done by Washburn, the defendant would have been liable to an action on the case. . . . If an agent of a telegraph company, whose duty it is to send genuine messages, shall wilfully and fraudulently send a despatch in the name of another, this wrong act is as much done 'in the course of his employment' as if he had negligently sent a forged message. To this extent the person receiving the despatch may depend on the guaranty of the company that their agent is faithful and honest; and he is equally damnified, whether the fraud is committed by the agent directly, or is successfully consummated by another by reason of the negligence of the agent. The agent is authorized to transmit messages, and the transmission of a false message, whether contrived by himself or contrived by another, and negligently sent by him, is within the course of his employment. . . . Washburn was engaged in his master's business, not his own. It was part of his duty to keep Crowell from using the wires. He failed to discharge this duty, and the principal is equally responsible whether the placing of Crowell in charge was a 'wrongful act committed as a part of the transaction of the business,' or was mere negligence."

In McCord v. Western U. Tele. Co. 39 Minn. 181, 1 L. R. A. 143, 39 N. W. 315, the only fact which distinguishes the case from this is that the false telegram was sent by the local agent of the telegraph company, instead of a mere employee of the company. The court held that a telegraph company is liable for the fraud and misfeasance of an agent intrusted with the duty of transmitting messages over its line, in sending a false and fraudulent message prepared by himself to a party who received the same in the usual course of business, and in good faith acts thereon to his damage; that where the local agent of a telegraph company, who was also agent of an express company at the same place, sent a forged despatch to a merchant in a neighboring city, requesting him to forward money to his correspondent at the former place, to use in buying grain, and the same was duly received, and the money in good faith forwarded by express in response to the telegram, but was intercepted and converted to his own use by the agent, the transmission of the forged despatch was the proximate cause of the loss; and that the corporation was liable, though an action might also have been maintained against the express company. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The principal contention of defendant is, however, that the corporation is not liable for the fraudulent and tortious act of the agent in sending the message, and that the maxim respondet superior does not apply in such a case, because the agent, in sending the despatch, was not acting for his master, but for himself and about his own business, and was in fact the sender, and to be treated as having transcended his authority, and as acting outside of and not in the course of his employment, nor in furtherance of his master's business. But the rule which fastens a liability upon the master to third persons for the wrongful and unauthorized act of his servant is not confined solely to that class of cases where the acts complained of are done in the course of the employment in furtherance of the master's business or interest. . . . The defendant selected its agent, placed him in charge of its business at the station in question, and authorized him to send messages over its line. Persons receiving despatches in the usual course of business, when there is nothing to excite suspicion, are entitled to rely upon the presumption that the agents intrusted with the performance of the business of the company have faithfully and honestly discharged the duty owed by it to its patrons, and that they would not knowingly send a false or forged message; and it would ordinarily be an unreasonable and impracticable rule to require the receiver of a despatch to investigate the question of the integrity and fidelity of the defendant's agents in the performance of their duties before acting. Whether the agent is unfaithful to his trust, or violates his duty to or disobeys the instructions of the company, its patrons may have no means of knowing. If the corporation fails in the performance of its duty through the neglect or fraud of the agent whom it has delegated to perform it, the master is responsible. It was the business of the agent to send despatches of a similar character, and such acts were within the scope of his employment, and the plaintiff could not know the circumstances that made the particular act wrongful and unauthorized. As to him, therefore, it must be deemed the act of the corporation. Bank of California v.

Western U. Telegr. Co. 52 Cal. 280; Booth v. Farmers' & M. Nat. Bank, 50 N. Y. 400."

In Elwood v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 45 N. Y. 549, 6 Am. Rep. 140, the only distinguishable facts from the present case were that the message was delivered to the telegraph operator by a third party, and that the question as to whether the act by which the plaintiff was injured was a wilful wrong of the defendant's operator was not properly before the court for decision. The court held that it was gross negligence in the operator at a telegraph station to send over the wires a message in the name of, and purporting to come from a cashier of, a bank, and to be dated at another station, at the request of a party known to the operator not to be such cashier, and presenting no evidence of authority to use his name, which message, addressed to a banking house, held out such party as entitled to credit for a large amount; and this negligence occurs so within the scope of the employment of such operator as to make the telegraph company liable to the person to whom such telegram was addressed for the damages occasioned by such negligence. The court, in the course of its opinion, said: "That the sending of such a message in the name of the cashier of a bank, at the request of the party who was thereby held out as entitled to credit for a large amount, without any evidence of his authority to use the name of the cashier,—it being dated at Erie, though known to have originated at Titusville,—was an act of gross negligence, is too clear to admit of argument. The act was done in the direct course of the employment of the agent. The agent was placed in the office, and in the control of the instruments, to use them in transmitting messages for a compensation. If the agent performed that duty in a negligent manner, whereby the plaintiff was injured, the principal is clearly liable. Transactions of the most important character are daily carried on by means of telegraphic communication, and the confidence which the public is invited to and does repose in the care with which the proprietors of these lines conduct the business is a source of large remuneration to such proprietors. They incur a corresponding degree of responsibility, and must be held to the exercise of such care and caution as it is in their power to employ, in order to avoid being made the instrument of deception and fraud."

Notwithstanding the slight difference in the facts in those cases from the one in hand, it is difficult, under the rules announced therein as to the liability of a telegraph company, to distinguish them from the present case in principle. In the action brought by the Bank of California, the telegram was not sent by the agent of the telegraph company, nor by an operator employed by that company. It is not as strong a case against the company as is presented by the facts in this case. Can it consistently be claimed that if the telegraph company in that case had employed Crowell as an operator, or authorized its agent, Washburn, to employ him, that it would thereby have been released from all liability because Crowell was a mere employee,—a telegraph operator,—not an agent? We think not. There are certain lines of business transacted by the telegraph company,—as, for instance, the purchase of goods and materials for use in its office,—where the company would be bound by acts of its agent; but the seller of the goods could not hold the company liable if the supplies were bought by a mere employee, without showing that he was authorized to make such purchases. But the principle which applies to such transactions has no relation to the business of the company in sending despatches over its wires. What is an operator employed for? What are his duties? But one answer can be given, viz., to send and receive messages in the regular order and manner of the business. Of course, it is his duty to send true messages, not false ones or forged ones. The same duty rests upon the agent. If either the agent or the operator should manufacture telegrams and send them over the company's lines, of the character of the telegram sent in the present case, they would be acting outside of the scope of their authority. But both would be acting in the direct course of their employment, viz., transmitting messages over the company's lines. The company is held liable because it has placed its agent and operator in charge of its appliances and instruments for the transmission of despatches over its lines, and authorized them to use the same. In the case of Elwood v. Western U. Telegr. Co., it was a mere operator, not the regular agent of the company, that sent the fraudulent despatch, for which the company was held liable. The court treated the operator as an agent of the company for the purpose of sending telegrams.

It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that when Minkler, the operator in its employ for the purpose of transmitting messages, criminally used its appliances, he was not acting as its servant; "that the relation of master and servant, as to that particular act, had ceased to exist, and it is immaterial that he used the instrument and wires of plaintiff in error in order to accomplish his criminal purpose." In support of this contention counsel confidently rely upon the principles announced in Stephenson v. Southern P. Co. 93 Cal. 558, 561, 15 L. R. A. 475, 29 Pac. 234, which it is claimed are directly in point, and conclusive of the question involved herein, in favor of the telegraph company. That action was brought and prosecuted against the railroad corporation to recover damages for an injury alleged to have been caused by the unnecessary and wanton act of the engineer of a yard engine, who was an employee of the railroad corporation, in blowing the whistle and moving his engine in such a manner as to frighten the passengers in a horse street car, and to cause one of them (the plaintiff) to jump out, whereby she received an injury. The court held, upon the particular facts disclosed by the record in that case, that the plaintiff could not recover damages against the railroad company for the wrongful and wanton acts of its engineer, because he "was not acting within the scope of his employment." If an agent or employee, not in the line of his duty, or within the scope of his agency or employment, does an act wholly outside of the general business of the corporation, and in no manner having any connection therewith, the corporation cannot be held liable for his acts. But that case does not decide that a corporation cannot in any case, upon any state of facts, be held liable for the wanton and malicious acts of agents or employees while engaged in the line of duty they were employed to perform. "A principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business." 2 Deering, Anno. Code, § 2338; Story, Agency, § 452; Reynolds v. Witte, 13 S. C. 5, 16, 36 Am. Rep. 678; Brooke v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 108 Pa. 530, 545, 546, 56 Am. Rep. 235, 1 Atl. 200.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 109, 37 L. ed. 97, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261, the court said: "A corporation is doubtless liable, like an individual, to make compensation for any tort committed by an agent in the course of his employment, although the act is done wantonly and recklessly, or against the express orders of the principal. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 468, 14 L. ed. 502; New Jersey S. B. Co. v. Brockett, 121 U. S. 637, 30 L. ed. 1049, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030; Howe v. Neimarch, 12 Allen, 49; Romaden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. 117, 6 Am. Rep. 200."

See also Trabing v. California Nav. & Improv. Co. 121 Cal. 137, 140, 53 Pac. 644, and authorities there cited.

Numerous other cases might be cited where corporations transacting different kinds of business have been held liable for the wrongful, tortious, malicious, and illegal acts of their agents, servants, and employees, without reference to their grade or position. Especially is this true in all cases like the present, where the business with which the agent, servant, or employee is intrusted involves a duty owed by the corporation to the public or third persons. If the agent or servant, while so employed by the corporation, by his wrongful and malicious act occasions a violation of that duty, or an injury or loss to the person interested in its faithful performance by or on behalf of the corporation, the principal is held liable for the breach of it. This general principle is announced in all the telegraph cases heretofore cited. It seems to be deeply rooted in the groundwork of the law, and ought not to be frittered away by ingenious argument or splitting of hairs upon nicely drawn distinctions of facts which do not create any substantial distinction in the principle of law involved. The contention that in the line of duty in the transmission of messages there is a distinction that ought to be drawn between the agent of the corporation and a mere operator is, when the duties of each in this respect are considered, to say the least, very subtle and refined. It stands substantially on the same plane as the argument that at the time an agent or operator conceives the idea to commit a wrongful act, and starts to carry out his purpose, he thereby immediately separates himself from the company's service. This is to refine the distinction sought to be made beyond the line of safety and of sound law. But it is argued by the plaintiff in error that this principle does not apply in cases of crimes committed by the agent or employee. Why not? It is broad, clear, and comprehensive, and, as before stated, it applies to all cases. As was said by Cooley in his work on Torts, 2d ed. 629: "The test of the master's responsibility is not the motive of the servant, but whether that which he did was something his employment contemplated, and something which, if he should do it lawfully, he might do in the employer's name." A crime was committed by the agent of the telegraph company in McClord v. Western U. Tele. Co. 30 Minn. 181, 1 L. R. A. 143, 39 N. W. 315. A crime was committed by the operator employed by the agent of the telegraph company in Bank of California v. Western U. Tele. Co. A crime was committed by a third person in the case of Elwood v. Western U. Tele. Co. In each of these cases the telegraph company was held responsible. In Dougherty v. Wells, F. & Co. 7 Nev. 368, 373, a crime was committed by an agent, for which the company was held responsible. In that case the agent of the express company had received from the plaintiff an old certificate of deposit for $1,000, with the request that it should be forwarded to San Francisco, and there exchanged for a new certificate of deposit from the office of the company in San Francisco. Instead of complying with these instructions, the agent collected the money on the old certificate and appropriated it to his own use. He embezzled it without the knowledge, consent, or authority of the express company. It was an act wholly without the scope of his agency. The contention of counsel for the express company was that it could not be held responsible for the crime committed by its agent; that the agent's acts were not within the scope of his agency. Of course, he was not authorized by the company to steal or embezzle the money or property of third persons doing business with the company. The court, however, held the company liable, "not upon the rule that the agent acted for the principal in that particular transaction, but because he is employed by the principal in that character of business, and is so held out as a person authorized and fully to be trusted therein. When the agent in such case does an act which is apparently within the general scope of his authority, although not so in fact, if the principal were not held liable for the act, a third person, who had reason to believe that the agent was reliable, and possessed authority in the particular matter from the general character of his employment, might suffer loss; hence the law holds the principal liable, upon the ground that he, rather than a third person equally innocent, should suffer."

In holding the telegraph company liable for the wrongful, tortious, and criminal acts of Minkler, we are not called upon to make any departure from the established principles of the law. No additional or independent reasoning is required to show that the rule as announced in the telegraph cases is sound and just. Its foundation is based on the principle, often applied by the courts in a great variety of cases, that, if one of two innocent persons must suffer loss by the act of a third, he who put it in the power of the third person to do such act should be compelled to sustain the loss occasioned by its commission.

2. The other question presented by the assignments of error relates to the measure of damages: Did the court err in allowing the bank $250, special damages for counsel fees which were expended by it in the pursuit of the property before the commencement of this action? The record shows that the fees expended by the bank resulted in securing from Barclay nearly the whole amount of money he had wrongfully received from the bank by means of the false and fraudulent telegram sent by Minkler, and was a benefit, instead of a loss, to the telegraph company. Notwithstanding this fact, it is clear to our minds that the bank is not entitled to recover it, as special damages, unless it is authorized to do so by the provisions of § 3336 of the Civil Code of California, which reads as follows: "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be (1) the value of the property at the time of the conversion . . . (2) a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property."

It is admitted that the question whether the damages may include counsel fees in an action of this character has never been definitely decided by the state court in its interpretation of § 3336. In so far as they have any bearing upon the question, the intimations are all adverse to the contention of the defendant in error. Kelly v. McKibben, 54 Cal. 192, 195; McDonald v. McConkey, 57 Cal. 325; Redington v. Numan, 60 Cal. 632, 639; Greenbaum v. Martinez, 86 Cal. 459, 463, 25 Pac. 12; Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857; Spooner v. Cady (Cal.) 44 Pac. 1018; Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 62 Pac. 395. What is the character of this action? Should it be treated as an action to recover damages against the telegraph company for the wanton, wilful, malicious, and criminal act and injury committed by its servant, or should it be treated as an ordinary action for the wrongful conversion of property? We are of opinion that the character of the action must be determined by the facts set forth in the complaint, not by the name that counsel may call it. The defendant in error was never in the possession of the money obtained by Barclay, to which the plaintiff in error was entitled. It did not take the money from the possession of the bank. It did not request the bank to employ counsel in the pursuit of the property. In the light of the facts set forth in the complaint, we are of opinion that this is an action to recover damages for the wrongful and illegal act committed by Minkler, the telegraph operator, in the employ of the telegraph company. The bank was injured to the extent of $840, and legal interest thereon up to the time of recovery, for which the telegraph company is held liable. The bank was not compelled to employ counsel or expend any money in the pursuit of Barclay to obtain the money illegally procured by him by means of the false telegram sent by Minkler, in order to enable it to recover the amount from the bank. The telegraph company's liability was complete when Barclay, alias Cator, obtained the money from the bank on the telegram. Whatever the bank thereafter expended in pursuing the man that obtained the money, and in getting from him the greater amount thereof, was the voluntary action of the bank, for which it is not entitled to recover from the telegraph company. The telegraph company did not convert the money to its own use. It was not claiming this property as its own. In our opinion, § 3336 is intended to apply to ordinary common-law or Code actions for the wrongful conversion of property, pure and simple, and was never intended to apply to an action like the present, by whatever general name it may be called. It does not apply to an action of replevin. In Hays v. Windsor, 130 Cal. 230, 62 Pac. 395, which was an action to recover the possession of grain of which plaintiff alleged ownership and right of possession, the court, among other things, said: "We do not think the prevailing party in a replevin action can recover attorney's fees as damages for the detention, or as damages for taking and withholding the property (Code Civ. Proc. § 667); nor are such fees to be included as part of the damages to be measured by § 3336 of the Civil Code."

The action taken by the bank in employing counsel to secure the arrest of the real criminals, and, if possible, to obtain the money from them, was evidently taken in good faith, and exhibited a commendable spirit in the interest of public justice. But our attention has not been directed to any principle of law that would hold the telegraph company liable therefor.

The Circuit Court is therefore directed to modify its judgment herein by striking out therefrom the amount of $250 allowed for counsel fees in the pursuit of the property, and with this modification the judgment is affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

REDLANDS ORANGE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION, Appt.,

v.

John GORMAN, Respnt.

When time is made of the essence of a contract for the shipment of oranges under a contract of sale, acceptance of them when shipped after the stipulated time will not waive a right to damages caused by the delay.

CERTIFICATION by the St. Louis Court of Appeals for the opinion of the Supreme Court of a case in which it had affirmed a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis allowing a counter-claim for breach of contract in an action brought to recover the contract price of oranges sold and delivered. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. R. Wilkey for appellant.

Mr. D. P. Dyer for respondent.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause has been certified to this court by the St. Louis court of appeals because Judge Bond, one of the judges of said court, considered the opinion of the majority of the judges of that court to be in conflict with a decision of this court. The facts appear in the opinion of Judge Biggs. His opinion is as follows:

"The plaintiff sues for $486.50. The de-

NOTE.—Effect of acceptance of goods as a waiver of damages for delay in delivery.

The claim has frequently been made that a vendee, by accepting goods, waives his right to recover from his vendor the damages sustained by reason of a delay in the delivery of such goods. But it has been said that the mere acceptance of the goods after the expiration of the time fixed in the contract of sale for their delivery does not preclude the vendee from subsequently suing to recover the damages resulting to them by reason of the non-delivery from the time of the default up to the date of acceptance, nor from recouping, when sued by the vendors, those damages against the latter's claim for the purchase money. Bagby v. Walker, 78 Md. 239, 27 Atl. 1033.

And it has been held that a vendee does not, by accepting the goods at a later date than that fixed for delivery by the agreement between the parties, waive his right to recover damages arising out of such delay. Dignan v. Spurr, 3 Wash. 315, 28 Pac. 529.

And that the acceptance by a vendee of logs which were not delivered until the next season after they should have been delivered does not cut off the right of the vendee to counterclaim the damages suffered by reason of such delay. Whalon v. Aldrich, 8 Minn. 349, Gil. 305.

And that the acceptance of a ferry boat after the time fixed for its delivery is not an absolute waiver of the damages sustained by the delay. Hansen v. Kirtley, 11 Iowa, 565.

And though a vendee, by accepting and using the goods after the time fixed for their delivery, waives the stipulation as to time so far as the right of the vendor to recover the agreed price is concerned, he is entitled to recoup the damages incurred by reason of the delay in delivery. Jeffrey Mfg. Co. v. Central Coal & I. Co. 93 Fed. 408; Phillips & C. Const. R. Co. v. Seymour, 91 U. S. 646, 23 L. ed. 341.

Some of the cases qualify the rule by stating that the mere acceptance of a purchased article after the agreed time for delivery has elapsed does not constitute a waiver of damages for the delay unless such acceptance is attended with such circumstances as manifest an intention on the part of the buyer to waive such damages. Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463; Belcher v. Sellards, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1571, 43 S. W. 676.

Under this rule contractors, engaged in the construction of a public sewer for the completion of which they have given bonds, do not, by accepting sewer brick after the time for delivery has passed from their vendor, from whom alone they could obtain brick of the requisite quality, waive the right to recoup damages for the delay in a suit by the vendor to recover the purchase price. Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463.

And no intention on the part of a vendee of rafts of logs to waive his right to counterclaim the damages suffered by reason of delay in delivery in a suit to recover the purchase price can be inferred from his acceptance of the logs after the time specified for delivery, where he had been compelled to advance a sum of money to the creditors of the vendor, who was insolvent, in order to have the logs put into the water and rafted, as under such circumstances the vendee had no other means of saving himself and preventing the loss of the money he had already advanced, except to take the logs when they were finally delivered. Belcher v. Sellards, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1571, 43 S. W. 676.

In Rockwell Mfg. Co. v. Cambridge Springs Co. 191 Pa. 386, 43 Atl. 327, the court held that an affidavit of defense in an action to recover the purchase price of goods sold was sufficient where it stated that the defendant had suffered great loss and inconvenience in its business by reason of the vendor's failure to deliver the goods within the time agreed upon, and alleged the impossibility of obtaining goods sufficient of the kind and quality to fill the order and thus avoid delay, notwithstanding that the rule was settled in Pennsylvania that the vendee cannot, after having accepted goods contracted for after the time agreed upon for delivery, set up a delay as a defense to a recovery for the price thereof. The court said: "To say that a vendor can never become responsible for damages by reason of his delays would be radical, and if he might ever be so held we think it is under just such circumstances as are recited in this affidavit."

But only peculiar circumstances will justify the claim of vendees of goods who have accepted them after default by the vendor as to time of delivery to set off the damages caused by such delay, and such circumstances are neither alleged nor suggested by an affidavit of defense to an action to recover the purchase price of a pump which does not allege that the pump was to be manufactured specially, or was of any new or peculiar pattern, and does not intimate that one similar or as fully fit for the purpose intended could not have been obtained at once elsewhere and loss have been thus avoided, as the duty of the vendees under such circumstances was to supply themselves with another pump from some other source when the fendant set up in his answer a counterclaim for $450 as damages growing out of the failure of the plaintiff to ship the goods within the time stipulated in the contract. A jury was waived, and the cause submitted to the court on the following agreed statement of facts: '(1) The plaintiff is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California. The defendant is a citizen of the state of Missouri, and a resident of the city of St. Louis, and engaged in the business of a merchant at said city under the name and style of John Gorman & Bro. (2) On the 19th day of December, 1895, the plaintiff contracted to sell to the defendant two car loads of oranges, to wit, one car to contain 300 boxes of fancy Redland navel oranges, at the price of $2.50 per box; the other car to contain 300 boxes of fancy Redland seedling oranges at the price of $1.75 per box. (3) The plaintiff, at the time of said sale, specially agreed with the defendant as part of said contract to deliver said oranges free on board of railroad cars at Redlands, California, and to cause the same to be shipped to the defendant not later than December 21, 1895, as the defendant desired the oranges at St. Louis as early as possible, of which the plaintiff was at the time of said contract informed. (4) The said oranges were not delivered on said cars by the plaintiff on the 21st of December, 1895, and were not shipped to the defendant on that date, but said oranges were (without the knowledge or consent of the defendant) delivered by plaintiff on board of cars at Redlands, and by him caused to be shipped to the defendant on the 23d and 24th days of December, 1895; one of said cars being loaded and shipped on the 23d and the othone they ordered from the vendor failed to arrive promptly. Blakeslee Mfg. Co. v. Hilton, 5 Pa. Super. Ct. 184.

In a few cases the fact that the damages are lessened by such acceptance has been regarded as important. Thus, in Halstead Lumber Co. v. Sutton, 46 Kan. 192, 28 Pac. 444, the court, in holding that the mere acceptance of lumber at a later date than that agreed upon in the contract of sale did not amount to a waiver of the right to counterclaim, in a suit for the purchase price, the damages suffered by reason of the delay, relied on the fact that the acceptance and use of the lumber lessened the injury to the vendees, and correspondingly reduced the vendor's liability. It appeared that the lumber was of such a character as could not be procured in the market at the place of delivery, and that the owners of the buildings for whom it was purchased were daily incurring expense by the failure of the vendor to provide the lumber at the time specified. The court said that under such circumstances it was the duty of the vendees to make the injury as light as possible by taking and using the lumber upon its arrival, and that to have returned the lumber would not have lessened the damages which had already accrued, but would have aggravated the injury and enhanced the vendor's liability.

So, in Van Winkle v. Wilkins, 81 Ga. 104, 7 S. E. 644, which was an action to recover the contract price of machinery sold for a cotton-seed-oil mill, the court, in allowing damages resulting from its nondelivery in due time by way of recoupment, notwithstanding the objection that receiving the machinery was a waiver of such damages, said: "As to the damages resulting from delay, these had already been sustained when the mill was received; its reception, in so far as it affected them at all, could only hinder more from accruing; it certainly could not increase them. There was no inconsistency between the reception of the machinery and retention of the claim for damages on account of delay to furnish it by the time stipulated. To hold that there was a waiver by implication would be very unreasonable."

It has even been held error to charge the jury, in an action to recover the purchase price of building material in which defendant counterclaimed damages sustained by reason of nondelivery within the time agreed upon, that they had a right to consider whether the receipt of the goods was not a waiver of any claim for damages. Gaylord v. Karst, 43 N. Y. S. R. 531, 17 N. Y. Supp. 720. The court said that the charge obviously had "no other purport than to instruct the jury that if they found the defendant consented in April to accept future delivery of the building material, which plaintiffs had originally agreed to deliver on the 4th of the previous month, they were at liberty to find further that defendant had thereby waived all claim for damages accruing to him from plaintiff's default in delivery by the time first appointed; and as this seems to be in direct conflict with the law as declared by the court of appeals in Ruff v. Rinaldo, 55 N. Y. 664, and McMaster v. State, 108 N. Y. 542, 15 N. E. 417, it is impossible to escape from the conclusion that the charge was erroneous and the exception thereto well taken. That the defendant was prejudiced by this error is a proposition the validity of which is apparent upon its mere assertion, as the error vitally affected the meritorious consideration by the jury of defendant's counterclaim."

But it was held in Hansen v. Kirtley, 11 Iowa, 565, that the acceptance of the goods after the time fixed for delivery may be considered by the jury as evidence of a waiver of the damages sustained by the delay, but that its weight must depend upon the circumstances of the case.

And in a suit on a promissory note given for the iron work and cells for a jail, the action of the court in charging the jury that the acceptance by the vendee of such articles as they were delivered, together with the payment of a portion of the purchase price at that time, and the giving of the note sued upon for the balance thereof, amounted to a waiver of any damages that might have accrued for any failure to perform the contract at the time originally contracted for, was, on appeal, held to be error upon the ground that no such conclusive effect could be given to the transaction, and the question was one for the jury, and not for the judge, to decide. Strain v. Pauley Jail Bldg. & Mfg. Co. 80 Tex. 622, 16 S. W. 625. See also infra, Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463; Merrimack Mfg. Co. v. Quintard, 107 Mass. 127; Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene, 406, 43 Am. Dec. 387.

It seems impossible to reconcile Gaylord v. Karst, 43 N. Y. S. R. 531, 17 N. Y. Supp. 720, supra, with the other cases from the New York courts hereinafter cited, and a reference to the two cases in the court of appeals on which that court relied will show that they give little or no support to this decision. Ruff v. Rinaldo, 55 N. Y. 664, was an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien in which the court held that the owner of the building, by permitting the contractor to complete his contract to do the mason work after the time for performance had expired, did not thereby waive his right to the damages sustained by reason of the delay. McMaster v. State, 108 N. Y. 542, 15 N. E.

er on the 24th day of December, 1895. (5) At the time when said oranges arrived at St. Louis, and when they were delivered to the defendant, the market value of said oranges was $450 less than it was at any time at which said oranges would have arrived at St. Louis, or at which they would have been delivered to the defendant if they had been shipped within the time provided by said contract. (6) The defendant received notice by letter from the plaintiff two days prior to the arrival of said oranges in St. Louis of the dates at which the same had actually been delivered at and shipped from Redlands, California. (7) Upon the arrival of said oranges at St. Louis, the defendant, having notice of shipment as aforesaid, accepted the same without objection or protest. (8) The contract price of the oranges actually shipped as aforesaid amounted in the aggregate to the sum of $1,236. The defendant had paid to plaintiff of said amount the sum of $749.50, and refused, and still refuses, to pay the balance, to wit, $486.50, being the amount herein sued for.

(9) It is agreed, if the defendant is entitled to any damages on his counterclaim, the amount of $450 shall be allowed therefor, and in such case the judgment shall be in favor of plaintiff for $36.50 and costs; otherwise, the judgment shall be for $486, with interest from the 1st of January, 1896, and costs.' The court allowed the defendant's counterclaim and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for $36.50, and for costs. The plaintiff has appealed.

417, was an appeal from an award of damages by the board of claims for the breach by the state of a contract with plaintiff's assignors for work, labor, and materials for building a state asylum for the insane. The state claimed that the contractors, by furnishing materials after a change by the state in the contract, and by receiving pay therefor, waived any claim for damages by reason of such change. The court said: "The contention that where there is a breach of contract by one party, and the other thereafter is permitted to perform the same in part, receiving the contract price for such part performance, the injured party thereby waives or releases his right to damages for the breach, has no foundation in reason or authority. It is undoubtedly the rule that where one party to a contract breaks the same, the other party may stop and refuse further performance. But instead of doing so he may perform so far as he is permitted and then claim the damages he has suffered from the breach."

The rule laid down in the cases thus far considered has not met with the approval of all the courts. On the contrary, it has been held that a vendee of logs, by accepting them after the time fixed for delivery in the contract of sale, waives his right in an action for the purchase price to recoup the damages on account of the failure of the vendor to deliver within that time. Fraser v. Ross, 1 Penn. (Del.) 348, 41 Atl. 204.

And the acceptance by the vendee of goods after the time fixed for delivery seems to have been regarded in Toplits v. King Bridge Co. 20 Misc. 576, 46 N. Y. Supp. 418, as such a waiver of strict performance as would defeat his right to counterclaim damages for the delay in delivery in an action to recover the purchase price.

So, a vendee, by accepting goods delivered after the day agreed upon without making any objection on that ground, waives any claim for damages from that source. Pomeroy v. Shaw, 2 Daly, 267; Bock v. Healy, 8 Daly, 156; Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Hutchins, 65 Minn. 89, 67 N. W. 807.

This principle was applied in an action by a vendor to recover possession of the property on chattel mortgage given by the vendee to secure the payment of the purchase price with the result of denying the right of the vendee to prove the damages sustained by reason of the vendor's failure to deliver the goods at the time agreed upon, where the vendee accepted the property and provided for payment therefor according to the terms of the contract, with no reservation of the right to claim damages caused by the delay. Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Co. v. Hutchins, 65 Minn. 89, 67 N. W. 807.

So, in an action to recover the unpaid balance of the purchase price of fruit trees the vendee's claim for damages because of delay in packing and delivering the trees was denied where they waited until the trees were packed ready for delivery, and then accepted them without requiring the vendor to become responsible for any losses which they might sustain in consequence of the delay. Baker v. Henderson, 24 Wis. 509. The court said: "They might have refused to take the trees, but with full knowledge of all the facts saw fit to accept them in fulfillment of the contract, and cannot now complain that they have sustained damages."

An absolute and unqualified acceptance of goods by the vendee without any complaint or suggestion of any violation of the contract in respect to the time of delivery—especially where payment is offered without complaint on that ground—amounts to a waiver of the right to claim damages for the delay. Roby v. Reynolds, 65 Hun, 486, 20 N. Y. Supp. 336. But see Gaylord v. Karst, 43 N. Y. S. E. 531, 17 N. Y. Supp. 720, supra.

In Reld v. Field, 83 Va. 26, 1 S. E. 395, which was an action on a promissory note, defendant's plea of equitable set-off based upon the failure of the vendor of the goods for which the note was given to deliver within the time specified in the contract of sale was held insufficient as against a demurrer on the ground that, as it showed that defendant had accepted delivery at a later date, and had executed the note sued on after the breach, defendant by such plea virtually admitted a waiver of such defense.

But the failure of the vendee at the time of accepting dredging machinery manufactured and delivered under a contract of sale to reserve the right to complain because of the delay in delivery does not seem to have been regarded important in Industrial Works v. Mitchell, 114 Mich. 29, 72 N. W. 25, which was an action on notes given for the purchase price in which the vendee was permitted to recoup the damages occasioned by the delay in not furnishing the machinery within the time prescribed. By the terms of the contract in this case a large cash payment was to be made on March 1st, which was also the day fixed for delivery. This payment was made March 4th without regard to the actual delivery, which was not made until about thirty days later. The court said that acceptance of the machinery under such circumstances was practically an acceptance under compulsion, and that the giving of the notes was not conclusive of an intention to waive the claim for damages.

And in an action to recover the purchase price of building stone under a contract to deliver as needed by the vendee all the stone necessary

"The position of the appellant is that, when goods are delivered out of time, and the vendee accepts them without protest, he thereby waives his right to damages resulting from the breach of the contract, except where the goods are accepted of necessity; that is, where the surrounding circumstances are such as to make it necessary for him to accept in order to avoid the accumulation of much greater damage. We cannot accede to this view of the law. We believe the law to be that, where time is made the essence of the contract, delay beyond the stipulated time in the shipment or delivery of goods does not preclude the vendee from accepting them. If he does so, and is damaged on account of the delay, and he has paid the purchase money, he may bring this action, and recover his damage. If he has not so paid, he may recoup his damage when sued for the purchase price. The authorities treat such a stipulation in the name of a warranty or condition precedent that the goods will be shipped or delivered within the stipulated time. Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 616. To hold that in such case an acceptance out of time, without objection or protest, is a waiver by the vendee of his claim for damages resulting from the violation of the agreement, is, to our minds, unreasonable. With equal reason it could be said that where goods are bought with an express warranty of quality, and goods of an inferior quality are accepted by the vendee, he thereby waives his right to rely on the warranty. All of the authorities are against that proposition. Our views find ample support in the authorities. Lord for the erection of a county jail which he had contracted to build, the latter may counterclaim the damages sustained by reason of delay in delivery, even though he received and used what was delivered without objection or notice that he would claim such damages. Schweickhart v. Stuewe, 71 Wis. 1, 36 N. W. 405.

So, in an action for the breach of a contract to make and set up on a steamboat engines and other machinery suitable for propelling the same, and for damages for delay and defective construction, such damages were deemed recoverable, notwithstanding a contention of counsel that the machinery was accepted and reduced to use by the plaintiff without any sufficient notice that he would claim damages. Fiak v. Tank, 12 Wis. 808, 78 Am. Dec. 787. The court said: "We were at first in doubt whether the plaintiff's claim for board and wages of seamen should not be confined to such time as was lost after the machinery was delivered and up to and including a reasonable time for supplying other, on the ground of his right, upon the failure of the defendants to furnish it on the 1st of August, to consider the contract at an end and to proceed to supply himself elsewhere; and because his waiver of performance as to time might be considered an abandonment of any claim for damages on that account. But on further consideration we are satisfied this would be wrong. A waiver in such cases is made for the benefit of the party in default, and, as against him, should be construed strictly and liberally in favor of the party making it. It is supposed to be granted at the request of the party indulged, and should be confined to the precise right waived (which in this case was the right to refuse the machinery after the day), and should not be extended to collateral matters. In this case there can be little doubt that the plaintiff was deterred from making exertions to procure other machinery by the conduct and assurances of the defendant Verbeck, that that contracted for would be speedily completed."

Even if a voluntary acceptance without objection does not of itself amount to a waiver of the damages sustained by reason of a delay in delivery, such acceptance may properly be regarded as evincing an intention to waive the time specified for delivery. Ramsey v. Tully, 12 Ill. App. 463.

In Davis v. Fish, 1 G. Greene, 406, 48 Am. Dec. 387, the court, in approving an instruction that the jury if they should find certain boats of less value for having been delivered after the time contracted should deduct the amount from the contract price, said that the act of the vendee in accepting the boats without complaint and appropriating them to his own use furnishes strong presumption at least of a waiver of all objections to the delay in their delivery.

In Merrimack Mfg. Co. v. Quintard, 107 Mass. 127, the question whether the vendees of coal, who sought to recover damages for the failure of the vendor to deliver within the time named in the contract of sale, had, by their acceptance, waived their right to claim damages for the delay in delivery, was held correctly to have been submitted to the jury by an instruction that if they received the coal without complaint or objection on account of the delay in delivery it would be prima facie evidence of a waiver of the objection on that ground, but that if, on consenting to receive the goods, they gave notice that they should claim damages for increased expenses growing out of such delay, receiving it under such circumstances would not be evidence of a waiver of the latter objection.

Where the acceptance is accompanied with an express reservation on the part of the vendees to claim damages by reason of a delay, such damages are a proper subject for recoupment in an action for the purchase price. Jones v. National Printing Co. 13 Daly, 92.

The vendee of oleomargarine to be delivered in specified quantities weekly, who complained of deliveries of less amounts, and gave notice that damages would be claimed therefor, did not, by accepting so much of the oleomargarine as he could get, waive his claim under the contract for the special damages agreed on in case of short delivery. Re Kelly, 51 Fed. 194.

But a protest at the time of delivery of goods shipped under an executory contract of sale that the acceptance is without prejudice is ineffectual to reserve to the vendee the right, in an action for the purchase price, to counterclaim damages for a breach of the contract as to time and manner of shipment causing the goods to arrive later than they would if shipped as agreed. Wallace v. Valentine, 10 Misc. 645, 32 N. Y. Supp. 121. This case cannot, however, justly be regarded as conflicting with the decisions just above cited, as the court rests its decision upon an entirely different principle, vis.: that the time, place, and manner of shipment were part of the description of the goods and material elements in the identification of the property, and that in such case where there is no independent collateral warranty no claim for damages survives the acceptance and use of the goods by the vendee with full knowledge of the facts, although the goods do not in all respects answer the description of the contract.

W. W. N.

Blackburn, in his work on Contracts, p. 377, states the law on the subject as follows: 'When the contract was to deliver goods at a certain date, and that date is passed, the vendee may accept the goods, and bring his action for any damages he may have actually suffered in consequence of the late delivery. He does not, by accepting a late delivery, waive any claim he may have for damages arising from the delay; just as where, by accepting goods which were not up to the warranted quality, he does not waive his right to damages for breach of warranty.' Hare on Contracts, p. 537, states the rule thus: 'When the thing tendered under an executory contract differs as regards time, quality, amount, or kind from what the buyer agreed to receive, it may be declined, and the breach treated as entire, or it may be accepted as so much on account of what the contractor agreed to do or render, and an action brought for the amount by which the performance falls short of the promise.' This statement of the rule is subject to the qualification that time must be of the essence of the contract, and there must be an express warranty as to the quality of the goods. In the case of Digman v. Spurr, 3 Wash. 315, 28 Pac. 529, the supreme court of the state of Washington had the question before it. The court said: 'Counsel contend that appellant waived no right to damages arising out of any delay in delivering the brick by respondent notwithstanding they were accepted at a later date than that fixed for their delivery by the agreement between the parties; and we are inclined to the opinion that the objection is well founded.' So, in the case of Whalon v. Aldrich, 8 Minn. 349, Gil. 305, the supreme court of Minnesota says: 'The defendant, as the case shows, was entitled to have the logs in the St. Croix boom in 1857. Six or seven hundred thousand feet of them were not so delivered, but were delivered the next year, and received by the defendant. This acceptance did not cut off any claim the defendant had for the nondelivery of the logs at the contract time, but enters as an element into the question of what damages he was entitled to recover.' In the case of McMaster v. State, 108 N. Y. 553, 15 N. E. 417, the court says: 'The contention that where there is a breach of contract by one party, and the other thereafter is permitted to perform the same in part, receiving the contract price for such part performance, the injured party thereby waives or releases his right to damages for the breach, has no foundation in reason or authority. It is undoubtedly the rule that, where one party to a contract breaks the same the other party may stop, and refuse further performance. But, instead of doing so, he may perform, so far as he is permitted, and then claim the damages he has suffered from the breach.' In Bagby v. Walker, 78 Md. 239, 27 Atl. 1033, the supreme court of Maryland said: 'Mere acceptance of the lumber after the expiration of the time fixed in the agreement for its delivery was not of itself a waiver of the breach committed by the failure to deliver it according to the terms of the contract; nor did such an acceptance preclude the vendee from subsequently suing to recover the damages resulting to them by reason of the nondelivery from the time of default up to the date of acceptance, nor from recouping, when sued by the vendors, those damages against the latter's claim for the purchase money.' So, in Van Winkle v. Wilkins, 81 Ga. loc. cit. 104, 7 S. E. 644, the supreme court of Georgia expressed the same view. It said: 'It was urged in the argument that receiving the machinery was a waiver both of its defects and of damages resulting from its nondelivery in due time. Why so? . . . Under the circumstances there was no obligation to return the machinery, or to offer to return it. . . . As to the damages resulting from delay, these had already been sustained when the mill was received. Its reception, in so far as it affected them at all, could only hinder more from accruing. It certainly could not increase them. There was no inconsistency between reception of the machinery and retention of the claim for damages on account of delay to furnish it by the time stipulated. To hold that there was a waiver by implication would be very unreasonable.' To the same effect is Gaylord v. Karst, 43 N. Y. S. R. 531, 17 N. Y. Supp. 720. In the case at bar it was stipulated that the oranges should be shipped not later than the 21st of December. Was the time of shipment intended to be of the essence of the contract? If so, then the stipulation must be construed as a warranty or condition precedent, and not a mere representation. The doctrine of the foregoing cases must rest on this distinction. On no other principle can they be distinguished from the cases which hold that in the absence of an express warranty as to quality an acceptance of goods of an inferior quality to those bargained for will be held to be a waiver of the breach of the contract. 'In determining whether stipulations as to the time of performing a contract of sale are conditions precedent, the court seeks to discover the intention of the parties; and, if time appears, from the language used and the circumstances, to be of the essence of the contract, stipulations in regard to it will be held conditions precedent.' Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 618. There is no difficulty in determining the question in the present case. It was the evident purpose and intention of the parties that the shipment should be made at the stipulated date, so that the oranges might reach St. Louis in time for defendant to get the advantage of the better prices for such fruit, which usually prevails at the beginning of the holidays. The appellant cites in support of its position Bock v. Healy, 8 Daly, 156. That case declares the law as appellant contends. The opinion does not attempt to discuss the question on principle, but merely decided that, where goods are delivered out of time, the vendee, by accepting them without protest, waives his claim for damages for breach of the contract. The other authorities relied on hold that in executory contracts for the sale of goods, if there is no express warranty as to kind or quality, the vendee must examine the goods promptly, and, if they are not according to contract, he must return to the vendor. Failing in this, he will be held to have waived his objection to the quality of the goods. This we concede to be the law, but we deny its application in the present case. The judgment will be affirmed.

"Judge Bland concurs in this opinion as written. Judge Bond dissents, and is of the opinion that the decision is opposed to that of the supreme court in the case of Estel v. St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. 56 Mo. 282. The cause will therefore be certified to the supreme court for final determination."

In our opinion, the law is correctly ruled by the majority of the court of appeals. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Norrington v. Wright, 115 U. S. 188, 20 L. ed. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 12: "In the contracts of merchants, time is of the essence. . . . A statement descriptive of the subject-matter, or of some material incident, such as the time or place of shipment, is ordinarily to be regarded as a warranty in the sense in which that term is used in insurance and maritime law; that is to say, a condition precedent, upon the failure or nonperformance of which the party aggrieved may repudiate the whole contract." 1 Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, p. 744, § 616, adopts Mr. Justice Gray's language as the law in such cases. As shown by Judge Biggs's opinion, such a stipulation is regarded by the courts as a warranty, and the rule is well settled that the stipulation is a warranty as to the time of delivery, and the vendee may receive the goods after the stipulated time of delivery, and, if he has paid the purchase money, may maintain his action for the damages occasioned by the breach, or, if he has not paid for the goods, may recoup the amount of his damages out of the purchase price. The difference in opinion between the judges of the court of appeals is based upon the different views they entertain as to the character of the stipulation as to time. We think, with the majority, it is a warranty. As to the case of Estel v. St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. 56 Mo. 282, we think it is plain that the waiver of the time in that case was an express waiver of the time before the delivery began, and a consequent estoppel of the defendant under the facts to complain of the failure to deliver at the time specified in the contract, whereas the cases cited by Judge Biggs clearly demonstrate that the mere reception of the goods without protest or objection is not a waiver of the breach committed by the failure to deliver the oranges according to the contract.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed, and the opinion of Judge Biggs adopted.

All concur.

BOHEMIAN ROMAN CATHOLIC CENTRAL UNION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

A requirement of the constitution of a mutual benefit society that its privileges shall be limited to members of a specified religious denomination, and that members neglecting to comply with the rules governing that denomination shall be suspended or expelled, does not violate a provision of the state Constitution securing the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience, and providing that no human authority can control or interfere with the rights of conscience.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a certificate of membership in a mutual benefit society. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Daniel Dillon and John Dillon, for appellant:

The constitution and laws of organizations such as defendant are binding on its members.

Coleman v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 18 Mo. App. 194; Smith v. Knights of Father Mathew, 26 Mo. App. 184; Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Sater, 44 Mo. App. 452; Theobald v. Supreme Lodge, K. of P. 59 Mo. App. 87; State ex rel. Schrempp v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. 70 Mo. App. 466; Ellerbe v. Faust, 119 Mo. 653, 25 L. R. A. 149, 25 S. W. 390.

These laws are not unreasonable. To maintain the society according to its constitution, they were almost a necessity. Without them members might cease to be Catholics and still retain their membership, and in course of time, instead of being a society composed exclusively of Catholics, as its constitution provides, it would become a society composed of all religious denominations.

The constitution and laws are authorized by the statutes of this state.

Theobald v. Supreme Lodge K. of P. 59 Mo. App. 87.

The constitution and laws of defendant are not in conflict with the Constitution of this state, in operating as a denial of religious liberty.

Messrs. Koehler & Reiss and W. R. Schery, for respondents:

An unreasonable by-law is void. The by-law in question here was unreasonable.

The by-law in question exacts the observance of and performance of certain religious duties upon the pain of forfeiture of property interests. This is clearly in violation of the Constitution.

People ex rel. Schmitt v. Saint Francis Benev. Soc. 24 How. Pr. 216; People ex rel. Gray v. Medical Soc. 24 Barb. 571; Niblack, Ben. Soc. ed. 1888, p. 23, § 20; Bacon, Ben. Soc. new ed. 1894, p. 135, § 84.

The laws of this state applicable to this class of corporations do not authorize the making of by-laws such as the one in question.

Defendant is a fraternal beneficial society as distinguished from a mere religious society. Members to whom certificates are issued acquire property rights. Any by-law not necessary to preserve and protect such rights is unreasonable and void.

Mo. Const. art. 2, § 8; People ex rel. Schmitt v. Saint Francis Benev. Soc. 24 How. Pr. 216; Mulroy v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 28 Mo. App. 471; *Com. v. St. Patrick's Benev. There being no occasion for a confession, the by-law, even though valid, does not constitute a defense; hence the demurrer was properly sustained. The law does not ask of anyone to do that which is unnecessary; nor will the law presume that Franta had sinned.

Matt v. Roman Catholic Mut. Protective Soc. 70 Iowa, 455, 30 N. W. 799.

Where the suspension of a member of a mutual benefit society by his lodge is without jurisdiction—as where it takes place upon a charge of which the lodge has no jurisdiction to try him—his expulsion is null and void, and, being so, it is not incumbent upon him to take steps to have it reversed in a higher judicatory of the order.

App. 50; Hoeffner v. Grand Lodge G. O. of H. 41 Mo. App. 359; Mulroy v. Supreme Lodge K. of H. 28 Mo. App. 463.

Valliant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs are the minor children of Peter Franta, deceased, who, in his lifetime, had been a member of the defendant corporation, which is a fraternal beneficiary society incorporated under the laws of this state, and the suit is to recover on a benefit certificate or quasi life insurance policy for $1,000 issued by the society to plaintiff's father. The answer of the defendant pleads that it is an association of persons who are members of the Roman Catholic Church; that by its constitution no person can be a member who is not a Roman Catholic, and who does not perform his duties as required by the church, and that one of those duties is to go to confession, and receive the sacrament of the holy communion every year during Easter time, and the constitution and by-laws require every member to perform that duty, and to produce to the society a certificate of the priest that he had done so, or, failing therein, the society has the authority to suspend him indefinitely, or for such time as it may deem just, first giving him an opportunity to clear himself of the charge; that every applicant for membership in the association is required to sign an agreement that he will be governed by its constitution and laws, and the plaintiff's father signed such agreement, and was admitted to membership thereupon; that plaintiff's father did not receive the sacrament of the holy communion during Easter in 1896, and was charged in the society with that omission, and in a regular meeting he admitted the truth of the charge, and thereupon in due course the society suspended him from membership indefinitely, and he died while so suspended; that by the laws of the order a suspended member lost all benefits during his suspension. The plaintiffs demurred to that plea, and the court sustained the demurrer on the ground that the provision of the law of the defendant society was in violation of § 5, art. 2, of the Constitution, and, defendant not pleading further, judgment for the plaintiffs was rendered for $1,069.16, from which the defendant appeals.

The only question in the case is whether persons of any religious denomination may form a corporation under our statutes in reference to fraternal beneficiary societies, and by its laws limit its membership to persons of the same religious belief, and suspend or expel a member for failure to observe a duty prescribed by the church and required by the law of the corporation. The clause of our Constitution which the circuit court adjudged to have been violated by the law of the defendant corporation is § 5 of the Bill of Rights, and is in these words: "That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own conscience; that no person can, on account of his religious opinions, be rendered ineligible to any office of trust or profit under this state, nor be disqualified from testifying, or from serving as a juror; that no human authority can control or interfere with the rights of conscience; that no person ought, by any law, to be molested in his person or estate on account of his religious persuasion or profession; but the liberty of conscience hereby secured shall not be so construed as to excuse acts of licentiousness, nor to justify practices inconsistent with the good order, peace, or safety of this state, or with the rights of others." When we consider the purely voluntary character of the society in question; that no one can be brought into its membership but by his own free will, nor restrained to keep his membership when he wishes to withdraw; that he can be admitted only on terms and conditions upon which he and the society mutually agree; that he can be expelled or suspended only in conformity to laws of the society which he has agreed he would obey and submit to; and when we also consider that by expulsion or suspension he is deprived of no right or privilege which he holds independent of the society, which was not created by the society itself, and which, in so far as it may have assumed the character of a right, is purely contractual, and depends for its continuance on the observance of the terms of the contract,—it would be a strange construction of the clause of the Constitution guaranteeing freedom of conscience if we should interpret it to mean that one under those circumstances was entitled to receive the fruits of his contract, while declining from scruples of conscience to perform the conditions which entitle him to the same. The defendant corporation is organized under article 10, chap. 42, Rev. Stat. 1889. Fraternal beneficiary corporations necessarily have the character of fraternal or social community. That is their foundation. The pecuniary benefit or quasi insurance that the law allows to be contracted for is merely incidental to the social or fraternal character. The language of the statute specifying the purposes for which corporations under that article may be formed is "for benevolent, religious, scientific, fraternal, beneficial, or educational purposes." Insurance is not one of the fundamental purposes for which a corporation, under that article, may be formed. When the purpose is to form a life insurance company on the assessment plan, the organization must be effected under another statute enacted for that purpose. Having prescribed the purposes for which such corporations may be formed, and the procedure for their organization, the statute goes on to confer upon fraternal beneficiary associations the power to make provision by assessments to pay benefits to the families or dependents of deceased members, and to their sick or disabled members living; but it avoids the word "insurance" in that connection, and expressly exempts such societies from the operation of the insurance laws of the state. Benefit certificates issued by such societies have some of the characteristics of life insurance policies, and are enforced in the courts according to the contract; but there is something more in the contract evidenced by such a certificate than there is in that evidenced by an ordinary life insurance policy. These societies are sometimes referred to as organized for charitable purposes; but death losses on such benefit certificates are not to be classed under that head, for they are enforced according to the terms of the contract; and even sick benefits do not fill the legal meaning of the word "charity," because they are limited to the members of the society. An act, to be charitable in a legal sense, must be designed for "some public benefit open to an indefinite and vague number; that is, the persons to be benefited must be vague, uncertain, and indefinite until they are selected or appointed to be the particular beneficiaries of the trust for the time being. . . . Money contributed by the members of a club to a common fund, to be applied to the relief and assistance of the particular members of the club when in sickness, want of employment, or other disability, is not a charitable fund, to be controlled by a court of equity." Ferry, Tr. § 710. It is not charity to give to your friend because of friendship, nor to your associate in a society because of your duty imposed by the laws of that society. Charity, in the legal sense, has been illustrated by reference to the custom of the ancient Jews to leave at random a sheaf of corn here and there in the field for the poor gleaners who followed the harvesters, it being unknown who would get it. Therefore there is nothing in the idea of a charitable trust to influence the decision in this case. If the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, it must be upon the theory that their father held a contractual relation with the defendant corporation at the time of his death, which entitled him to membership therein, and the benefits incident to such membership.

Fraternal beneficiary societies appear to have received the approbation and encouragement of the legislatures in many of the states, and have greatly increased in number and in the volume of their peculiar insurance within the last twenty years. Such has certainly been their history in Missouri. This encouragement has arisen from the fact that in their dealings with the families of their deceased members they have not been influenced alone by the strict letter of their contractual obligation, but also to a great extent by that spirit of fraternity which is the life of their organizations. It not infrequently happens that the dues or assessments of an unfortunate sick member are paid by the members of his subordinate lodge, or out of its treasury, to keep him in good standing, in the face of impending death, for the very purpose of securing the payment of the benefit fund to his family. Such is not the conduct of mere strangers with each other, or of those who are bound only by the ties of a contract of insurance. And the law recognizes in that spirit of fraternity not only a guaranty of life insurance when the member dies, but also the development of better character among the members while living, and thus the state derives a moral benefit. But the idea of fraternity on which these societies are founded is not that of the mere abstract principle, which includes all mankind; it is rather fraternity in the concrete, embracing only those who have some feature common to themselves, but not universal, which renders them for that reason a separate and peculiar band of friends or associates, distinct from the rest of the world. Such a peculiar quality, common to them, but distinguishing them from mankind in general, is absolutely essential to a fraternal society, and it alone distinguishes these societies in their conduct from life insurance companies on the assessment plan. In the invitation that our statute gives to the people to form such societies it does not specify what sentimental bonds of union may be used for that purpose. Whatever sentiment a number of men may have in common and peculiar to themselves, which draws them together for a purpose that is not immoral or inimical to the state, may be made by them essential to admission to membership in their society, and it follows as a corollary it may be made essential to retention of such membership. If men of a particular religious faith prefer to be associated with those of that faith, and desire to form a corporation composed alone of members who are in harmony with them on that subject, there is nothing in our law to forbid them. But a fraternal beneficiary society founded on and limited to such membership is in no sense a religious corporation. It is not formed to teach or propagate the religious faith, but to cultivate the spirit of fraternity among its members who are of that faith, and incidentally to provide a pecuniary benefit for them and their families as the statute contemplates. And if the corporation may lawfully prescribe as a condition precedent to admission to membership that the applicant be one who is a member in good standing of a certain church, and who conforms to its teachings, it may also prescribe as a condition subsequent to retaining his membership in the corporation that he continue in good standing in the church and in observance of its requirements. The corporation does not thereby become a propaganda of religious dogma, but only secures to its members that exclusive congenial association which it promised. The Masonic fraternity is generally reputed to be a society having for one of its objects, at least, the practice of charity in its broadest sense, yet a corporation known as the United Masonic Benefit Association, which was only a life insurance company on the assessment plan, and in no sense a charitable society, had prescribed as a qualification for membership that the applicant be a Mason in good standing, and it was held that a by-law of the corporation declaring that, upon a member thereof ceasing to be a member in good standing of the Masonic fraternity, ipso facto, forfeited his membership in the corporation, was valid. Ellerbe v. Faust, 119 Mo. 656, 25 L. R. A. 149, 25 S. W. 390. 54 L. R. A.

In that case the purpose of the corporation was life insurance, and it had nothing to do with teaching or propagating the tenets of Masonry; yet it was held that, as it was a mutual society, and those who had organized and composed it had seen fit to limit their association to Masons in good standing, no one not belonging to that class could come into it, or, being in, no one ceasing to be of the class could remain in. The clause of the constitution invoked in the case at bar as much protects a man in refusing to be or to remain a Mason against his conscience as it does in refusing to be or to remain a member of a particular church. The law is not greatly concerned in guarding a man in that freedom of conscience which would permit him to enter into a contract, and keep it to the extent that it suits him, and repudiate it otherwise. If the father of the respondents in this case acquired any rights which he or they could enforce against this corporation, it was by virtue of an express contract, which prescribed the terms upon which he was admitted to membership, and as expressly prescribed the conditions necessary to be observed on his part to continue that membership; and the terms of continuing were exactly the same as the terms of admission. He expressly represented as a condition to his admission that he was a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and that he observed its laws, and would continue to do so while he remained a member of the corporation; and that, if he should cease to conform to the laws of the church in the particular mentioned in the answer, he expressly agreed that the corporation might suspend or expel him, and thereby exclude him from its benefits. Under the Constitution and laws of this state a man cannot be coerced into observing the sacraments of any church, and, even if he should enter into a solemn contract to do so, he is free to break the contract, and for breaking it he cannot be deprived of any right that he has independent of it. But if, by the contract, a special benefit is created for him, he cannot break the contract and have the benefit too. The court of appeals of Kentucky, passing on exactly the question we are now discussing, said: "But, apart from this, we cannot see that appellee's rules are in any way inconsistent with the Constitution of Kentucky. The plaintiff never acquired the right to be thus watched and cared for in sickness, and to have his family provided for after his death, except upon the condition that he performed certain religious duties required of members of the Roman Catholic Church. Those duties were to be performed every year during his membership, in order to keep alive the corresponding obligations of his fellow members. This right was at most but a conditional one, and has never been 'diminished' by any act of the society's. . . . To compel them [other members of the society] to watch and care for plaintiff in times of sickness, and contribute to the support of his family after death, when they have only agreed to do this for those who remain true to their church, would be to disregard and trample upon that mutuality which lies at the foundation of all contracts. . . . The religious liberty of every denomination in this land demands that no such principle as this be declared as the law of Kentucky." Hitter v. German Roman Catholic St. Aloysius Soc. 4 Ky. L. Rep. 871. And to like effect also is Matt v. Roman Catholic Mut. Protective Soc. 70 Iowa, 455, 30 N. W. 799. If any court of last resort has ever held to the contrary, our attention has not been drawn to the case.

The facts stated in the defendant's plea constituted a complete defense to the plaintiffs' cause of action, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded to the Circuit Court to be proceeded with according to the law as herein expressed.

All concur.

Rehearing denied.

v.

St. ADELBERTUS SOCIETY OF GRAND RAPIDS, Plff. in Certiorari.

(.....Mich.....)

1. A by-law prohibiting members from being connected with societies not approved by a particular church is authorized by a provision in the statute authorizing the incorporation of mutual benefit societies that they shall have power to establish rules for the regulation of the affairs of the corporation not contrary to the laws of the state or United States, and to decide the necessary qualifications of membership.
2. One who joins a mutual benefit society whose by-laws provide that no one can be a member of it who is a member of a society not approved by a particular church cannot complain if he is expelled from the society for membership in a society prohibited by such church.

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review an order reinstating relator in a mandamus proceeding as a member of the defendant society. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McKnight & McAllister, for plaintiff in certiorari:

The by-laws restricting members are not contrary to the laws of the United States or this state, and are not void as being against public policy, and therefore the same are valid and binding on each member.

Messrs. Dunham & Malcolm, for defendant in certiorari:

The by-law constituting subdiv. c, § 5, of art. 12, is not binding upon any member of the respondent society, because it is against public policy, unreasonable and void, and is such a by-law as is not within the power of the society to pass under the express and implied terms of its charter.

This by-law was undoubtedly reasonable, legal, and binding upon the members of the unincorporated society.

Courts have no power to determine whether such a by-law is reasonable or unreasonable in an unincorporated society.

The theory of a voluntary society is founded upon the idea that men shall come together of their own free will and accord, and be bound by such laws as shall be passed in the manner agreed upon.

Where an unincorporated society becomes incorporated under a general law, the provisions of its constitution and by-laws become subject to the rules of law governing the provisions of the constitution and by-laws of corporations. The court will, upon proper application, determine whether such provisions are reasonable and necessary to effect the object for which the society was incorporated.

State ex rel. Waring v. Georgia Medical Soc. 38 Ga. 608, 95 Am. Dec. 408; Niblack Ben. Soc. §§ 25, 26.

The by-law in question may have been a proper by-law of the Polish-Roman Mutual Society, and yet be absolutely void as a by-law of the respondent society.

Where a society is organized and incorporated for beneficial and benevolent purposes, under the statute of the state, a member may not be deprived of his rights in the society by a by-law not necessary for, or connected with, the purposes and objects of the society, and relating to religious discipline, even though he may have assented to it.

Only such by-laws can be held valid as are, in their operation, fairly within the associate purposes expressed in the constitution.

The by-law in question is not necessary for, or connected with, the purposes and objects of a benevolent society, or with those of the respondent society, as indicated by its articles of incorporation; and although one may have assented to submit to such a by-law, it is not legally binding upon him, and he may ignore it at any time without danger of forfeiting his rights in such society.

The respondent society is possessed of real estate of the value of upwards of $20,000, which upon a dissolution of said society would belong to its members, each of whom would be entitled to his distributive proportion thereof. The relator clearly has a vested right, not only in the property interests of the society, but also in the benefits which necessarily accrue to him by reason of his membership.

People ex rel. Pulford v. Detroit Fire Department, 31 Mich. 459; Merrill, Mandamus, § 168.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an application for a mandamus, made to the court below to compel the respondent society to reinstate relator as a member of that society, from which it is claimed he has been unlawfully expelled. There are only two questions involved: (1) Is subdiv. "c," § 5, of art. 12, which reads as follows: "No member of the St. Adelbertus Aid Society of Grand Rapids, Michigan, can be a member of any society that is not approved by the Roman Catholic Church,"—a valid, legal, and binding by-law of said respondent society? (2) Was relator legally expelled from the respondent society?

It appears that in November, 1872, there was an unincorporated society organized in the city of Grand Rapids under the name of the Polish Roman Catholic Mutual Society under the Guardianship of St. Albert. This unincorporated society adopted certain by-laws for the conduct of its business, and which society was organized as an adjunct of St. Albert's Church of said city, and which church organization was composed entirely of Poles of the Roman Catholic faith. The society existed until 1892, when several of its members desired to incorporate it, and did so in the month of November of that year, under the corporate name of St. Adelbertus Aid Society of the City of Grand Rapids, Michigan. This incorporation was under act No. 155 of the Public Acts of this state for the year 1879. It was provided in said articles of incorporation as follows: "The purposes and objects for which said corporation is formed shall be to provide for the relief of distressed members, the burial of the dead, and such other benevolent and worthy purposes and objects as affect the members of the corporation." Immediately upon the incorporation of the Polish Roman Catholic Mutual Society under the name of the respondent society, it adopted as its by-laws the same by-laws that had governed it in its unincorporated condition, and one of which by-laws is the one above stated. On October 2, 1894, relator became a member of the respondent society. In the year 1895 he became a member of the Polish-

American Industrial Society. On July 17, 1899, respondent undertook to remove relator from its society, and claims it did so for the reason assigned by respondent that the Polish-American Industrial Society was not approved by the Roman Catholic Church, and that this was a violation of said by-law. Relator was removed from the respondent society for no other cause, always having paid his dues promptly, and in all respects had conducted himself in conformity to the by-laws of said society. At the time relator was removed, all other members of the respondent society were likewise dismissed and removed from said society who were members of the said Polish-American Industrial Society, excepting all those persons who had formerly belonged to the Polish Roman Catholic Mutual Society under the Guardianship of St. Albert. At the time relator was removed from the respondent society, there were many members of it who were also members of the Polish-American Industrial Society, but which members had formerly belonged to the aforesaid unincorporated society. All such members were permitted to remain, and enjoy all rights, benefits, and privileges of the respondent society, for the sole reason that they had formerly belonged to said unincorporated society. At the time relator became a member of the respondent society it was possessed of real estate of the value of at least $20,000, and at the time of his removal from said society its real estate was worth much more than that. It owned a large and valuable club house located upon its grounds in the city of Grand Rapids, where its business and social meetings were held. At the time relator joined the respondent society, its by-laws provided for an entrance fee of from $4 to $10, depending upon the applicant's age (§ 7, by-law 12); that a yearly tax of $3, payable monthly, as dues, must be paid by each member (§ 1, by-law 12). Section 3 of this by-law also provides: "It is the duty of every member to confess and receive holy communion twice a year in the St. Albert's Church, together with the society, on St. Albert's day, as a patron of our church and society, and again near the 2d of November, on Sunday, as a yearly remembrance of the organizing of the society." Section 6 of the same by-law provides: "For the reason that this is a Catholic society, it should therefore be under the guidance of the local pastor." By-law 14 provides that, "in case of death of any member or member's wife, in either case the society is to pay $50 for funeral expenses, and the amount of assistance to such members shall be $3 per week." By-law 12 provides: "Every member of this society shall send his children to the Polish school, and, if a member of this society fails to live up to the laws of this society, and practices other immoralities concerning the Catholic Church, and the society still considers him a member, in that case the local pastor reports to the society, and it is the duty of the society to dismiss such member." The Polish-American Industrial Society, to which relator also belonged, provided a weekly indemnity of $3 in case of sickness, and a payment of $50 for funeral expenses of a member or his wife. The membership of the respondent society were Poles of the Roman Catholic faith. Father Pongannus, pastor of the St. Albert's Catholic Church of this city, was a member of the respondent society from the fact of his being the local pastor of said church. During the whole time relator was a member of the industrial society, respondent was cognizant of the fact, solicited and accepted his dues, covering a period from July, 1895, to October, 1899. There are many members now of the respondent society who are also members in good standing of the condemned society for the simple and only reason that they were members of the Polish Roman Catholic Mutual Society prior to 1892. On the evening of July 17, 1899, at a meeting of the members of the said respondent society in its hall in this city, the said Father Pongannus came into said meeting, and took the president's seat, and demanded that all persons present who were members of the Polish-American Industrial Society should leave the society. There were no written or other charges preferred against relator except the said statement of Father Pongannus. Relator asked that he might be heard in his defense, immediately whereupon the said meeting was dismissed, and relator and other members of the condemned society, save the excepted members before mentioned, were required to leave the hall; and, after they had gone out, and the doors closed, a resolution was passed by the remaining members of respondent society requiring that relator and the others who were expelled from the hall renounce their membership in the Polish-American Industrial Society within three months, or stand dismissed and expelled from the respondent society. Relator was afterwards notified of this resolution by personal friends of his, who remained in said hall while said resolution was passed; but he continued to pay his dues for three months thereafter, when the respondent society refused to accept any further dues, and refused to permit relator to enter said hall, or to enjoy any of the benefits of said society, and since which time he has been excluded from participating in either the business or social gatherings of said society upon its premises. On January 2, 1900, without any notice to relator, the respondent society passed another resolution, giving relator and the other expelled members one month's time in which to drop out of the Polish-American Industrial Society and return to the respondent society. Relator refused to give up his protection and the protection of his family in the Polish-American Industrial Society, and he is now, and has been since July 17, 1899, excluded from all the benefits and privileges of being a member of said respondent society. The case was heard in the court below, testimony taken, and the whole case considered there. The case comes into this court by writ of certiorari.

sets out the facts found. That court found that the Polish-American Industrial Society was not at any time under the ban of the Roman Catholic Church prior to the hearing of the case in May, 1900, and that the ban appears to consist wholly of the disapproval of Father Pongannus. The court also found that the respondent society is the owner of real estate of the value of $20,000, and that the order of dismissal, if valid, not only dismissed relator from said society after paying his dues therein for six years, but also dismissed others who had been paying dues there for more than eighteen years, and for no other reason than that they had provided themselves additional weekly indemnity of $3 per week in case of sickness by becoming members of the Polish-American Industrial Society. The act under which the respondent society is organized (being act No. 155, Laws 1879) provides that "any ten or more persons, residents of this state, desiring to become incorporated for benevolent purposes, may make and execute under their hands and seals articles of association, which said articles of association shall be acknowledged before some officer of this state," etc. Subdivision 3 of § 1 provides: "The purposes and objects for which said corporation is formed shall provide for the relief of such distressed members, the visitation of the sick, the burial of the dead and such other benevolent and worthy purposes and objects as affect the members of the corporation," etc. Pursuant to the provisions of the act, articles of association were filed, setting forth the purposes of the organization in the language of subdivision 3 of the act. By-laws were adopted, and subdiv. "c," § 5, of art. 12, as above set forth, became a part of the by-laws. The court below found this by-law unreasonable and void, for the reason that it was not incidental to or necessary for the carrying out of the purposes of the organization, and that the relator was unlawfully deprived of his rights in the association. The conclusions of the court below cannot be sustained. The act under which the respondent society was organized provides by § 4 that "said corporation shall have full power and authority to make and establish rules and regulations for the regulation and governing of the affairs and business of said corporation and members thereof not contrary to the laws of the United States or of this state, to decide as to the necessary qualifications for and who shall be eligible to membership therein, to provide for the election of members and to designate, elect, or appoint in such manner as they see fit by the rules and regulations such officers under such name and style as they shall decide, who shall exercise such powers and such supervision, control, and management of the affairs of such corporation as shall be delegated to them respectively by the constitution, rules, regulations, and by-laws of said corporation." Under the power thus conferred, the respondent society passed the by-law in controversy. Such by-law is not in conflict with any law of the United States or of this state. It is, therefore, binding upon the members of the society. A very similar question was presented in the case of Bretzlaff v. Evangelical Lutheran St. John Sick Ben. Soc. (Mich.) 7 Det. L. N. 442, 83 N. W. 1000. Section 1, art. 2, of the constitution of that society provided: "Only such persons can be members of the society that adhere and belong to the Evangelical Lutheran Church, the congregation belonging to the synodical conference. They must lead a moral and virtuous life, and must not belong to any secret society, or any other sick benefit society. Members that leave the above-named church thereby lose their membership in the society." It was held that Mr. Bretzlaff was bound by this provision in the articles of the society, and that it was not unreasonable or against public policy; citing note to 13' Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1079. We think the present case falls directly within the rule there laid down. A person who joins such a society is bound by the charter and by-laws, which are a part of his contract. Douville v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 113 Mich. 158, 71 N. W. 517; Van Poucke v. Netherland St. Vincent De Paul Soc. 63 Mich. 378, 29 N. W. 863.

The order of the court below must be reversed, with costs in favor of respondent.

The other Justices concur.

Mr. William H. McBryan, for defendant:

It was complainant's duty to record her land contract.

Comp. Laws 1897, § 8988; Balen v. Mercier, 75 Mich. 47, 42 N. W. 666.

That duty having been neglected, she has no equity existing in her favor.

Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 475.

When Richards sold to Mann, her grantee was clothed with all her rights as a bona fide purchaser, and when Mann conveyed to the Lounds they in turn succeeded to all the rights and privileges to which Richards was originally entitled, even though they may have had actual knowledge of the Gray land contract.

Godfroy v. Disbrow, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 265.

The protection which the recording acts statute gives to a bona fide purchaser does not proceed upon the theory, and is not made to depend upon the fact, that the grantor at the time of such conveyance had any interest in the premises whatever, or that any passed from him by his conveyance to such subsequent purchaser. It is not by force of the conveyances, but by the terms of the statute, that such subsequent purchaser acquires title to the premises.

Burns v. Berry, 42 Mich. 179, 3 N. W. 924; Payne v. Avery, 21 Mich. 524; Shotwell v. Harrison, 22 Mich. 421.

The recording laws protect the purchaser who first records his conveyance.

The register act applies to the equitable right which is acquired by a purchaser of a parcel of the mortgaged property, to have the residue first applied to the payment of the mortgage debt.

Any particular grantee may by his subsequent omissions, or by his subsequent dealings with other grantees, disturb the order of the equities in his own favor, and create equities in behalf of other owners, and even render his own parcel primarily liable as between all the grantees.

There can be no equities superior to those of bona fide purchasers without notice.

Loomis v. Brush, 36 Mich. 47.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 22d day of October, 1887, complainant purchased from Hibbard Baker, by land contract, lot No. 162 of the Waterworks subdivision of private claim 257, in the township of Hamtramck, county of Wayne, for a consideration of $500. Fifty dollars of the purchase price was paid at the date of the contract, $50 and interest November 25, 1887, $300 and interest during the year 1888, $50 February 1, 1890, and the final payment of $50 and interest April 1, 1890. Complainant did not record her contract. The lot was a vacant unimproved one. Complainant received a warranty deed of the lot from Hibbard Baker and wife, in pursuance of said contract, on the 22d day of September, 1890, and four days later recorded it. On May 3, 1887, Hibbard Baker and Howard G. Meredith executed to the State Savings Bank a mortgage on 45 lots of the Waterworks subdivision for a consideration of $5,000, which mortgage contained the following clause: "With the privilege of having any lot released at any time on payment of $300, with accrued interest, with three months' extra interest." This mortgage includes lots 162, 251, 252, and 253. Releases were executed by the State Savings Bank at various times, releasing all the lots from this mortgage, except the four lots mentioned. On the 20th day of February, 1889, Hibbard Baker and Howard G. Meredith executed to Caroline E. Richards a warranty deed for lots 251, 252, and 253. On the 18th of March, 1889, Caroline E. Richards deeded said lots to Gustave E. Mann, and on January 1, 1890, he deeded them to the H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Company, which deed was recorded on the 15th of March, 1890. On the 12th day of April, 1895, after all the lots subject to the mortgage had been discharged therefrom except lots 162, 251, 252, and 253, the State Savings Bank assigned the mortgage to the H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Company for $472.42. Immediately on obtaining the assignment of this mortgage, the H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Company commenced foreclosure proceedings against all of these lots, and on the 12th day of August, 1895, lot 162 was bid off to the H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Company for $520.49, being the entire amount claimed to be due on said mortgage, together with the costs and expenses of foreclosure and sale. On the 13th of October, 1890, the H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Company sold and deeded lot 162 to Anthony Muer for the sum of $750. The defendant the H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Company had no knowledge of the existence of this mortgage to the State Savings Bank until some time after they purchased, in 1892. The complainant had no knowledge of the existence of this mortgage until the 3d day of February, 1896, and she paid all the taxes on this property from the time she purchased it until November, 1895. November 24, 1890, complainant filed this bill, asking: (1) That the purchase of the mortgage by the Louds from the bank be decreed to be a full payment and satisfaction thereof as against Gray; (2) that the foreclosure and sale of lot 162 by the Louds may be declared null and void against Gray, and that the Louds may be decreed to release Gray all their title and interest in and to lot 162 under and by virtue of the mortgage and foreclosure thereof; (3) for general relief. The court made a decree that neither party was entitled to have the other's land sold prior to its own, but that the balance due on the mortgage, and expenses, amounting to $520.49, should be paid ratably by each of the four lots. The court also held that, as the defendant had sold lot 162 to a bona fide purchaser for $750, that amount was a fair valuation of the lot, and that the defendant should account to the complainant for that sum, less $130.12; and a decree was entered requiring the defendant to pay to the complainant the sum of $619.88, that being the difference between the amount for which the lot was sold and one quarter of the mortgage and expenses. Both parties appealed from this decree, though complainant does not object to having it affirmed.

It is the claim of the complainant that, having purchased, and substantially paid for, her lot before the other lots were sold to defendant's grantors, although her conveyance was recorded subsequent to the record of the first conveyance of the other lots, she was entitled to have those lots sold first for the satisfaction of the mortgage; citing Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 464; James v. Hubbard, 1 Paige, 228; Elison v. Pecare, 29 Barb. 333; Libby v. Tufts, 121 N. Y. 172, 24 N. E. 12. In Libby v. Tufts, though the second purchaser put his conveyance on record first, the first purchaser had fully completed his contract, and entered into possession of the premises. A reference to the other cases will show they, too, are not controlling in this one. Complainant insists that, even though she may not insist upon the lots being sold in the inverse order of alienation, the decision of the circuit judge is undoubtedly in accordance with the law applicable to all cases where it would be inequitable to apply the general rule, and is as favorable to the defendants as the circumstances warrant; citing Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 464; Bernhardt v. Lyburner, 85 N. Y. 172; Woods v. Spalding, 45 Barb. 602; Hill v. McCarter, 27 N. J. Eq. 41. In Hill v. McCarter the first purchaser took his deed subject to the mortgage, and the court very properly held his land was not wholly relieved from the lien. An inspection of the other cases cited will show they are not decisive of this case in favor of complainant. If Miss Gray's contract had been put upon record, or if she had gone into possession of her lot, and her possession had been so obvious that it would have been notice to subsequent purchasers, her contention that the lots purchased by the defendants must first be sold would be sustained by the great weight of authority. As she did not put her contract upon record, and her lot was a vacant unoccupied lot, can the decree of the circuit judge be sustained? When Miss Gray obtained her land contract, and made payments thereon, she obtained an interest in the land described therein. Balen v. Mercier, 75 Mich. 47, 42 N. W. 666. Section 9088, Comp. Laws, reads: "Every conveyance of real estate within this state, hereafter made, which shall not be recorded as provided in this chapter, shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, of the same real estate or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall be first duly recorded." Sections 9035-9038, Comp. Laws, provide for the recording of land contracts. The object of the recording laws is to protect subsequent bona fide purchasers (Godfroy v. Disbrow, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 262), and to prevent fraud by securing certainty and publicity in such dealings (Atwood v. Beers, 47 Mich. 72, 10 N. W. 112). In Burns v. Berry, 42 Mich., at page 179, 3 N. W. 924, in commenting on the policy of the recording acts, the court says: "The protection which this statute gives to a bona fide purchaser does not proceed upon the theory, and is not made to depend upon the fact, that the grantor at the time of such conveyance had any interest in the premises whatever, or that any passed from him by his conveyance to such subsequent purchaser. It is not by force of the conveyances, but by the terms of the statute, that such subsequent purchaser acquires title to the premises. His grantor, having previously conveyed, has no title left to convey, and could therefore by his deed, unaided by the statute, pass none to any third person. Our registry laws, however, step in, and, for the purpose of protecting an innocent purchaser, give him what he supposed, and from an examination of the records had a right to suppose, he was acquiring by his purchase, and to this extent cut off the previous purchaser who negligently failed to record his conveyance."

Cooper v. Bigly, 13 Mich. 463, throws much light upon the question involved in this case. Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, said: "It has always been understood to be the settled law of this state that, where mortgaged premises are conveyed or encumbered in parcels, they are, upon a foreclosure, to be sold in the inverse order of such conveyances or encumbrances, unless the mortgagees will be prejudiced by having the property sold in parcels,—a thing which can never happen where the property, when mortgaged to him, was treated as separate. This doctrine was recognized in Mason v. Payne, Walk. Ch. (Mich.) 459, and Caruthers v. Hall, 10 Mich. 40, in both of which cases the principal exception to the rule was referred to and enforced. The same principle was recognized and explained in James v. Brown, 11 Mich. 25. It rests chiefly, perhaps, upon the grounds that, where one who is bound to pay a mortgage confers upon others rights in any portion of the property, retaining other portions himself, it is unjust that they should be deprived of their rights, so long as he has property covered by the mortgage out of which the debt can be made. In other words, his debts should be paid out of his own estate, instead of being charged on the estates of his grantees. Any other rule would be, in effect, to enable him to enjoy for his own benefit that which he has once vested in another, and in a measure to recall his own grant. The rule cannot, therefore, depend upon the existence or nonexistence of covenants of warranty. It depends simply on the fact whether he has or has not seen fit, in making a disposition of a part of his encumbered premises, to charge it primarily with the payment of the encumbrance. Whenever he so charges any part, the purchaser takes it subject to the burden, and the relative date of his purchase is immaterial. See cases cited above; Welch v. Beers, 8 Allen, 151; Kilborn v. Robbins, 8 Allen, 466. It has, indeed, in several cases cited at the bar, been held that the covenant of warranty was very important in determining the intent of the mortgagor not to charge the mortgage on the property sold. But there is no satisfactory authority holding that, in the absence of such a warranty, no such intent could be presumed. On the contrary, wherever the doctrine of priority is respected at all, it has been enforced, unless an opposite intent was made out. And such appears to us the common sense inference; for a man owing a debt, for which his own property remains liable, must naturally be supposed to expect to have it paid out of his own means, unless he has bargained to the contrary. And this equity, having arisen in favor of the first purchaser, must remain in his favor against any subsequent equities of other parties derived from his grantor. There are same states in which all parcels of mortgaged land are held liable ratably. See cases collected in notes to Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 633, 635, 1233a. And it has been suggested by Judge Story, and was claimed on the argument, that a purchaser of one lot cannot be expected to search the record for the title of other lots, and therefore should not be subjected to equities attaching to them. But this reasoning entirely passes over the well-settled rule that, where a person is obliged to take notice of a deed, he is bound by notice of all that it contains which can affect him. Having notice of a mortgage covering other lots besides his own, he is bound to ascertain whether those lots have been sold previously in such a way as to throw any peculiar burden on the one he is purchasing, just as much as whether that lot has been directly, instead of indirectly, conveyed or charged, prior to his purchase, by his grantor or his predecessors in the title. The registry laws furnish the means for one investigation as easily as for the other. And the construction put upon these laws is in accordance with this view. Chapman v. West, 17 N. Y. 125; Chase v. Woodbury, 6 Cush. 143; Brown v. Simons, 44 N. H. 475. This latter case is a well-considered case, and collects the authorities quite fully upon the whole subject, so that it will not be desirable to multiply the citations."

Brown v. Simons is an instructive case, not only because it is quoted with approval by Justice Campbell, but also because it comments upon and disapproves Ellison v. Pearce, which is relied upon by the complainant. We quote: "If, however, at the time of the subsequent conveyance by the mortgagor, the grantee has no notice of the prior conveyance, in fact or constructively (the same not having been registered), such subsequent grantee ought not to take the land so granted, subject primarily to the whole debt. On the contrary, as the prior grantee has failed to record his deed, and thus give notice of the true state of the title, the subsequent grantee, unless otherwise notified, may rightfully regard the land, which is thus apparently in the hands of the mortgagor, as primarily liable for the whole debt. It is true that the first grant by the mortgagor of a part of the property does not in terms impose a lien upon what is left, but in effect it creates upon it, as between the parties, a new encumbrance, and makes it liable primarily for the whole debt, as much as if such mortgagor had mortgaged it to such purchaser to indemnify him against the original mortgage. It makes a case then that clearly comes within the spirit of our statute of enrollments, which is designed for the security of subsequent purchasers and creditors, to give notice of all conveyances of any estate in lands, whether legal or equitable. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 403; Parkist v. Alexander, 1 Johns. Ch. 398; 4 Greenleaf's Cruise, Real Prop. 448, 452, and notes; General Ins. Co. v. United States Ins. Co. 10 Md. 517, 69 Am. Dec. 174; Brush v. Ware, 15 Pet. 113, 10 L. ed. 680. The Middlesex register act, which requires to be enrolled 'all deeds and conveyances,' was held to extend to every species of deed or instrument by which lands may be conveyed or affected, and therefore an appointment under a power is considered as a conveyance within the register acts. 4 Greenleaf's Cruise, Real Prop. 448; Scrafton v. Quincy, 2 Ves. Sr. 113. In that case it was contended that this deed was not a separate conveyance, but only the execution of a power under a deed that was registered; but the court held that, if this construction was to prevail, there would be an end of the registry law, for by this means a secret deed might be set up to defeat him who had registered before; and the court says the case is clearly within the mischief recited, which is to prevent a party from being defeated by a secret or pocket deed. In Brush v. Ware, before cited, the court, in discussing the general doctrine of notice, lays it down that 'no principle is better established than that a purchaser must look to every part of the title which is essential to its validity.' And again, it is laid down in the same case that 'the law requires reasonable diligence in a purchaser to ascertain any defect of title; but when such defect is brought to his knowledge no inconvenience will excuse him from the utmost scrutiny.' In accordance with such views it was held in Reeder v. Barr, 4 Ohio, 458, 22 Am. Dec. 762, that when a patent was issued to Newell, the assignee of Henson, Reeder's administrator, a subsequent purchaser was charged with notice of the equitable rights of the heirs of Reeder, because by the laws of Ohio an administrator has no power, unless authorized by the court of common pleas, to convey an interest in land. So, in Brush v. Ware it was held that, as the executor had no power of sale, unless given him by the will, the purchaser was bound to look into the will, and see if such power was given. See also Backman v. Charlestown, 42 N. H. 134. If the first conveyance by the mortgagor after the mortgage is duly registered by the grantee he has done all that he can do to give notice of the new burden that is thereby thrown upon the part which is retained by the mortgagor; and a second purchaser, charged, as he clearly is, with notice of the mortgage upon the whole land, and when the deed is registered, knowing that the extent of the burden upon his own purchase must depend upon the fact of there having been a prior conveyance by the mortgagor, would, upon due inquiry, and in the exercise of reasonable diligence, be led by the record to a knowledge of the true state of the title, and the extent of the encumbrance upon the land conveyed to him. This he is directly interested to know, and the first purchaser has placed the means of knowledge reasonably within his reach, and it is his own fault if he neglects to avail himself of it. In the examination of the title to the part he proposes to buy he is led directly to the original mortgage, and he finds that his is but part of an entire tract in which his grantor has only a right of redemption, and which was originally subject to a common burden, but liable to be affected by a prior sale of another part of the entire tract. Under such circumstances the different parcels of the tract mortgaged cannot, we think, be regarded as separate and distinct, so as to relieve him of the duty to inquire into the title to the other part; but we think that in examining the title to the part he proposes to buy he is led directly to a deed that puts him on inquiry as to the remaining part of the land. 2 Fonblanque, Eq. B. 3, chap. 3, § 1, note; 4 Greenleaf's Cruise, Real Prop. 452, note; Parkist v. Alexander, 1 Johns. Ch. 398. In accordance with these views is the doctrine of Chase v. Woodbury, 6 Cush. 143, where a mortgagor conveyed the whole of the mortgaged property to S. & R., to each an undivided half; and S., having recorded his deed, conveyed his half to C. before the deed to R. was registered; and upon the payment by the representative of R. of the whole mortgage debt it was held that he could not require contribution of C., because C. had purchased without any notice of the sale to R., and might, therefore, rely upon the other half being first held for the whole debt, although, had the deed to R. been recorded, it would have been notice of a lien on the land sold to S. equally with the other; but the failure to record it was a failure of one claiming an encumbrance, namely, a lien on the estate for a contribution for one half the money he might pay to redeem it, and this the court held, stood upon the same footing as if R. had a mortgage from the first grantor, which he had failed to record. The result of this case is that a party purchasing a part of an estate under mortgage would be charged with notice of a registered conveyance of another part, when the effect would be to render his part so purchased liable to contribution equally with the other; and for the same reason he would be charged with such notice in a case where the effect would be to make his purchase primarily liable for the whole debt. The case of Chase v. Woodbury is directly in point, and fully sustains the views we have expressed. It is true it has been suggested that this right to have first applied the lands remaining in the mortgagor's hands and those last sold is a mere equity, and not a lien or encumbrance that comes within the provisions of the register laws, and so it is directly held in Ellison v. Pearce, 29 Barb. 333; and therefore it was decided that the deed first delivered would take precedence over a subsequent deed of another parcel, although the latter was first recorded. In this case, however, it appeared that neither of these purchasers had knowledge of the original mortgage at the time of their purchase, and the court expressly declines to give an opinion as to the result had the second purchaser known of the existence of the mortgage, and had he examined the records, and, finding no previous conveyance, been induced to buy, supposing in good faith that he was the first purchaser; in which case it is said there would be some show of equity in favor of the second purchaser. In the case of LaFarge F. Ins. Co. v. Bell, 22 Barb. 54, it was held upon much consideration that the register act, which provides that 'every conveyance not recorded shall be void against a subsequent purchaser in good faith of the same real estate, or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall first be duly recorded,' does apply to the equitable right which is acquired by a purchaser of a parcel of the mortgaged property to have the residue first applied to the payment of the mortgage debt, and that such equitable right will not be defeated by a prior conveyance of that residue, unless it be by deed duly recorded, or other notice at the time of his purchase; and the reasons assigned for this doctrine are in no degree shaken by the subsequent case of Ellison v. Pearce, which appears to have been decided without an examination of the case of LaFarge F. Ins. Co. v. Bell. Indeed, it is difficult to see how any other result can be reached. The deed of a parcel of the tract mortgaged carries with it a well-established right to require the mortgagee first to exhaust the residue in the hands of the mortgagor before applying the parcel so conveyed; and, whether this right can be enforced only in equity or not, it is clearly a substantial interest in such residue, and one which it is the policy of the registry laws to protect. See Montgomery v. Dorion, 6 N. H. 255; French v. Gray, 2 Conn. 108; 4 Kent, Com. 456; Brown v. Manter, 22 N. H. 468." See Jones, Mortg. 4th ed. § 1620. When the defendants' grantor purchased the three lots, the record did not disclose a sale to Miss Gray, and he had a right to assume that the mortgagees would resort to the land still standing in the name of Mr. Baker before selling the land purchased by him.

Counsel say: "The mortgage contained the following provision: 'With the privilege of having any lot released at any time on payment of $300 and accrued interest, with three months' extra interest.' Under this clause complainant was entitled to have her lot released at any time from the mortgage on payment of $300, and her lot should not be made liable to more than that amount on foreclosure of the mortgage, and any excess over that amount would have to be borne by the other lots, in any view of the case,"—citing Clark v. Fountain, 135 Mass. 404. It is doubtless true that complainant might have had her lot released from the mortgage by paying to the mortgagee $300, but she never sought to do so. She waited nearly four years after the mortgage foreclosure before filing this bill, and it is not a part of the theory of the bill.

It is claimed there was paid to the bank about $70 extra interest, which was usury, and which should have been applied as a general payment on the mortgage debt. It has been repeatedly held that the defense of usury is a personal one, and may be waived. Sellers v. Botsford, 11 Mich. 59; Gardner v. Matteson, 38 Mich. 200.

The case is an unfortunate one for the complainant, but it is made so by her failure to put her contract upon record.

The decree is reversed, and the bill of complaint dismissed, with costs.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 1 of Kalamazoo, Plff. in Certiorari.

(.....Mich.....)

Power to make vaccination a condition to admission to the schools is not conferred by statutory authority to determine the qualifications for admission thereto, to do all things needful and desirable for their prosperity and success, and to make and enforce suitable rules and regulations for their government and management, where the children are in good health, there is no smallpox in the town, although there are some cases in other parts of the state, and the statute makes failure to send children to school, and failure on their part to attend, a penal offense.

(Long and Grant, JJ., dissent.)

CERTIORARI to the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County to review a judgment granting a writ of mandamus to compel respondents to allow relator's children to attend the school maintained by them without complying with a rule requiring vaccination. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Walter B. Taylor for relator.

Mr. Alfred J. Mills for respondent.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I cannot agree with the conclusion reached by Justice Long. The children of the relator are of school age, in good health. They have not got the smallpox, nor have they been exposed to it. The law of the state makes it their duty to attend school, and it is the duty of the parent to send them. Comp. Laws, § 4847. In case he fails to do so, he may be subject to fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Comp. Laws, § 4848. The effect of the rule adopted by the school board is to compel the vaccination of the child, or subject him and the parents to the penalties of the law. The practical result, if this rule can be sustained, is to give the board of education the right to compel compulsory vaccination. It is said that the board does not undertake to compel vaccination, but it simply says that until the child is vaccinated it cannot attend school. We have already shown that it is made by law the duty of the child to attend school, and of the parent to send him; and, as long as the broad rule adopted by the board exists, the child must be vaccinated, or it and its parents must be law breakers. If the rule was that during the prevalence of the smallpox in Kalamazoo the child could not attend school unless vaccinated, a very different result would be reached. These epidemics never last very long, and the parent and child might well say, if they desired, that they would absent themselves from school during the epidemic; and this could be done without their being lawbreakers. In the case cited by Justice Long (Duffield v. Williamsport School Dist. 162 Pa. 476, 25 L. R. A. 152, 29 Atl. 742), the record shows that smallpox then existed in the school district. The school board had, because of this fact, and at the request of the board of health, adopted the rule requiring vaccination. A very different case than the case at bar. In Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 383, the legislature itself passed a law requiring vaccination, and it was held to be within the police power; but it is not believed that a case can be found where a board of education, under the general power conferred upon it, is held to have the power to pass a general rule shutting the schools against all children not vaccinated. The question has never before been raised in this state, but the principles involved are not new. In Potts v. Breen, 167 Ill. 67, 39 L. R. A. 152, 47 N. E. 81, the state board of health adopted a rule that no pupil should attend a public school unless vaccinated, and by their directions the school board excluded unvaccinated children from the school. The power given to the board of health was much greater than that conferred upon the Kalamazoo board of education. In holding that the board of health and the school board had exceeded their authority, the court said: "While school directors and boards of education are invested with power to establish, provide for, govern, and regulate public schools, they are in these respects no wise subject to the direction or control of the state board of health; and, as before pointed out, they have no authority to exclude children from the public schools on the ground that they refuse to be vaccinated, unless, indeed, in cases of emergency, in the exercise of the police power, it is necessary, or reasonably appears to be necessary, to prevent the contagion of smallpox. Undoubtedly, also, children infected with or exposed to smallpox may be temporarily exclude it, or the school be temporarily suspended; but, like the exercise of similar power in other cases, such power is justified by the emergency, and, like the necessity which gives rise to it, ceases when the necessity ceases. No one would contend that a child could be permanently excluded from a public school because it had been exposed to smallpox, or that the school could be permanently closed because of the remote fear that the disease of smallpox might appear in the neighborhood, and that if the school should then be open, and children in attendance upon it, the public would be exposed to the contagion. And, upon the same line of reasoning, without a law making vaccination compulsory, or prescribing it, upon grounds deemed sufficient by the legislature as necessary to the public health, as a condition of admission to or attendance upon the public schools, neither the state board nor any local board has any power to make or enforce a rule or order having the force of a general law in the respects mentioned.

... However fully satisfied, by learning and experience, a board might be that anti-toxine would prevent the spread of diphtheria, no one would contend that a rule enforcing its use as a condition precedent to the admission of a child to the public schools would, as the law now is, be valid. It is a matter of common knowledge that the number of those who seriously object to vaccination is by no means small, and they cannot, except when necessary for the public health, and in conformity to law, be deprived of their right to protect themselves and those under their control from an invasion of their liberties by a practically compulsory inoculation of their bodies with a virus of any description, however meritorious it might be." In State ex rel. Adams v. Burdge, 95 Wis. 390, 37 L. R. A. 157, 70 N. W. 347, the board of health, under its general powers, adopted a rule excluding from the public schools pupils who had not been vaccinated. The school board undertook to carry out the rule. The court said: "The police power of the state is relied on to support the rule in question. This power has been defined in varying language, but of substantially the same general import. 'All laws for the protection of life, limb, and health, for the quiet of the person, and for the security of property,' fall within the general police power of the government. 'All persons and property are subjected to all necessary restraints and burdens, to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state;' and it has been said that 'it is coextensive with self-protection, and is not inaptly termed the law of overruling necessity.' It is that inherent and plenary power in the state which enables it to prohibit all things hurtful to the comfort and welfare of society." Tiedeman, Pol. Power, 2-5; Cooley, Const. Lim. 572; Redfield, Ch. J., in Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625; Lakeview v. Rose Hill Cemetery Co. 70 Ill. 192, 22 Am. Rep. 71; State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189. As the police power imposes restrictions and burdens upon the natural and private rights of individuals, it necessarily depends upon the law for its support, and, although of comprehensive and far-reaching character, it is subject to constitutional restrictions; and, in general, it is the province of the lawmaking power to determine in what cases or upon what conditions this power may be exercised. As applied to the present case, the relator had a right, secured by statutory enactment, to have his children continue to attend the city schools in which they were respectively enrolled as pupils; and they, too, had a right to so attend such schools. Whether it be called a "right" or "privilege" cannot be important, for in either view it was secured to the relator, and to his children as well, by the positive provisions of law, and was to be enjoyed upon such terms and under such conditions and restrictions as the lawmaking power, within constitutional limits, might impose. There is no statute in this state authorizing compulsory vaccination, nor any statute which requires vaccination as one of the conditions of the right or privilege of attending the public schools; and, in the absence of any such statute, we think it cannot be maintained that the rule relied upon is a valid exercise of the rightful powers of the state board of health. The state board of health is a creature of the statute, and has only such power as the statute confers. It has no common-law powers. To lawfully exclude the relator's children from the city schools for the cause relied on required such a change in the existing law as the legislature alone could make,—a change that should make vaccination of pupils compulsory, or at least prescribe it as a condition of the right or privilege of attending the public schools generally, or during the occurrence of certain emergencies, or upon the happening of certain contingencies or conditions in respect to the prevalence of smallpox. The powers of the state board of health, though quite general in terms, must be held to be limited to the enforcement of some statute relating to some particular condition or emergency, in respect to the public health; and, although they are to be fairly and liberally construed, yet the statute does not, either expressly or by fair implication, authorize the board to enact a rule or regulation which would have the force of a law changing the statute in relation to the admission, and the right of pupils of a proper school age to attend the public schools. It is not a question as to what the legislature might do, under the police power, about requiring vaccination as a prerequisite to attending school; nor is it a question of whether the legislature could confer this power upon the school board. The board of education is a creature of the statute. It possesses only such powers as the statute gives it. The legislature has said who may and should attend the public schools. It has nowhere undertaken to confer the power upon the school board to change these conditions by passing a general, continuing rule excluding children from the public schools until they comply with conditions not imposed upon them by the legislative branch of the government. In what I have said I do not mean to intimate that during the prevalence of diphtheria or smallpox, or any other epidemic of contagious disease, in a school district, the board may not, under its general powers, temporarily close the schools, or temporarily say who shall be excluded from the schools until the epidemic has passed; but what I do say is that the legislature has not undertaken to give them the power, when no epidemic of contagious disease exists, or is imminent in the district, to pass a general, continuing rule which would have the effect of a general law excluding all pupils who will not submit to vaccination. I think the learned judge was right in saying the school board exceeded its power.

The order of the court below is affirmed.

Montgomery, Ch. J., and Hooker, J., concurred with Moore, J.

Long, J., dissenting:

The relator is a taxpayer and resident of the city of Kalamazoo and school district No. 1, above named. He has three children, aged, respectively, eleven, nine, and seven years; being all within the school age, and entitled to attend the public schools of said district. It appears that in 1894 the school-district board enacted the following rule: "No pupil shall be admitted into any public school who cannot furnish satisfactory evidence that he or she has been vaccinated or otherwise secured against smallpox, and no pupil affected with any contagious disease, or coming from a house where such a disease exists, shall be allowed to remain in any public school." This rule has been in force since its adoption, and is still in force. The relator's three children have never been vaccinated. He sent them to school at the opening of the term in January last, but admission was refused by the respondent because they had not been vaccinated or otherwise protected against smallpox in accordance with the above rule. Upon such refusal the relator petitioned the circuit court for mandamus to compel the board to permit his said children to attend said school notwithstanding such rule. The court below granted the prayer of the petition. The case comes into this court by certiorari.

Counsel for relator contends that the rule is unreasonable and unconstitutional; that the relator, being a Christian Scientist, cannot conscientiously consent to have his children vaccinated, because to do so would infringe upon his religious beliefs and scruples; that his children could not be vaccinated without his consent, and therefore without any act of their own would be excluded from the enjoyment of the public schools, secured to them by the Constitution; that the statute is mandatory that they shall attend the public schools during a certain portion of the year; and that the parents, as well as the children, are liable to punishment under the truancy laws of 54 L. R. A.

this state for failure of the children to attend school. It is also contended that there is no statute of the state providing for compulsory vaccination, and no statute giving any school district authority or power to require children to be vaccinated, as a condition precedent to attending school. It is admitted that there has been no smallpox in the city of Kalamazoo or in such school district No. 1, but it is known that the disease has been and is prevalent in several parts of the United States and in this state. We do not feel called upon to enter upon or discuss the question of the religious scruples of the relator. The only question is whether the respondent had lawful authority to adopt and enforce the rule complained of. It is not a rule compelling vaccination, but one adopted for the safety of the children in attendance upon the school, and for the safety of the whole community; and providing that those who do not submit to such protection, such as science and experience have shown it to be, against smallpox, cannot be permitted to endanger the lives of those who do comply therewith. The respondent district was organized under act No. 335, Local Acts 1891. The general management and conduct of the affairs of the district are vested in a body of six trustees. By § 8 the board is given power to hire any and all necessary teachers for the several schools of the district, and fix the amount of their compensation and of all teachers employed by the board, and to determine the ages and qualifications for admission therein. By the same section the board is given authority to enact such rules and by-laws as may be necessary for the preservation of all the property belonging to the district and for the government of the schools, and in reference to all business connected therewith, and to regulate the conduct of all persons in the schools and on the grounds belonging to said district. Section 11 of the act provides: "It shall be the duty of the board of education to . . . generally do all things needful and desirable for the maintenance, prosperity, and success of the schools and the library in the district." Section 34 of the act provides: "School district No. 1 of the city and township of Kalamazoo shall in all things not herein otherwise provided be governed by its powers and duties defined by the general laws of this state regulating school districts and district libraries therein, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed." The general school law provides: "The district board shall have the general care of the school, and shall make and enforce suitable rules and regulations for its government and management." We think, under these provisions, that the board of trustees had the power to make the rule now sought to be set aside, and that such rule is a reasonable regulation. A case similar in principle was before the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1894. Duffield v. Williamsport School Dist. 162 Pa. 476, 25 L. R. A. 152, 29 Atl. 742. It appeared there that the school board adopted a resolution providing that "no pupils shall attend the schools of this city, except they be vaccinated, or furnish a certificate from a physician that such vaccination has been performed." The child who was excluded from attendance was within the school age and in good health, and was excluded solely on the ground of noncompliance with the rule of the board. Mandamus was sought to compel the board to permit the child to attend without complying with the rule. The writ was denied in the court below, and that order affirmed in the supreme court. It was there said: "We are not required to determine judicially whether the public belief in the efficacy of vaccination is absolutely right or not. We are to consider what is reasonable in view of the present state of medical knowledge, and the concurring opinions of the various boards and officers charged with the care of the public health. The answers of the city and the school board show the belief of the proper authorities to be that a proper regard for the public health and for the children in the public schools require the adoption of the regulation complained of. They are doing in the utmost good faith what they believe it is their duty to do; and, though the plaintiff might be able to demonstrate by the highest scientific tests that they are mistaken in this respect, that would not be enough. It is not an error of judgment or a mistake upon some abstruse question of medical science, but an abuse of discretionary power, that justifies the courts in interfering with the conduct of the school board, or setting aside its action. It is conceded that the board might rightfully exclude the plaintiff's son if he was actually sick with, or just recovering from, the smallpox. Though he might not be affected by it, yet, if another member of the same family was, the right to exclude him, notwithstanding he might be in perfect health, would be conceded. How far shall this right to exclude one for the good of many be carried? That is a question addressed to the official discretion of the proper officers, and when the discretion is honestly and impartially exercised the courts will not interfere." In that case it appeared that by no legislative act had school districts been given express power to prescribe vaccination as a necessary qualification for admission into the common schools, or to suspend or expel pupils for failure to comply with the rule requiring vaccination. It was found that there was smallpox within the city, and we think that court very properly held that it was within the discretionary power of the board to adopt such a rule. See also Blue v. Beach, 155 Ind. 121, 50 L. R. A. 64, 56 N. E. 59. In the present case, while it did not appear that smallpox was prevalent in the city of Kalamazoo, it did appear that it was in many places within the state. The board enforced the rule as a precautionary measure to prevent the spread of the disease. We think this was within the discretionary power of the board. The order of the court below should be reversed.

v.
MICHIGAN MILLERS' MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

2. The legislature may provide that no breach of condition in an insurance policy shall avoid it, as to an insurer not injured thereby, without interfering with any constitutional right of contract, or, as to future contracts, impairing their obligation, since, insurance companies being the creatures of the legislature, it may prescribe limitations in relation to forfeiture of their contracts.
3. The temporary absence of a competent watchman regularly employed for a mill, during which the mill is destroyed by fire, will not avoid a policy of insurance on the property, which provides that statements in the application shall be a part of the contract, although in the application the insured agrees to keep a watchman on the premises at such times as that when the fire occurs.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ingham County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Crane, Norris, & Drew, for plaintiff in error:

This application was a warranty.

On the night of the fire, and at the time it occurred, the watchman was not present.

A warranty must be literally performed.

NOTE.—For another case in this series as to effect of failure to keep watchman on liability under insurance policy stipulating that watchman shall be employed, where the loss is not due to such failure, see Hart v. Niagara F. Ins. Co. (Wash.) 27 L. R. A. 86.

As to constitutionality of statute making void all stipulations in policies which limit liability to less than full amount of loss, if this does not exceed the amount of the insurance, see Dugger v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 28 L. R. A. 796.

As to statute making nonoccupancy immaterial notwithstanding a provision of the policy, unless the risk is thereby increased, see Moody v. Amazon Ins. Co. (Ohio) 26 L. R. A. 818.

Where the assured warrants to keep a watchman on the premises he must see to it that the watchman attends to his duty. If the watchman does not, the policy is avoided.

Messrs. Cahill & Wood, for defendant in error:

In dealing with warranties, common sense is not to be lost sight of, and the fair, practical intent of the parties is to be sought, not the hair-splitting of a college of wit crackers, and substantial fulfillment of a warranty is enough.

1 May, Ins. § 156; Merchants' Life Assn. v. Yoakum, 39 C. C. A. 56, 98 Fed. 251.

No paragraph relating to the watchman appears in the policy, and the one in the application suggests no penalty. This omission in an instrument replete with clear and explicit declarations of forfeiture is worthy of note. The presence of the declaration of forfeiture in every other instance, and its absence in this, is clearly not an oversight.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is a fire insurance company organized under the laws of the state 54 L. R. A.

of Michigan, with its principal office at Lansing, Michigan. The plaintiff is the owner, by assignment from the Verona Mill Company, of a policy of insurance issued to said Verona Mill Company by the defendant company. In March, 1899, the Verona Mill Company made a written application for insurance. Among other things stated in the application is the following:

What facilities have you in the way of force pumps, extinguishers, etc., for putting out fire?

A. Waterworks.

Do you agree to keep a watchman on the premises at all times when not in operation?

A. Yes.

Do you agree to keep at least one cask of salt water on each floor of the buildings, and one or more buckets to each cask, always in order and ready for use in case of fire?

A. Yes.

Do you agree not to use open, movable lights on the premises insured?

Yes.

If both water and steam power are used, state what proportion of the time a permit for steam is wanted.

Is smoking permitted except in the office?

No.

What is the capacity of the mill in twenty-four hours?

200 bbls.

State anything affecting the risk, not otherwise fully explained.

Through what bank do you prefer to have collections on you made?

Farmers' Bank.

And the undersigned applicant hereby warrants that the above is a just, full, and true exposition of the facts and circumstances in regard to the property to be insured, and is and shall be considered as the basis on which insurance is to be effected and continued in force, and the same is understood as incorporated in and forming a part and parcel of the policy as a continuing warranty during the life of such policy. And it is covenanted and agreed that if the situation or circumstances affecting the risk shall be so altered or changed as to render the risk more hazardous, or if there be any change affecting the title, interest, or possession of the property, the assured will notify the secretary of said company forthwith, in writing, of such alteration or change.

Upon this application a policy of insurance was issued. The provisions of said policy which counsel deem material in this controversy read as follows: ". . . Reference is made to assured's application and survey on file in the office of this company, and which is made part of this policy. . . . This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof, or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein, or in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss. This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon and added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy, or if the subject of insurance be a manufacturing establishment, and it be operated in whole or in part at night later than 10 o'clock, or if it cease to be operated for more than ten consecutive days. . . . If an application, survey, plan, or description of property be referred to in this policy, it shall be a part of this contract, and a warranty by the insured. . . . This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions as may be indorsed hereon or added hereto, and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company shall have power to waive any provisions or conditions of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto; and as to such provisions and conditions no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached." Afterwards a loss occurred, and this suit was brought. A stipulation of facts was filed, the material parts of which read as follows: "April 17, 1899, at or about 11:30 P. M., fire originated from an unknown cause in the insured property, and the same was totally destroyed by fire. The mill was generally running from 7 o'clock A. M. until 6 o'clock P. M. It was not running during the night nor on Sundays. The mill company maintained in the mill a small electric light plant, which furnished electric lights in the village of Verona; said light plant being started up at dusk in the evening, and closing at 10 o'clock P. M. The Verona Roller-Mill Company employed J. U. Robinson, who was also secretary of the company, as one of its engineers and watchman. He was a competent man to perform the duties for which he was employed. He was hired and had agreed to take charge of the machinery as millwright, engineer, and watchman, as follows: To go on duty at 12 o'clock noon of each day, Sundays excepted, and so long as the mill was running to run the engine, do the firing, look after the repairs to the mill machinery, and when the mill ceased running at 6 o'clock P. M. to run the electric plant above referred to until 10 o'clock P. M., and while running the plant to perform the duties of night watchman at the mill, and after 10 o'clock P. M. to remain on the premises and perform the duties of night watchman until 12 o'clock midnight, when he was relieved by W. B. Taylor and went off duty. He ran the electric light plant Sundays from dark until 10 P. M., and watched Sunday nights from 10 to 12 P. M. W. B. Taylor was employed by the Verona Roller-Mill Company as second engineer and watchman, to perform duties as follows: He was to go on duty every night at 12 o'clock midnight, act as watchman until the mill started up in the morning, when he ran the engine as engineer and fireman until 12 o'clock noon, when he was relieved by J. U. Robinson, and went off duty. On Saturday nights Mr. Taylor went on at 12 o'clock midnight, and watched until daylight, when he went off duty, and no watchman, or other person having the duties of watchman, was in charge of the mill premises on Sundays until the electric light plant was started up in the evening. The employees and officers of the mill company were around the mill on Sundays, there being some one of them at the mill once or twice each Sunday, but no one performing the duties of watchman on Sundays during the day. Mr. Taylor was a competent man for his employment, and was paid by the Verona Roller-Mill Company for performing the duties as above detailed. On the night when the fire occurred, J. U. Robinson ran the electric light plant until 10 o'clock. At that hour he shut down the lighting plant, carefully inspected all the stories of the mill, and went home, leaving the mill at about 10:15 P. M.; his wife being quite sick at the time, which was the occasion of his leaving the mill on this occasion prior to 12 o'clock P. M. Robinson went straight home and went to bed, and at the time the fire broke out was in bed at his house at the other end of the village of Verona, about 200 yards away from the mill, and out of sight of the mill. The other officers and stockholders of the Verona Roller-Mill Company were not aware that Robinson had left the mill that night. Said Robinson had on a few occasions prior to the date of the fire left the mill alone in a similar way between the hours of 10 and 12 o'clock P. M., but his absence on these occasions was likewise unknown to any of the other officers or stockholders of the Verona Roller-Mill Company. It is admitted that the officers and stockholders of the Verona Roller-Mill Company used due diligence in the selection of Robinson and Taylor as watchmen at the mill; that Robinson's absence was occasioned solely by the sickness of his wife, who was quite sick; that the mill property destroyed was worth in excess of the total amount of the insurance upon the same; that the company sustained quite a loss not covered by insurance; and that there was no fraud or bad faith upon the part of the plaintiff or his assignor, the Verona Roller-Mill Company. It is admitted that all of the conditions and agreements set forth in said application and policy have been fully and literally complied with by the Verona Roller-Mill Company and the plaintiff herein, except as regards the absence of the watchman, as hereinbefore set out, and as to whether this condition of the application of the policy has been complied with is to be determined by the court upon this agreed state of facts; and, if the facts herein set out constitute such a compliance, then judgment is to be rendered for the plaintiff for $2,849.67, with interest at 6 per cent per annum from the 25th day of April, 1899; otherwise, judgment is to be rendered for the defendant." The circuit judge rendered a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the full amount of his claim. The case is brought here by writ of error.

The circuit judge held that § 5180, Comp. Laws 1897, applies to this policy of insurance, and the policy did not become void for failure to keep a watchman upon the premises on Sundays; the loss not having occurred during such times, or by reason of the absence of the watchman on Sundays. This policy was issued in March, 1899, nearly two years after the provisions of § 5180, Comp. Laws, took effect. Counsel insist that the provisions of that section apply only to a Michigan standard policy, and that the policy sued upon is not a Michigan standard policy. We do not need to decide whether this policy issued by a Michigan company, with an indorsement on the back, "Standard Policy," is a Michigan standard policy or not. Section 5180 reads as follows: "That no policy of fire insurance shall hereafter be declared void by the insurer for the breach of any condition of the policy if the insurer has not been injured by such breach; or where a loss has not occurred during such breach, or by reason of such breach of condition." This language is broad enough to cover the policy in suit, whether it is regarded as a Michigan standard policy or not, and we think it was intended to cover all policies issued in this state after it became a law. Though there is no direct adjudication to that effect, we think the opinion of the court in this respect is foreshadowed in Niles v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 119 Mich. 252, 77 N. W. 933; Cronin v. Fire Assn. of Philadelphia, 123 Mich. 277, 82 N. W. 45; Shelden v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 124 Mich. 303, 82 N. W. 1068; Boyer v. Grand Rapids F. Ins. Co. 124 Mich. 455, 83 N. W. 124. Counsel say: "The act in question is unconstitutional. It puts an unconstitutional limit on the right of parties sui juris to make contracts for themselves. The legislature has no authority to deprive a party of his right to make contracts not immoral or contrary to public policy. Any limitation which transgresses this private right is unconstitutional and invalid. Also this statute as now set up by plaintiff impairs the obligation of contract, and is for that reason invalid." We cannot agree with counsel in this respect. The defendant corporation is a creature of the statute. It could not engage in the business of insurance except by virtue of the statute. It is entirely competent for the legislature to prescribe the forms of its contracts, and the limitations in relation to forfeitures therein. It, of course, would not be competent to impair the obligation of contracts already entered into, but that is not what is attempted to be done here. The idea of the legislature, doubtless, was to protect policy holders, and to see that their insurance did not fail because of any breach in the terms of the policy or the application which did not result in injury to the insurance company. See note a, § 156, May, Ins., and cases there cited. The court also held that the act of Robinson, the watchman, in leaving the mill the night of the fire at 10:15 P. M. and remaining away from there during the time he was to act as watchman, under the facts stipulated, did not constitute a breach of the warranty which avoided the policy.

It is insisted upon the part of the defendant that the application is the basis of the insurance, and the agreement to keep a watchman is a warranty, and the failure to do so avoids the policy. It is said: "There is no room for construction, no latitude, no equity. If the warranty be a statement of facts, it must be literally true; if a stipulation that a certain act shall or shall not be done, it must be literally performed." 1 May, Ins. § 156. On the part of the plaintiff it is said the agreement to keep a watchman is a promissory agreement, and not a warranty, the literal observance of which is necessary to keep the policy in force, inasmuch as there is no express provision in the policy that a failure to keep a watchman at all times shall make the policy void. The authorities upon these several propositions are very conflicting. The old rule as to warranties fully sustains the contention of counsel for defendant, but there has been a tendency of late years to hold that the substantial fulfillment of an agreement like that contained in the application is sufficient. In May, Ins. § 156, it is said, after the language before quoted: "A learned judge and author declares it to be unfortunate that so strict a rule has been established, and intimates—what is no doubt entirely true—that courts are not at all inclined to go beyond the precedents to support a warranty. There are even authorities to the effect that in dealing with warranties common sense is not to be lost sight of, and that the fair, practical intent of the parties is to be sought, not the hair-splitting of a college of wit crackers, and that substantial fulfillment of a warranty is enough." In the policy sued upon it is provided the policy shall be void for any one of seventeen different reasons. It also provides the company shall not be liable for loss occasioned by invasion, or from loss resulting from a number of other causes, but it nowhere provides the policy shall be void if a competent watchman is hired by the insured, and is temporarily absent from his post, or if one or more of the buckets to each cask of salt water should be temporarily removed. If it had been intended to avoid the policy for these reasons, it would not have been difficult to say so. The following illustrations will serve to show the tendency of courts: The case of Hanover F. Ins. Co. v. Gustin, 40 Neb. 828, 59 N. W. 375, was much like the one at bar. We quote from the opinion: "Watchman.—Is one kept on the premises during the night, and at all other times when the works are not in operation, or when the workmen are not present? A. Yes. Q. Is any other duty required of the watchman than watching for the safety of the premises? A. Yes; cleaning the floors and premises. The evidence shows that the fire occurred about half-past seven o'clock, and that the watchman, with Mr. Gustin, left the premises about 6:15 o'clock. Before their departure, however, the watchman had inspected the different parts of the mill, and found everything apparently safe from fire. He locked up the building, and went to the business part of the city of Kearney to buy a padlock with which to secure a door of an outside building. While he was gone he went to the depot of the Burlington & Missouri River Railroad Company and purchased a ticket for a lady friend of his, and in the interval between his leaving the planing mill and returning thereto he ate his supper. While on his way to the planing mill to resume his duties of watchman the alarm of fire was sounded. It is insisted that the absence of the watchman for the purposes named, with the assent of Mr. Gustin, necessarily avoided the policy. To this doctrine we cannot assent. Even giving the statements of the application 'that a watchman is kept on the premises during the night and at all other times when the works are not in operation' the effect of a warranty,—a claim not necessary now to be settled,—the language should receive a reasonable construction. We are aware that on this proposition there is not accord of authorities; possibly in number they are adverse to this view, yet it is believed that the language of Judge Shaw in Crocker v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Cush. 79, is reasonable and just. He said: "The stipulation, 'a watchman kept on the premises,' inserted as it is in the body of the policy immediately after the description of the property insured, is in the nature of a warranty, and must be substantially complied with by the assured, but the terms are not explicit as to the time and manner of keeping a watch. It does not stipulate for a constant watch. It therefore requires construction, as matter of law, to determine what is meant in this policy by keeping a watch. It relates to a factory, to its safety against fire; and this depends upon the habit or practice in this respect, and upon the fact whether that usage has been followed. When there is an express stipulation that a thing shall be done, but the contract is silent as to the time and manner, the law holds that it must be reasonable in this respect, having regard to the object and purpose of the stipulation, in this case, to the safety of the building. If it is done in the manner in which men of ordinary care and skill in similar departments manage their own affairs of like kind, this is one strong ground to hold it reasonable, and to warrant the admission of evidence of usage." The same principle requiring a reasonable construction of the language used is recognized and enforced in Sheldon v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 22 Conn. 235, 58 Am. Dec. 420; Frisbie v. Fayette Mut. Ins. Co. 27 Pa. 325; Houghton v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Met. 114, 41 Am. Dec. 489; Percival v. Maine M. M. Ins. Co. 33 Me. 242; Stout v. City F. Ins. Co. 12 Iowa, 371, 79 Am. Dec. 539. These views have quite directly received the sanction of this court in Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. McLimans, 28 Neb. 846, 45 N. W. 171." It was held the company was liable. In Phoenix Assur. Co. v. Coffman, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 631, 32 S. W. 810, the application contained an agreement to have a watchman on the premises at night and at all times when the work was suspended. It was held that the insured, by employing a reliable watchman, and charging him with the duty of watching the premises, substantially complied with the contract in that respect, though the watchman may have been asleep at the time of the fire. The court used the following language: "Appellee testified: 'At the time of the fire I had a watchman at the mill, named Dean. I employed him as a watchman. I assigned him the duty to be at the mill at a certain hour in the evening, when the hands left, and to stay there until the hands came back in the morning, and to watch the mill to see that nobody bothered anything or stole anything.' In the absence of any testimony pointing out more clearly the duties required of a watchman, we must hold that the appellee complied with the contract by placing on the premises a reliable watchman, charged with the duties of watching the property during the night, even though such watchman may have been asleep when the fire began. Sierra Mill Smelting & Min. Co. v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 76 Cal. 235, 18 Pac. 267; Au Sable Lumber Co. v. Detroit Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 89 Mich. 407; 50 N. W. 870; Houghton v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Met. 123, 41 Am. Dec. 489. In the last-named case the question was asked: 'Is a watch kept constantly in the building? If no watch is constantly kept, state what is the arrangement respecting it.' Answer. 'No watch is kept in or at the building, but the mill is examined thirty minutes after work.' In that case Chief Justice Shaw said: 'Two questions were made at the trial: 'First. Whether this representation of the usual practice amounted to any condition or stipulation that it should be continued. It was ruled at the trial, and the whole court are now of opinion, that as this examination was manifestly intended as a substitute for a constant watch, as it was one which the assured had in their power to make or cause to be made, as it was one of the precautions tending to secure the property against danger of fire and tending to its safety, it was one which, as a general practice, the assured were bound to follow, although an occasional omission, owing to accident or the negligence of subordinate persons, servants, or workmen, not sanctioned nor permitted by the assured, or by their superintendent, manager, or agent, might not be a breach or noncompliance." See Hovey v. American Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Duer, 554; Crocker v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Cush. 79; London & L. F. Ins. Co. v. Gerteson, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 471, 51 S. W. 617; Burlington F. Ins. Co. v. Coffman, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 439, 35 S. W. 406. In Kansas Mill Owners & Mfrs. Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Metcalf, 59 Kan. 383, 53 Pac. 68, in the application the question was asked, "Do you agree to keep a watchman on the premises at all times when . . . not in operation?" The answer was, "Yes." A watchman was employed, who was in and about the mill until 10 o'clock, when he went to a tent occupied by his family, about 200 feet away, and remained until the fire occurred, nearly two hours later. The company was held liable. In Rankin v. Amazon Ins. Co. 89 Cal. 203, 26 Pac. 872, under the facts in that case it was held the company was not liable, but in the opinion the following language is used: "If a loss is occasioned by the mere fault or negligence of the watchman, unaffected by fraud or design on the part of the insured, it is within the protection of the policy; but, to entitle the insured to recover, it must appear that he has in good faith employed a watchman to perform the duties required by the terms of the warranty. Trojan Min. Co. v. Fireman's Ins. Co. 67 Cal. 27, 7 Pac. 4; Wenzel v. Commercial Ins. Co. 67 Cal. 438, 7 Pac. 817; Cowan v. Phenix Ins. Co. 78 Cal. 181, 20 Pac. 408; Waters v. Merchants' Louisville Ins. Co. 11 Pet. 219, 9 L. ed. 604." In King Brick Mfg. Co. v. Royal Ins. Co. 164 Mass. 291, 41 N. E. 277, attached to each of the policies of insurance was a rider containing, among other things, these words: "Situated on east side of Pleasant river, in Columbia Falls, Maine. Steam pump, with sufficient hose to cover buildings. Constant watch." The watchman was absent when the fire occurred, without the knowledge of the insured. It was claimed the words "constant watch" were a warranty, and not a representation, and that the company was not liable. The court said: "Was there a breach of any of the terms of the policy by the insured? This depends upon whether the insured absolutely promised that there should be 'a constant watch;' in other words, whether it warranted this, or whether the words constitute a representation, merely, and are governed by the familiar rules applicable to representations. Unless they amount to a warranty, there is no breach of the agreement. In this part of the case we assume, of course, that the first clause of the section is not broad enough to include a statement as to the future. It is a familiar rule of construction that a promise in regard to the future, which is not clearly made a warranty, is a representation only, and not a warranty. Houghton v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Met. 114, 41 Am. Dec. 489; Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 416, 59 Am. Dec. 192; 54 L. R. A.

First Nat. Bank v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 95 U. S. 873, 24 L. ed. 563; Garcelon v. Hampden F. Ins. Co. 50 Me. 580. On the principles laid down in these cases, we cannot regard the words 'constant watch' as constituting a condition precedent to the right to recover, and consider them as a representation that a constant watch would be kept. The duty was imposed upon the insured to use all reasonable care, and to take all reasonable means to see that a constant watch was kept. This was done by making a rule to that effect and providing a watch. No negligence or fraud is imputed to the assured. The loss was caused by the negligence of a servant, and this is a risk covered by the insurance. There was therefore no breach of the terms of the policy by the insured. Shaw v. Robberds, 6 Ad. & El. 75; Dobson v. Sotheby, Moody & M. 90; Houghton v. Manufacturers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 8 Met. 114, 41 Am. Dec. 489; Daniels v. Hudson River F. Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 416, 59 Am. Dec. 192; Loud v. Citizens' Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Gray, 221; Insurance Co. of N. A. v. McDowell, 50 Ill. 120, 131, 99 Am. Dec. 497; Aurora F. Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 55 Ill. 213, 219; Mickey v. Burlington Ins. Co. 35 Iowa, 174, 14 Am. Rep. 404." In East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 647, 26 S. W. 720, the assured agreed to keep correct books and the last inventory locked in a fireproof safe, or in some place not exposed to fire, and in case of loss to produce the books and inventory. They were kept as required, but when the store was on fire the bookkeeper, fearing the safe was not fireproof, took the books and inventory to remove them to a safe place. As he ran out of the building he dropped some of them, and they were destroyed by fire. The company claimed, by way of defense, the plaintiff must literally comply with his covenant, and produce the books and inventory after the loss, before it could recover. The court declined to so hold, and the company was held liable. The case of Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 30 C. C. A. 265, 94 Fed. 314, was much like the last case. Among other things, the court said: "Counsel for defendant company direct our attention, however, to the last paragraph of the 'iron-safe clause,' and urge, in substance, that the stipulation therein contained bound the plaintiffs, in any event, to produce the inventory after the fire, and that, even though it was lost and cannot be produced, they are not entitled to recover. This argument proceeds upon the theory that the last paragraph of the 'iron-safe clause' must be read literally, that it admits of no exceptions or qualifications, and that the failure to produce the books or inventory for any reason vitiates the policies. We cannot assent to this view of the case. Like all contracts made between private parties, and like all statutes, for that matter, they must receive a reasonable interpretation, which will not work injustice or lead to absurd consequences. United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 L. ed. 278; Heydenfeldt v. Daney Gold & Silver Min. Co. 93 U. S. 634, 23 L. ed. 995;

Grant, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur with my brethren in this case. Plaintiff agreed to keep a watchman upon the premises at all times when the mill was not in operation. The watchman whom plaintiff employed left his post in the night, went to his home, and retired to his bed. Who assumed the duty to keep the watchman? The plaintiff. Who assumed the risk of neglect of that duty by him? Clearly, it seems to me, the plaintiff. It was not contemplated that the defendant company should undertake to see that the watchman performed his duty or should be responsible for such neglect. Under the holding of my brethren, the premises might be unwatched night after night, and still the defendant would be liable. While there is an apparent conflict in the authorities on the question of warranties, I think the following rule is in harmony with the great weight of authority: "The courts are reluctant to import terms of warranty contained in the application for insurance into the completed agreement, when the policy does not clearly disclose the parties' agreement to the union of the two papers in one contract. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Radcliff, 120 U. S. 183, 30 L. ed. 644, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500. But when there is a distinct agreement that the application is a part of the contract, and the statements in the application, upon which the contract is based, are expressly declared to be warranties, the insured's intent to bind himself to the exact truth in his answers, even as to immaterial facts, is adequately manifested, and the parties themselves thereby agree upon the materiality of the things warranted. Burritt v. Saratoga County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 5 Hill, 188, 40 Am. Dec. 345; Armour v. Transatlantic F. Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 450; O'Shaughnessy v. Working Women's Co-op. Asso. 8 Misc. 491, 28 N. Y. Supp. 761; American Credit Indemnity Co. v. Carrollton Furniture Mfg. Co. 36 C. C. A. 671, 95 Fed. 111; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Nichols (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 910." Applying this rule to the facts of this case, I am compelled to hold that the agreement to keep a watchman upon the premises at all times when the mill was not in operation was a warranty to do so, and that its breach avoided the policy. See American Ins. Co. 54 L. R. A.

v. Gilbert, 27 Mich. 433; Hoose v. Prescott Ins. Co. 84 Mich. 317, 11 L. R. A. 340, 47 N. W. 587. I think the judgment should be reversed.

MICHIGAN HOME & HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION, Plff. in Err.

1. Failure to comply with the requirements of a policy insuring against illness, as to time of furnishing proofs of disability and as to allowing time for investigating the claim, will not defeat an action on the policy when liability is denied because the disease is not covered by the policy, and insured is not confined to the house.
2. Recovery on a policy insuring against illness, which limits liability to the period when insured is continuously confined to his house and subject to the personal calls of a registered physician in good standing, is not defeated by the fact that the insured went out by direction of his physician for an occasional and necessary airing, if, by reason of the illness, he was continuously confined to the house the larger portion of the time.

(Montgomery, Ch. J., and Hooker, J., dissent.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kent County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover upon a policy providing sick benefits. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Wolcott & Perkins for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. McKnight & McAllister, for defendant in error:

During the time that plaintiff was sick the defendant had its physicians examine into the facts, and before the time had elapsed for the filing of proof of disability defendant notified plaintiff that it would not pay him, for the reason that he had consumption. This dispensed with compliance with the requirements of the policy as to notice.

Under the terms of this policy the plaintiff was totally disabled and prevented from doing any work whatever, and was, under the proper construction, continuously confined to his house on account of such sickness and disability.

NOTE.—For denial of liability as waiver of proofs of loss, see, in this series, German Ins. Co. v. Gueck (Ill.) 6 L. R. A. 835; Foust v. American F. Ins. Co. (Wis.) 30 L. R. A. 783; and Hicks v. British America Assur. Co. (N. Y.) 48 L. R. A. 424.

If he was continuously confined to his house on account of such sickness to the extent that he was necessarily and in good faith there a larger portion of the time, and only went forth, either from necessity or for consultation with or by direction of his physician, in whose charge and care he was, this would, under the rules of construction given by this court, be a compliance with the requirements of the policy.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff obtained a judgment of $150 against defendant. The case is brought here by writ of error. The plaintiff is engaged in the confectionery and bakery business. The defendant is a corporation organized under and in pursuance of the laws of the state of Michigan, doing an accident and sick benefit insurance business, with its principal office located at the city of Grand Rapids, Michigan. In October, A. D. 1894, the plaintiff joined the defendant association. There was issued to him a policy of insurance containing the following agreement: "First. If, at any time after this certificate has been in continuous force and effect for ninety consecutive days, said member shall, through any sickness or disease mentioned in Schedule A on the back of this certificate, beginning after the expiration of the above term, become totally disabled, and such disability shall, independent of all other causes, wholly and continuously disable and prevent said member from prosecuting any and all kinds of business, upon satisfactory proofs to the association of such total and continuous disability said member shall be entitled to receive at the rate of $10 per week, after the first week, during the time he is continuously confined to his bed or to the house and subject to the personal calls of a registered physician in good standing, not to exceed thirty weeks in any one illness. But if the same member is sick for thirty continuous days, which sickness begins after ninety days from the date of certificate, he shall receive, under the terms of this certificate, payment from the date of sickness, without deduction for the first week." The diseases covered by Schedule A, among others, are inflammation of the lungs and la grippe. The plaintiff kept up his payments from October, 1894, to the 12th day of September, A. D. 1899, paying in advance. It is the claim of the plaintiff that, as the result of la grippe, he had a hemorrhage, which made it necessary for him to call a doctor, and that his illness continued so that he is entitled to recover for a period of fifteen weeks. After his illness began, the company were notified of it; and one of their physicians visited the plaintiff and obtained some of his sputum, which the physician examined, and also submitted to another physician, both of whom concluded the plaintiff's disease was consumption. On the 22d of January, 1900, the manager of the company wrote Mrs. Hoffman, among other things: "There are two reasons why this claim, in accordance with Mr. Hoffman's policy contract, is not a legal claim against this association: In the first place, we do not, and never have, paid for consumption. In the second place, article 1, on the face of Mr. Hoffman's policy, states that the claimant, in order to be entitled to benefits, must be entirely confined to the house. In accordance with the above statements, Mr. Hoffman's claim against this association has been rejected." In his testimony as a witness the manager testified, among other things: "The reason I would not submit to paying this claim was because the physicians claimed that he had consumption. I had arrived at the conclusion that the doctors knew what ailed him. I refused to pay the claim because he had hemorrhage of the lungs. The doctors said that resulted in consumption." The articles of association provided for an arbitration in case the validity of a claim was in question. March 19, 1900, a stipulation was filed in which it was stated plaintiff asserted a claim which defendant disputed, waiving an arbitration, and consenting that suit might be brought, and that a judgment of the court should be binding upon the parties. It is the claim of defendant "that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to maintain a suit upon his policy, he must show: (1) His sickness, and its nature and duration. (2) That it was one of the diseases mentioned in Schedule A of his certificate. (3) That these facts must be made to appear in a final proof furnished to the association within thirty days after the end of the sickness for which indemnity is claimed. (4) That a period of three months, stipulated for the investigation of the claim by the association after receipt of the final proofs, has elapsed." The first two of these propositions is true, but in view of the rejection of the claim, not because of the failure to comply with the last two propositions, but because it was claimed plaintiff had a disease not within the terms of the policy, and because he was not entirely confined to the house, we think defendant cannot now insist upon a compliance with the third and fourth propositions. The case is ruled by O'Brien v. Ohio Ins. Co. 52 Mich. 131, 17 N. W. 726; Young v. Ohio Farmers' Ins. Co. 92 Mich. 71, 52 N. W. 454.

It is insisted the court erred in charging the jury as to the degree of illness required to entitle plaintiff to recover. It is said by counsel: "The standard of the degree and severity of the illness during which the policy holder was entitled to recover indemnity, as expressed in the contract itself, is that he must be continuously confined to his house and subject to the personal calls of a registered physician in good standing. The meaning of this language, upon its face, is very plain. He must be so ill as to need the attendance of a physician at his house. It is difficult to see how the language of the contract can be construed to mean anything else without doing violence to the plain meaning of the words employed." The court charged the jury as follows: "First, then, what is meant by the provision in this policy, 'continuously confined to the house and subject to the personal calls of a registered physician in good standing?' A contract of insurance is to receive a reasonable construction, so as to effectuate the purpose for which it was made. At the same time, the proper force and effect should be given to all the language used, for the purpose of guarding the association against fraud and imposture. Provisions such as the one under consideration are inserted for this express purpose, as well as for other purposes. The object to be accomplished by this contract is to indemnify the plaintiff from loss from total or continuous disability to prosecute any and all kinds of business. And it is provided, in substance, that he shall receive $10 per week during the time he is continuously confined to the house subject to the calls of a physician in good standing. That the plaintiff was totally and continuously disabled from prosecuting any business during the time claimed does not appear to be questioned by the defendant in this case. But it insists he was not continuously confined to his house. Was he, or was he not? That is the question. I charge you, gentlemen, that to constitute a compliance with this provision it is not necessary that the plaintiff should remain in the house continuously during the entire time of disability; that to step out of doors now and then, or to occasionally go to the office of his physician, would not be a violation of this clause, or defeat plaintiff's right of recovery. It may be that an occasional airing is essential to a speedy recovery. A rule which would make nugatory a contract having for its special object indemnity on account of sickness because the insured took an occasional and necessary airing would be unreasonable. Was the defendant sick, and with the disease covered by his policy, to the extent that he was totally disabled from prosecuting any business? and was he continuously confined to his house on account of such sickness, to the extent that he was necessarily and in good faith there the larger portion of his time, and only went forth, either from necessity for consultation with, or by direction of, the physician in whose charge and care he was? An answer to this question will determine this branch of the case. So, gentlemen, I charge you that if you find from the testimony in this case that the plaintiff was continuously confined to his home on account of a sickness or disease covered by the terms of his policy, to the extent that he was necessarily, in good faith, the larger portion of the time, and only went forth either from necessity for consultation with, or by direction of, his physician, Dr. Barth, in whose charge and care he was, if you so find, then and in that case the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the term so continuously confined at the rate fixed in the policy,—$10 per week." Questions of a similar character to this were involved in Turner v. Fidelity & C. Co. 112 Mich. 425, 38 L. R. A. 529, 70 N. W. 898, and Hohn v. Inter-State Casualty Co. 115 Mich. 79, 72 N. W. 1105. A reference to these cases will make an extended discussion here unnecessary. The charge of the court followed these cases. It is said the record does not justify the suggestion of the court that plaintiff left his home and went to Chicago by the advice of his physician. Counsel must have overlooked the testimony of Mrs. Hoffman, who said: "He had a hemorrhage at that time. It was September 11th. He was taken to his bed at that time. He was in the house from that time—oh, six weeks, I guess, or something like that—until he went to Chicago. He went down to the doctor's to get some medicine, and the doctor thought it would be a good change for him to get out, because we lived at the rear of the store, and to get away from business. He thought it would help him. He was not able to do any work during this time. I think the date when he went away was about the 25th of October. He didn't go out only just the day before, when he went for a walk, or he went away. He went to Chicago because the doctor advised him to. He thought it would be good for him." The plaintiff was a witness and was present at the trial. There was a conflict in the testimony as to whether his illness was consumption or not. The judge said to the jury: "If you find that the plaintiff during the time of his disability was suffering with the disease known as 'consumption,' I charge you that he cannot recover under any circumstances in this case, and your verdict must be, 'No cause of action.'" The question was submitted to them. We think the case was properly tried.

Judgment is affirmed.

Long and Grant, JJ., concurred with Moore, J.

Montgomery, Ch. J., dissenting:

The contract of the parties is explicit. The defendant has undertaken to pay weekly indemnity, not during the time that the beneficiary should be ill and until his complete recovery, but in case he should become totally disabled, and by a malady which should at the same time wholly and continuously disable and prevent his prosecuting any and all kinds of business, he was to receive indemnity during the time that he should by reason thereof be continuously confined to his bed or to the house, subject to the personal calls of the registered physician, etc. Plaintiff's own testimony shows that he was taken sick in September, and was confined to his house for six weeks; that about October 20th he went to his physician and said: "I am confined up there in that place of business, where I sleep right in the store there, and I don't think it is very healthy for me." I said: "I have a friend living in Chicago. He wants me to come there." He said: "That is all right, and won't hurt you any to go there." He said: "You go over there. Take care of yourself over there in good shape, and you will come out all right." I was confined there all the time, only I used to take a morning walk. I went over there about the 24th—the 24th of October, I think, or September or August—the 24th or 25th of October. I went down to see Dr. Barth just the day before I started." In my opinion, it was error to permit the jury to find a liability during this period. The policy contains the contract which the parties saw fit to make, and we should not enlarge it by construction. It is obvious that during this period plaintiff was not continuously confined to the house, subject to the personal calls of a physician. It is a radically different contract from those in the cases cited.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial ordered.

(.....Ala.....)

1. An agent's occupancy of a house on his principal's property as a part merely of the contract for service does not establish the relation of tenant and landlord between him and the principal, so as to preclude him from acquiring an adverse title to the property.
2. One entitled to specific performance of a contract to convey land is precluded from maintaining a suit therefor by the fact that after obtaining the contract he took a lease of the property, since such suit involves a denial of the landlord's title.
3. Relief must be denied to both complainants in a suit to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey land, if one cannot maintain his suit because he is in possession of the property as tenant.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Macon County in favor of complainants in a suit to compel specific performance of a contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. B. Paine, H. T. Davis, and W. W. Pearson for appellants.

Messrs. Watts, Troy, & Caffey, for appellees:

The doctrine of estoppel of a tenant in possession to deny the title of his landlord has no application to suits in which the tenant seeks specifically to enforce a contract with the landlord to convey, because it does not involve a denial of title at the time the relation of landlord and tenant was created.

The only thing the tenant cannot deny is that the landlord had title at the beginning of the term. If he can dispute that the title continued after the beginning of the term, he may certainly ask a court of equity to discontinue it.

Tyson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill in this case was filed by complainants, as owners of a certain contract by assignment, against the respondents, as successors in interest and title to the lands agreed to be conveyed, and seeks a specific performance of that contract. The contract was executed by R. T. Davis and Mary C. Davis, his wife, in which they agreed to convey by warranty deed a half interest in 40 acres of land, to be selected by the complainants' assignors, in a certain section owned by R. T. Davis. The consideration of this contract was that the complainants' assignors were to build the Savannah, Americus, & Montgomery Railroad within one-half mile of the residence of the Davises, and to erect a depot within the same distance from their residence, at any point along the line of the road most suitable to themselves. The deed was to be executed as soon as the road was built, the depot established, and a train made a trip to Montgomery. The land agreed to be conveyed upon compliance with the conditions of the contract, and selected, was a part of a tract of land owned by him, comprising about 800 acres. R. T. Davis died shortly after entering into the contract, and after the selection of the land was made by complainants' assignors under it. He left surviving him his wife and two sons. His wife, who is one of the respondents, was at the date of the filing of the bill the owner of a two-thirds undivided interest in the entire tract; and Hubert T. Davis, a son, the other respondent, was the owner of the remainder. The evidence shows without dispute that the road was built, the depot established, a train ran through to Montgomery, and the land selected during the year 1891. In other words, complainants' assignors had performed their obligation under the contract, and were entitled to a deed from the respondents during the year 1891. On April 20, 1896, the complainants by purchase became the owners of this contract, and by virtue of that ownership were entitled to a deed from the respondents.

One of the defenses invoked by the answer of the respondents is that complainant Williams for a period of about two years before the filing of this bill, at the date of its filing, and for one year subsequent thereto, tenanted and dwelt on a part of the lands in controversy. It appears from the evidence that Williams in 1892 built a house for respondents upon the land in controversy, which he occupied while "looking after the business" for them, until December, 1896, from which last-named date he paid rent for this house at the rate of $5 per month for one year, and $4 per month for eight months, ceasing to pay rent in August, 1898. The bill was filed on the 11th of February, 1897. It will be noted that when this bill was filed, and after the complainant Williams had become the owner of the contract, and after he became entitled to a deed to the lands from the respondents, he rented a part of the lands, and became the tenant of one of the respondents. His occupancy of the house which is situated upon the lands in controversy, for looking after the business of the respondents, prior to December 2, 1896, when he commenced to pay rent therefor, did not create the relation of landlord and tenant. That relation was simply that of employer and employee or master and servant, and the occupancy of the house was a part merely of the contract for service, and operated as a portion of the consideration of that agreement. People ex rel. Hubbard v. Annis, 45 Barb. 304; Wilber v. Sisson, 53 Barb. 258; Haywood v. Miller, 3 Hill, 90; Kerrains v. People, 60 N. Y. 221, 19 Am. Rep. 158; Doyle v. Gibbs, 6 Lans. 180; Bowman v. Bradley, 151 Pa. 351, 17 L. R. A. 213, 24 Atl. 1062; McQuade v. Emmons, 38 N. J. L. 397; School Dist. No. 11 v. Batsche, 106 Mich. 330, 29 L. R. A. 576, 64 N. W. 196; East Norway Lake N. E. Lutheran Church v. Froislie, 37 Minn. 447, 35 N. W. 260; White v. Bayley, 10 C. B. N. S. 227.

The relation of landlord and tenant arose in December, 1896, which, as we have shown, was after Williams became entitled to a deed from the respondents to the land. We have the question presented as to whether Williams, being the tenant of one of the respondents at the time of the filing of the bill, and being the owner of the contract at the time he entered into that relation, can maintain the bill to require a specific performance of that contract. There is not an intimation that there was any understanding or agreement that his rental contract was subject to his right to have the contract of purchase of which he was part owner enforced, or that his landlord ever at any time in any way recognized his rights under that contract, or obligation under it to make a deed to him. It is a principle universally recognized and enforced by courts of law that a tenant is estopped to dispute the title of his landlord, unless his landlord's title has expired or been extinguished, either by operation of law or his own act, after the creation of the tenancy. It is only when there is a change in the condition of the landlord's title for the worse after the tenant enters into his contract, in the absence of fraud or mistake of fact, that he is permitted to show the change in the condition of the title. Under no circumstances, when there is no fraud or mistake of fact, will it be permitted to deny the title of the landlord at the beginning of his term. This doctrine has been enforced by this court from its earliest history. Randolph v. Carlton, 8 Ala. 606; Pope v. Harkins, 16 Ala. 321; Rogers v. Boynton, 57 Ala. 501; Farris v. Houston, 74 Ala. 162; Robinson v. Holt, 90 Ala. 116, 7 So. 441; Barlow v. Dahm, 97 Ala. 415, 12 So. 293; Pugh v. Davis, 103 Ala. 316, 18 So. 8. In 2 McAdam, Land. & T. pp. 1341 et seq., this doctrine is stated in this language: "For reasons of public policy a tenant is never allowed to dispute his landlord's title after having accepted possession under him. This rule is elementary. The estoppel extends equally to both landlord and tenant, so that, while the tenant is estopped from denying the landlord's title, the landlord cannot allege that he had no title at the time of the demise. Where a tenant enters into possession under a lease, he is estopped from denying the title of his landlord. The tenant must surrender the possession to the landlord before he can assail or question the title under which he entered.

... 'He can no more show that the premises belonged to the state than he can that they belonged to himself. He must first restore the possession which he obtained from his landlord, and then, as plaintiff, he may avail himself of any title which he has been or may be able to acquire.' 'The foundation of the estoppel is the fact of the one obtaining possession and enjoying possession by the permission of the other. And so long as one has this enjoyment he is prevented by this rule of law from turning round and saying his landlord has no right or title to keep him in possession.' ... 'No dispute as to the title will be tolerated until the parties are placed in their original position.' " Nor can he "be heard to deny the title of his landlord, nor can he rid himself of such relation, without a complete surrender of the possession of the land. To allow him to agree and profess to hold possession under one as landlord, and at the same time to hold covertly for himself, or for another's advantage, would be to encourage and uphold a gross fraud, which the law will never do." Continuing, the author says: "He must first surrender up the premises to his landlord before assuming an attitude of hostility to the title or claim of title of the latter."

It may be urged that this proceeding is in equity, and that the suit involves no denial by Williams of his landlord's title. We apprehend that it is of no consequence in what court this question of estoppel may arise. If it exists, there is no reason why it should not be enforced by courts of equity as well as by courts of law. Indeed, such a distinction has never been asserted or recognized. In the case of Barlow v. Dahm, 97 Ala. 414, 12 So. 283, which was a bill for sale of land for partition by a tenant against his landlord, it was held that the tenant could not maintain the bill without first surrendering the possession. And in Davis v. Pou, 108 Ala. 443, 19 So. 362, which was a bill by a tenant to enjoin a writ of possession and execution at law issued upon a judgment in unlawful detainer in favor of his landlord, it was held that there was no equity in the bill, for the reason that the tenant could not be permitted to show that his landlord's title had terminated before the beginning of the tenancy. In Homan v. Moore, 4 Price, 5, it was held: "A lessee proceeded against by ejectment, and who has received notice from a claimant disputing his landlord's title not to pay him any more rent, and has been threatened with a distress by his landlord if he does not, cannot sustain an injunction in equity to restrain either the ejectment or the distress, for he is not permitted by such means to bring his landlord's title into dispute." In Smith v. Targett, 2 Anstr. 529, it was held that a tenant, though threatened with suits at law on a title adverse to his landlord's, cannot make them interplead. Said the court: "It would be extremely mischievous if he were allowed, in his own right, or that of others, to call in question the title of the person under whom he holds." To the same effect is Johnson v. Atkinson, 3 Anstr. 798. In these cases the tenant entered upon his lease after the termination of his landlord's title. The exception, however, was recognized by the chancery courts of England, as exists in courts of law, that, where the landlord has by his own act given title to another subsequent to the lease, he may thereby entangle the tenant in embarrassment, which a bill of interpleader may be the most proper mode of quieting. Cowtan v. Williams, 9 Ves. Jr. 107; Clarke v. Byne, 13 Ves. Jr. 386.

This brings us to a consideration of the question as to whether the assertion by the complainant Williams of his right to have his contract of purchase specifically enforced involves a denial of his landlord's title. At the threshold of the discussion of this question it is necessary to ascertain the relation of the complainants to the respondents with respect to the interest in the lands and in the contract of sale involved in this controversy. That it is a contract of sale, and establishes the relation of vendor and vendee between the parties, does not admit of dispute. Assuming this as true, "in law a contract . . . is wholly, in every particular, executory, and produces no effect upon the respective estates and titles of the parties. The vendor remains to all intents the owner of the land. He can convey it free from any legal claim or encumbrance. He can devise it. On his death intestate it descends to his heirs. The contract in no manner interferes with his legal right to and estate in the land, and he is simply subjected to the legal duty of performing the contract, or paying such damages as a jury should award. On the other hand, the vendee acquires no interest whatever in the land. His right is a mere thing in action, and his duty is a debt—an obligation—to pay the price; and on his death both this right and this duty pass to his personal representatives, and not to his heirs. In short, he obtains at law no real property or interest in real property. The relations between the two parties are wholly personal. No change is made until by the execution and delivery of a deed of conveyance the estate in the land passes to the vendee. Equity views all these relations from a very different standpoint. In some respects, for some purposes, the contract is executory in equity as well as at law; but, so far as the interest or estate in the land of the two parties is concerned, it is regarded as executed, and as operating to transfer the estate from the vendor and to vest it in the vendee. This theory must of necessity make a great difference in the respective rights, duties, and relations of the vendor and vendee. One of the grand principles of equity—one of the great foundation stones upon which the whole superstructure of particular doctrines and rules is erected—is the proposition: Equity regards and treats as done what in good conscience ought to be done. This principle, so brief in its statement, is most broad in its application and fruitful in its results. From it, as the root, spring a large part of the rules which make up the body of equitable jurisprudence. Apply the principle to the present case. By the terms of the contract, the land ought to be conveyed to the vendee, and the purchase money ought to be transferred to the vendor. Equity therefore regards these as done,—the vendee as having acquired the property in the land, and the vendor as having acquired the property in the price. The vendee is looked upon and treated as owner of the land. An equitable estate has vested in him commensurate with that provided for by the contract, whether in fee, for life, or for years. Although the vendor remains owner of the legal estate, he holds it as a trustee for the vendee, to whom all the beneficial interest has passed." Pom. Contr. § 314. See also Ashurst v. Peck, 101 Ala. 499, 14 So. 541. The foregoing extract clearly defines and fixes the status of Williams and one of the respondents after he became part owner of the contract, which status necessarily existed at the time of the filing of the bill, and continued up to the present time. It is only upon the theory of the existence of this status that he can have relief upon the bill, and, of necessity, the prosecution of the suit for the specific performance of the contract is an assertion by him that at the time of the filing of the bill he was the owner of the land. This assertion he cannot be permitted to make until he surrenders up the premises to his landlord, since it puts him in a position of repudiating or of ridding himself of the relation of tenant, which he bore to one of the respondents when the bill was filed, or of assuming an attitude of hostility to the title or claim of title of his landlord. A "landlord can only be required to litigate title with his tenant upon the vantage ground of possession." Barlow v. Dahm, 97 Ala. 414, 12 So. 293. Surely it will not be controverted that the bill involves a litigation of title between Williams, the tenant, and Mrs. Davis, his landlord. For, as we have said, Williams asserts by the bill his ownership of the land, which is denied by the respondent Mrs. Davis.

It is argued, on the authority of Bogan v. Daughdrill, 51 Ala. 312, that this court can correct the decree of the lower court, and grant relief to complainants, if entitled to it, for the portion of the land not in the possession of Williams, at the date of the filing of the bill, as tenant. Assuming that complainants are entitled to that relief, without deciding it, the record furnishes no sufficient data upon which to predicate such a decree. It fails to disclose with any degree of accuracy the area of the parcel in the possession of Williams. To undertake to eliminate it out of the land, and to render a decree requiring the respondents to execute a deed for the balance, would, at best, be but a conjecture as to the area or boundaries of the land decreed to be conveyed. The ownership of the contract being joint, and the enforcement of it being sought jointly, the familiar doctrine that both complainants must be entitled to relief, or neither can have it, applies. Williams not being entitled to relief, the bill must be dismissed. Wilkins v. Judge, 14 Ala. 135; Moore v. Moore, 17 Ala. 631; Tucker v. Holley, 20 Ala. 426; Plunkett v. Kelly, 22 Ala. 655; Plant v. Voegelin, 30 Ala. 160; Vaughn v. Lovejoy, 34 Ala. 437; James v. James, 55 Ala. 525; Larkin v. Mason, 71 Ala. 231; 3 Brickell, Dig. 373, § 87. This dismissal will not preclude the rights of complainants to file another bill, if they are so advised.

Reversed and rendered.

pulled the bell rope so hard that he broke it, and jerked the conductor several feet along the car floor, notwithstanding the passenger, upon the conductor's following him to the platform, attempted an assault on him.

2. Punitive damages may be awarded in an action against a street car company for an assault by its conductor upon a passenger.
3. Two thousand five hundred dollars is not an excessive award against a street car company for the act of its conductor in striking a passenger several times in the face merely because, in order to stop the car, he pulled the bell rope so hard as to break it.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an assault committed upon him by one of defendant's conductors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walker, Porter, & Walker and Hugh Morrow for appellant.

Messrs. Lane & White, for appellee:

The case fully warranted the jury in awarding punitive damages.

Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 39; Haver v. Central R. Co. 12 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. N. S. 261, and notes, 62 N. J. L. 282, 43 L. R. A. 84, 41 Atl. 916.

Under the facts of this case the acts of the servant were the acts of the corporation.

A conductor of a train doubtless has his patience and forbearance severely tested at times, but he should not settle his own personal difficulties with passengers, while they are such, any more than he should permit others to do so when he can avoid it.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Barger, 80 Md. 23, 26 L. R. A. 220, 30 Atl. 560.

McClellan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There appears to be some divergence of opinion as to a common carrier's liability for an assault, and the like, committed by its agent upon a passenger when the agent is acting beyond the scope of his employment in the usual acceptance of that phrase. Of course, the law is well settled that for torts committed by such agents or employees upon persons who are not passengers the employer is not liable, unless the act was in a sense in the line of duty imposed by the employment; as, where a conductor of a train, being under a duty to the railway company, and having authority to eject persons not entitled to carriage, commits, out of his own malice and personal ill will towards such a person, an unnecessary assault upon him in ejecting him from the train, the wrongful act, though against the express rules and regulations of the carrier, is yet within the scope of the conductor's employment, and the company would be liable in damages for it. But the reverse would be true—the company would not be liable—if such conductor should assault a person standing by the side of the train, for instance, and having no relations with the carrier, nor in any way encroaching upon the rights of the carrier; for in this latter case the wrongful act of the conductor would have no connection with his duties to the company, and would be entirely beyond the scope of his employment. Such is the law as between trespassers and strangers generally, on the one hand, and the carrier on the other. But as between the carrier and its passengers an entirely different rule prevails. As to them the contract of carriage imposes upon the carrier the duty, not only to carry safely and expeditiously between the termini of the route embraced in the contract, but also the duty to conserve by every reasonable means their convenience, comfort, and peace throughout the journey. And this same duty is, of course, upon the carrier's agents. They are under the duty of protecting each passenger from avoidable discomfort, and from insult, from indignities, and from personal violence. And it is not material whence the disturbance of the passenger's peace and comfort and personal security or safety comes or is threatened. It may be from another passenger, or from a trespasser or other stranger, or from another servant of the carrier, or, a fortiori, from the particular servant upon whom the duty of protection peculiarly rests. In all such cases the carrier is liable in damages to the injured passenger. And it is of no consequence, when the wrong is committed by the carrier's own servant,—even that servant particularly charged with the duty of conserving the passenger's well-being en route,—that the act bears no connection or relation with or to the duties of such servant to the carrier, and is not committed as an incident to the discharge of any duty; but is utterly violative of all duty, and apart and away from the scope of employment as that term is understood in the class of cases first above referred to. The carrier is liable in such cases because the act is violative of the duty it owes through the servant to the passenger, and not upon the idea that the act is incident to a duty within the scope of the servant's employment; and it is manifestly immaterial that the act may have been one of private retribution on the part of the servant, actuated by personal malice towards the passenger, and having no attribute of service to the carrier in it. It is wholly inapt and erroneous to apply the doctrine of scope of employment, as ordinarily understood, to such an act. Its only relation to the scope of the servant's employment rests upon the disregard and violation of a duty imposed by the employment. This is, beyond question, we think, the true doctrine on principle; and while, as indicated above, there are adjudications against it, the great weight of authority supports it. The doctrine is well stated in Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 57 Me. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 39, as follows: "The defendants contend that they are not liable, because, as they say, the brakeman's assault upon the plaintiff was wilful and malicious, and was not directly nor impliedly authorized by them. They say the substance of the whole case is this: that 'the master is not responsible as a trespasser, unless, by direct or implied authority to the servant, he consents to the unlawful act.' The fallacy of this argument when applied to the common carrier of passengers consists in not discriminating between the obligation which he is under to his passenger and the duty which he owes a stranger. It may be true that, if the carrier's servant wilfully and maliciously assaults a stranger, the master will not be liable; but the law is otherwise when he assaults one of his master's passengers. The carrier's obligation is to carry his passenger safely and properly, and to treat him respectfully; and if he intrusts the performance of this duty to his servants the law holds him responsible for the manner in which they execute the trust. The law seems to be now well settled that the carrier is obliged to protect his passenger from violence and insult, from whatever source arising. He is not regarded as an insurer of his passenger's safety against every possible source of danger, but he is bound to use all such reasonable precautions as human judgment and foresight are capable of to make his passenger's journey safe and comfortable. He must not only protect his passenger against the violence and insults of strangers and copassengers, but, a fortiori, against the violence and insults of his own servants. If this duty to the passenger is not performed, if this protection is not furnished, but, on the contrary, the passenger is assaulted and insulted, through the negligence or the wilful misconduct of the carrier's servant, the carrier is necessarily responsible. And it seems to us it would be cause of profound regret if the law were otherwise." The same principles are declared in Dwinelle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 117, 8 L. R. A. 224, 24 N. E. 319, following Stewart v. Brooklyn & C. T. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 588, 43 Am. Rep. 185, in this language: "The idea that the servant of a carrier of persons may, in the intervals between rendering personal services to the passenger for his accommodation, assault the person of the passenger, destroy his consciousness, and disable him from further pursuit of his journey, is not consistent with the duty that the carrier owes to the passenger, and is little less than monstrous. While this general duty rested upon the defendant to protect the person of the passenger during the entire performance of the contract, it signifies but little or nothing whether the servant had or had not completed the temporary or particular service he was performing, or had completed the performance of it, when the blow was struck. That blow was given by a servant of the defendant while the defendant was performing its contract to carry safely and to protect the person of the plaintiff, and was a violation of such contract." And in Stewart's Case, just referred to, it was held that where a passenger on one of defendant's street cars was unjustifiably attacked and beaten by the driver, who was also acting as the conductor, because said passenger interfered to prevent him from beating a newsboy who had gotten on the car, it was held that the defendant was liable, the court declaring that the rule relieving a master from liability for a malicious injury inflicted by a servant when not acting within the scope of his employment did not apply between a common carrier of passengers and a passenger; Judge Tracy thus declaring the doctrine: "By the defendant's contract with the plaintiff, it had undertaken to carry him safely, and to treat him respectfully; and, while a common carrier does not undertake to insure against injury from every possible danger, he does undertake to protect the passengers against any injury from the negligence or wilful misconduct of its servants while engaged in performing a duty which the carrier owes to the passenger. . . . A common carrier is bound, so far as practicable, to protect his passengers, while being conveyed, from violence committed by strangers and copassengers, and he undertakes absolutely to protect them against the misconduct of its own servants engaged in executing the contract;" or, as otherwise therein expressed, from "an assault committed upon a passenger by a servant intrusted with the execution of a contract of a common carrier." And so, in North Carolina, it has been decided that it is the duty of a common carrier, not only to carry its passengers safely, but to protect them from ill treatment from its servants, other passengers, and intruders; and it is liable for an injury or ill treatment committed by its servants, whether in the line of their employment or not. White v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 115 N. C. 631, 20 S. E. 191. So, in Indiana, it has been declared that "one of the prime duties resting upon a railroad company is to protect its passengers from assaults and injuries by its servants; nor does the question of its liability for a breach of this duty depend upon whether or not the servant in the performance of the act is within the scope of his employment." Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Cooper, 6 Ind. App. 202, 33 N. E. 219. In Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Fleaman, 9 Ill. App. 250, the doctrine is thus declared: "It is undoubtedly true that, where the employee goes outside of the line of his employment, and for purposes of his own inflicts an injury upon the person of one who has no claim upon the employer arising out of any special relation existing between them, being a stranger to the master, the principle contended for is properly applied, and has ever been enforced as a rule of the common law; but it does not appear to us that it should be extended so as to embrace a case where the employee of a common carrier, engaged in operating the train, commits a tort upon a passenger upon such train. In every contract for carriage the carrier undertakes, not only that the utmost vigilance, care, and skill shall be exercised to safely transport the passenger to his destination, but that during the passenger's transit he shall be treated humanely, and protected from all dangers, from whatever source arising, so far as the efforts of the carrier or his servants can be made available for the protection of such passenger." The same doctrine obtains in Texas, where it is thus stated: And a carrier of passengers "cannot invoke the rule that the master is not liable for an injury resulting from the wilful and malicious acts of his agent not done in the course of his employment. That rule does not apply when the injury is inflicted upon a passenger by the carrier's servant." Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Washington (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 719. And in Craker v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 667, 17 Am. Rep. 504, it was held that a female passenger who had been kissed by the conductor could recover from the company; Ryan, Ch. J., saying: "But we need not pursue the subject, for, however that may be in general, there can be doubt of it in those employments in which the agent performs a duty of the principal to third persons, as between such third persons and the principal, because the principal is responsible for the duty, and, if he delegate it to an agent, and the agent fail to perform it, it is immaterial whether the failure be accidental or wilful, in the negligence or in the malice of the agent; the contract of the principal is equally broken in the negligent disregard or in the malicious violation of the duty by the agent. It would be cheap and superficial morality to allow one owing a duty to another to commit the performance of his duty to a third without responsibility for the malicious conduct of the substitute in performance of the duty. If one owe bread to another, and appoint an agent to furnish it, and the agent of malice furnish a stone instead, the principal is responsible for the stone and its consequences. In such cases malice is negligence. Courts are generally inclining to this view, and this court long since affirmed it." Having reference to the rule as to scope of employment, and to the cases which apparently apply it to passengers, the court of errors and appeals of New Jersey in a recent case adopts the following language of Clifford, J., in Pendleton v. Kinsley, 3 Cliff. 416, Fed. Cas. No. 10,922: "Adjudged cases may be referred to which support that proposition without qualification, but they do not give full scope and effect to the obligation which the carrier assumes towards his passenger, nor to the rights and duties which those relations create and imply. Passengers do not contract merely for ship room and transportation from one place to another, but they also contract for good treatment, and against personal rudeness, and every wanton interference with their persons, either by the carrier or his agent employed in the management of the ship or other conveyance; and for the fulfilment of those obligations the carrier is responsible as principal; and the injured party, in case the obligation of good treatment is broken, whether by the principal or his employees, may proceed against the carrier as the party bound to make compensation for the breach of the obligation." Haver v. Central R. Co. 62 N. J. L. 282, 43 L. R. A. 84, 12 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. N. S. 261, with note, 41 Atl. 916. And a great number of cases cited in Haver's Case and the note thereto are to the same effect. On this subject Messrs. Elliott say: "There is much apparent conflict among the authorities upon this subject, but we think some of it is due to the use of the term 'scope of employment' or 'line of duty' in a different sense in different cases, or to a failure to place the decision upon the correct ground. It is not merely a question of negligence in such cases, nor is it strictly a question depending upon the scope of the servant's particular employment. It is a question of the absolute duty of a railroad company to its passengers as long as that relation subsists, and a breach of that duty on its part, whether caused by the wilful act of an employee or not. . . . Either the company or the passengers must take the risk of infirmities of temper, maliciousness, and misconduct of the employees whom the company has placed upon the train, and to whom it has committed the discharge of its duty to protect and look after the safety of its passengers. A passenger has no control over them, and the company alone has the power to select and remove them. It is therefore but just to make the company, rather than the passengers, take this risk, and to hold it responsible." 4 Elliott, Railroads, § 1638.

Of course, a conductor has the right of self-defense against the assault of a passenger; but the right is the same in this connection as in criminal law. He must be imperiled, and he must be without fault. To be sure, he need not retreat from his car. And he may assault a passenger when necessary to protect other passengers from assault, using no more than necessary force, and this may become a duty,—indeed, it is a duty whenever it is a right. But he cannot assault a passenger in retaliation for an assault committed upon himself or upon another passenger, and, a fortiori, he cannot assault a passenger for abusive words, or in revenge or punishment, under any circumstances. And if he does assault a passenger otherwise than under a necessity to defend himself or a passenger from battery, or in rightfully ejecting a passenger, who, by his conduct towards other passengers, has forfeited his right of carriage, the carrier is liable. The fault of the passenger, short of producing a necessity to strike in self-defense, will neither justify the conductor in striking, nor relieve the carrier from liability for his act. Possibly, such fault could be considered in mitigation of damages. As was said by Caldwell, J.: 54 L. R. A.

"The office of a conductor of a passenger train is an exceedingly important and responsible one. There are few positions which demand of their incumbents more good judgment and self-possession. Not only the peace and comfort, but the lives as well, of passengers, are in their keeping. They must not, by any act of their own, disturb the one or endanger the other. They have to deal with all classes of people. They daily come in contact with the unscrupulous and dishonest, who are seeking to defraud the railroad company of what is justly its due, and are often grossly insulted by the ignorant and vulgar for a lawful and proper discharge of their duties. It is obvious that, if a conductor were to attempt to redress every personal insult, or enter a boisterous quarrel with every vulgar and rude person who might invite it, there would be no peace or safety for his passengers. He must decline all such contests. He can take action only in those cases where the rights of the railroad company, or the peace or safety of the passengers under his charge, or his own safety demand it; and then he can only act in the mode and manner heretofore indicated, accomplishing what he has a right to do in the given case with as little force, violence, and confusion as is practicable and reasonable under the circumstances. . . . Words [and acts short of producing a necessity for defensive effort stand upon the same plane], however irritating or opprobrious, will not justify an assault by one under no special obligation to keep the peace; much less will they justify an assault by a conductor, who is, by virtue of his position, not only bound to keep the peace himself, but whose duty it is to maintain peace and order in the cars, and protect the passengers . . . from assaults and violence." Gallena v. Hot Springs R. Co. 4 McCrary, 371, 13 Fed. 122, 123. To like effect is the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Barger, where the conductor struck a passenger for grossly abusing and insulting him. The company was held liable for punitive damages; and in the course of the opinion, referring to the charges, which are called "prayers" in the Maryland court, it was said: "The first is, in substance, that, if the jury believed the plaintiff used foul and abusive language to the conductor, which caused or provoked the assault complained of, and that in making said assault the conductor was not acting for the defendant, and within the scope of his duties as conductor, but was carrying out a personal purpose and feeling, the defendant was not liable for such act of the conductor. . . . To such a doctrine we cannot subscribe, under the circumstances of this case. There may be, and doubtless are, cases in which the conduct of a passenger towards the employee of a railroad company was such that the company would not be liable for the act of the employee. A conductor, for example, would be justified, in the defense of his own person or the property of the company in his charge, in using such force as would be necessary for their protection against a passenger or anyone else, without rendering the company liable. . . . The plaintiff was at the time of the assault a passenger on the train which was in charge of this conductor, who was the agent of the company to see, as far as he reasonably could, that the plaintiff and other passengers were properly treated and carried to their respective points of destination. If the plaintiff persisted in misbehaving on the train, either by the use of foul and abusive language toward the conductor, or in any other way calculated to frighten or materially interfere with the comfort and safety of the other passengers, after being admonished by the conductor, the latter would have been justified in ejecting him from the train. The remedy in such case would be to eject the unruly passenger—not to assault him, and then let his employer escape all liability because he, the conductor, was carrying out 'a personal purpose and feeling.' . . . A conductor of a train doubtless has his patience and forbearance severely tested at times, but he must not settle his own personal difficulties with passengers, . . . any more than he should permit others to do so when he could avoid it." 80 Md. 23, 26 L. R. A. 222, 30 Atl. 500. The same principles are declared by the supreme court of Maine in the following opinion: "Passenger carriers are responsible for the misconduct of their servants. Railroad companies, as well as other carriers of passengers, are responsible for assaults and batteries committed by their employees upon passengers. . . . This responsibility, of course, rests upon the assumption that the battery cannot be justified. If it can be, no responsibility attaches to anyone. If it cannot be, both the servant and the carrier are liable. If the servant is first assaulted, he may defend himself. If he is resisted in the performance of any duty, he may use force sufficient to overcome the resistance. But, the assault being over, or the resistance ended, he cannot pursue and punish the wrongdoer. The rule applicable to such cases is this: That, when a prima facie case of assault and battery is sought to be justified, it is incumbent upon the one who justifies to show that no more force was used than the exigencies of the case called for. The force used must be suitable in kind and reasonable in degree, otherwise the justification fails. . . . It is the duty of the conductor and other employees upon a train of cars to treat the passengers with civility, and to abstain from all unnecessary violence towards them. It is also the duty of passengers to observe the rules and regulations of the company, and to conduct themselves generally so as not to invite uncivil treatment, nor provoke violence. But it is not true that disobedience to the rules of the company will operate as a license to the employees to maltreat a passenger. If a passenger persists in violating the reasonable rules of the company, after notice of the rules, and a request to him not to act contrary to them, the carrier will have a right to rescind the contract for his conveyance, and refuse to carry him further. But he will have no right to maltreat him while continuing to perform the contract for his conveyance. Nor is it true that an uncivil word by a passenger at the beginning of his journey will justify the carrier's servants in treating him with insolence to the end of it. Nor is it true that an assault, or resistance to the performance of a duty, will justify the servant in pursuing and punishing the passenger, after the assault or the resistance is over. If he does, he makes the carrier as well as himself liable for the injury. If, therefore, it be true, as the defendants contend, that the plaintiff was the aggressor, that he first assaulted the brakeman, and resisted him in the performance of a legitimate duty, it was still a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the brakeman did not use greater violence than the exigencies of the case demanded; whether he did not pursue the plaintiff, and inflict the blows upon his head with the iron poker, after the latter had ceased his assault, had ceased his resistance, and was returning to his seat with his back to the brakeman. Under the instructions of the court the jury must have so found, or they could not have returned a verdict for the plaintiff; and, in our judgment, the evidence fully justified the finding." Hanson v. European & N. A. R. Co. 62 Me. 84, 88, 16 Am. Rep. 404.

The present action is prosecuted by Baird, a minor, by next friend, against the Birmingham Railway & Electric Company, and sounds in damages for an assault and battery alleged to have been committed by one Sorsby, conductor of defendant's train, upon which plaintiff was a passenger. That the assault and battery was committed is proved beyond question, and not denied. It is not only not shown that the conductor was justified in the act, but, to the contrary, it clearly appears that he assaulted and beat the plaintiff without legal necessity or excuse; for, while one or two witnesses testify that Baird attempted to strike Sorsby, it is shown that they were not in a position to see what occurred as accurately as several other witnesses, including Sorsby himself, who depose that Baird made no such attempt; Sorsby testifying: "If Mr. Baird struck at me at all, I didn't know it. I didn't see him attempting to strike me when I struck him in the face, unless it was to throw up his arm. I don't think he made any effort to strike me at all. . . . Mr. Baird pulled me to the door of the car, and I followed him outside, and struck him. The momentum of the bell cord did not jerk my arm out that way. I hit him in the face as hard as I could. There was a decidedly angry expression on Mr. Baird's face, and he had grabbed the bell cord, and broke the cord loose, and pulled me along with it, which was an angry act. That is all that I know of. He didn't say anything out of the way to me. I hit Mr. Baird in the face of my own free will." And for all the purposes of this case it is to be taken that Baird made no hostile demonstration towards Sorsby at or about the time this vicious assault was made on Baird by Sorsby, for, if any jury could be found to say that Baird struck at Sorsby on the testimony of the one or two witnesses above referred to, who were without opportunity to see what transpired, and who doubtless mistook the fending motion of Baird's arm for an effort to strike, against the overwhelming testimony of all the witnesses who were in a position to see accurately, and against the above-quoted testimony of Sorsby himself, it would yet remain true that Sorsby's act was not in defense against such attempted blow, and was not necessary, for he saw no such attempt, and says none was made, but that he struck Baird as a vent to his own wrath and malice, and in punishment for the conduct of the latter in attempting to pull the bell cord, breaking it while Sorsby had hold of it, and jerking him some feet along the aisle of the car. But if it be conceded that Baird attempted to strike Sorsby, and that Sorsby was aware of it, and even that he assaulted and beat Baird in consequence of such attempt by the latter, the act of Sorsby would be, nevertheless, a wrongful act for which the defendant is responsible, since it is altogether clear on the proof that Sorsby was at fault in bringing on the trouble, in that he unnecessarily followed Baird out on the platform of the car in an angry and threatening manner. So that, applying the principles of law to the facts in any possible aspect of them, the conclusion must be that Sorsby, defendant's conductor, committed an unjustifiable assault and battery on Baird, the defendant's passenger. Whether Baird had or had not the right to pull the bell cord in order to stop the car after being carried past his station, Sorsby had no right to strike him for doing so. Whether, when the cord broke, both having hold of it, he pulled or jerked Sorsby several feet along the aisle, and conceding this, if it occurred, to have been a technical assault, Sorsby had no right to strike him in "retaliation" for or in "response to" such assault. Even if Baird attempted to strike Sorsby with or without Sorsby's knowledge, Sorsby yet had no right to defend himself against such attack, being at fault in provoking it.

The case was tried below on views of the law and theories of the rights of the parties which were far too favorable to the defendant. The doctrine of scope of employment was given in charge to the jury, when, as we have seen, that doctrine does not obtain in cases of this character. Then, too, it was given in charge to the jury that plaintiff's right of recovery depended upon the further inquiry whether he or Sorsby was at fault in bringing on the difficulty, "that the plaintiff's right to recover in this case depends upon who was the aggressor, and that, if the plaintiff was the aggressor, he cannot recover," when, as we have declared, no aggression on the part of plaintiff short of producing a necessity for Sorsby to strike in defense of his person against physical harm would be a defense to the carrier. Very many charges were refused to the defendant. Those numbered respectively 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and 27 were each properly refused, as being affirmative, or having a tendency opposed to the principles above set forth. Charges 7 and 8 are mere arguments. Charges 9, 11, 12, 13, and 14 are affirmative instructions for the defendant; and as the complaint, and each count of it, was supported by the evidence, they were, of course, properly refused. The clauses of the court's general charge to which exceptions were reserved really meant that the jury had a right on the evidence to impose punitive damages, and unquestionably they had such right. If it was apprehended that the form of expression might mislead the jury, an explanatory charge should have been requested. Charge 9 refused to defendant had a tendency to mislead the jury to the conclusion that they were not authorized to impose punitive damages. The several exceptions reserved by defendant to rulings on the competency of testimony and to rulings relating to the argument of plaintiff's counsel have been considered by the court in banc, and found to be without merit. We shall not further extend this opinion by a discussion of them.

All the questions arising on the motion for a new trial except one are covered by what we have said. The one not so covered has reference to the amount of the verdict, $2,500, which is claimed to be excessive. We by no means think the recovery was for too great a sum.

Affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

v.

Florence S. ASPINWALL.

(78 Conn. 493.)

A man's heirs at law cannot maintain a suit to set aside a fraudulent divorce from a third person of a woman whom he afterwards attempted to marry, for the purpose of defeating her claims upon his estate, where they were not parties to the divorce proceedings and had no interest therein.

I. Decrees of divorce.

Third parties cannot have a judgment of divorce set aside.

In TYLER v. ASPINWALL it was held that the heirs of a second husband cannot maintain an action to annul, set aside, and vacate a decree of divorce obtained by his widow from her former husband by means of fraud. It was claimed that she had not resided in the state a sufficient time, and that her former husband never had resided in the state. The court held that a decree of this kind could not be attacked in this manner by strangers to the record. This is in accord with the decisions.

Quare.—Could not the judgment be attacked on the ground of fraud and want of jurisdiction whenever it was attempted to be used?—as in Bell v. Bell, 181 U. S. 175, 45 L. ed. 804, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 551; Streitwolf v. Streitwolf, 181 U. S. 179, 45 L. ed. 807, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 553.

The children of a former wife of a second husband of a divorced woman have no standing to attack a sumo pro tunc order of appearance, and judgment of divorce. Brink v. Brink, 8 Kulp, 367.

So, a judgment cannot be attacked by a stranger to the record. Where a bill to set aside a divorce was filed by the infant children of the parties, appearing by another stranger to the record as their next friend, it was held that none but parties can intervene for such a purpose. Baugh v. Baugh, 37 Mich. 59, 28 Am. Rep. 495. In this case the court said that "where the judgment is only voidable, and not void, it cannot be attacked by strangers to the 54 L. R. A.

County refusing to set aside a decree of divorce which was alleged to have been procured by fraud. Affirmed.

Statement by Terrance, J.:

All the parties reside out of this state, and the complaint alleges, in substance, the following facts: The plaintiffs are the heirs at law of Charles D. Tyler, who died intestate in Newfoundland in 1897, leaving an estate valued at about $25,000. The defendant, by virtue of an alleged marriage with the deceased, claims an interest in his estate as his widow. In 1882 the defendant was married to Sumner D. Aspinwall, of Newark, New Jersey, and as his wife she thereafter resided with him, and had her record. And where it is absolutely void it needs no proceedings to set it aside."

So, where the court has jurisdiction of the parties to, and the subject-matter of, an action for divorce brought by a wife, and judgment is rendered therein dissolving the marriage, with permission to her to marry again, and she does so marry, her second husband cannot maintain an action to have such judgment canceled, and his own marriage declared void, on the ground that the judgment was obtained through fraud or collusion. Ruger v. Heckel, 85 N. Y. 483. In this case the court said: "In bringing this action the plaintiff meddled with a matter which did not concern him. Before he contracted matrimony with Theresa, he was told of her former marriage, its dissolution, and the terms thereof. He has had the full benefit of his bargain. No one has questioned his title, and the record which he produces shows a judgment binding upon both parties."

In Richardson v. Stowe, 102 Mo. 33, 14 S. W. 810, where an administrator and heirs claiming property brought a suit alleging that the defendant had falsely claimed to be the wife of their ancestor, and had fraudulently procured a decree of divorce, and asked to have the judgment and all sales made in pursuance thereof set aside, and a decree that the legal title be divested and be administered according to law, it was held that there was no fraud in procuring the decree of divorce. The court does not discuss the rights of the plaintiffs to attack in this manner such a decree, further than holding that the decree of divorce determined every fact and issue in this petition, and that it was not subject to review in this proceeding.

II. Judgments on confession.

There is a conflict in the decisions as to the right of a third party to set aside a judgment on confession that is erroneous, irregular, or that is based on an insufficient statement. In New York a judgment creditor may have such judgments set aside.

So, creditors cannot set aside a judgment entered against their debtor on confession in favor of another creditor on the ground that the firm name was signed to the warrant of attorney by a partner not authorized to do so. Cassem v. Brown, 74 Ill. App. 846. This was on the ground that such judgment was not void, and that the debtor himself could not set aside a judgment on confession without showing some legal or equitable defense to the amount of the judgment.

domicil in that state until May, 1893. In September, 1893, she brought a suit for divorce against him to the superior court, in Fairfield county, on the ground of his habitual intemperance and intolerable cruelty; and in February, 1894, said court granted her a divorce on the latter ground. Unless said marriage was dissolved by this judgment, it has never been dissolved; and said Aspinwall is now in full life. The complaint avers that Aspinwall was never a resident of this state, "nor had the defendant, at the time of the institution of said suit for divorce, . . . been a resident of Connecticut for a period of three years; neither had she, being domiciled in this state before her marriage, returned to this state with the intention of permanently remaining, and the court granting said decree was therefore without jurisdiction." The allegations of the complaint that Aspinwall was habitually intemperate and had been guilty of intolerable cruelty, and the testimony of the defendant in support of these allegations, were utterly false and untrue. A wilful fraud was committed upon the court, and said judgment of divorce was wrongfully and fraudulently obtained, to the damage and injury of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have already been damaged by the claims of the defendant upon the estate of the deceased to the extent of $1,000, and, if said judgment of divorce is allowed to stand, will be permanently injured to the extent of $25,000, and they have no adequate remedy at law. The plaintiffs claimed $1,000 damages, and that the judgment of divorce be "set aside, vacated, and annulled." The defendant appeared in court "for the purpose of pleading to the jurisdiction only," and,

But see Mills v. Dickson, 6 Rich. L. 487, infra, to the contrary.

And a person not a party to the record of a judgment cannot move the court to vacate the judgment for irregularities. Packard v. Smith, 9 Wis. 184. This case was a judgment of confession. The objections were made to the validity of the judgment, as to the time at which it was entered, that it was not properly signed by an officer authorized, that it was not docketed until nine months after it was entered up. The court said: "Smith does not complain of this judgment, nor object to the time and manner at and in which it was entered. He appears to be satisfied with the judgment. Why, then, should a stranger to the record, who is not in any sense a party to the suit, be suffered to come in, on motion, and set this judgment aside?"

A judgment cannot be vacated on the motion of one not a party to the suit, and such an order will be reversed on appeal without regard to irregularities in the judgment of confession, that it was not properly signed by an officer authorized, and was not docketed in the judgment book for nine months, etc. Ibid.

And strangers to a record cannot have a judgment stricken off the records, where it was not obtained by fraud. Covey v. Wheeler, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 467. In this case it was insisted that the judgment was confessed by a "trustee," and that he had no power to confess judgment, and that the title of the defendant was not the name of any person or association. The court said that if the judgment was founded on fraud, these parties, if affected, could impeach the same collaterally.

And where one judgment creditor moved to set aside a judgment confessed by his debtor to another creditor, first, because it did not conform to the requirements of the statute; second, because sufficient facts were not disclosed by the affidavit and confession to enable the court to acquire jurisdiction; third, because the judgment was void upon the face of the facts set forth;—it was held that if the ground upon which it was sought to set it aside was irregularity only none could be heard to impeach it upon such ground but a party thereto. It was held that the confession was in full compliance with the terms of the statute. Uxle v. Vinson, 111 N. C. 188, 18 S. E. 6. In this case the court said: "If it were sought to vacate this judgment upon the ground of fraud it could not be attacked by motion in the cause, but only by an independent action."

A judgment by confession entered in the district court on a warrant to enter it in the common pleas cannot be set aside by a subsequent judgment creditor. Hauer's Appeal, 5 Watts. & S. 478. In this case the court said: "A creditor, as I have said, may abate a fraudulent judgment for a pretended debt; but he cannot abate an erroneous one for a bona fide debt to gain priority by it, for he was entitled to no priority at the date of the judgment, and its erroneousness was no wrong to him."

And in Drexel's Appeal, 6 Pa. 272, where a judgment creditor claimed that a judgment confessed to another creditor was void because confessed by a president of a corporation not having authority, the court said: "In this case, as in that, it might have been reversed on a writ of error, or set aside in the court below, on motion, but only at the instance of the defendant; never at the instance of a stranger."

One judgment creditor has no right to make a motion to set aside a judgment on confession in, favor of another judgment creditor on the ground of irregularity of such judgment. Kellogg v. Keith, 4 Ill. App. 886. In this case the court said: "If the judgments were invalid they might insist that appellants should take nothing on it as against them, but they had no right to intermeddle in the matter to ask the court to set it aside."

So, where it was claimed that the confession of the judgment was irregular, but the evidence showed that the action of the attorney was ratified by the debtor, it was held that, as the judgment was only voidable, a third party could not have it set aside. Martin v. Judd, 80 Ill. 78. In this case the court said: "If a judgment should be collusively confessed in a case where no indebtedness whatever existed it would be fraudulent, and any party whose interest might be affected could properly attack it."

A judgment confessed in vacation for too large a sum, caused by the addition of attorney's fees which the clerk, under the power of attorney to confess, had no right to fix, can be complained of, in the absence of fraud, only by the defendant in such judgment, and not by other judgment creditors who are strangers to the judgment. Havens & G. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 162 Ill. 85, 44 N. E. 884.

And a judgment by confession under a power cannot, at the instance of a stranger seeking a preference, be set aside on the grounds that the declaration counted upon an unsealed note payable generally, whereas the note filed with the clerk was a note made due and payable at a particular place; that it was for a sum in excess of the amount due; and that the notes were not due when the confession of judgment was entered. The warrant of attorney authorized confession of judgment at any time after the date of the note. Adam v. Arnold, 86 Ill. 185.

by way of plea in abatement, she alleged that the court had no jurisdiction, because (1) the parties when the suit was commenced were all nonresidents of this state; (2) no personal service of the process or of the complaint was ever made upon the defendant, nor had any estate of hers been attached in the suit; (3) neither of the plaintiffs were parties to the action of divorce in question, nor did they have any interest therein; (4) no recovery of damages can be had in this proceeding for the acts of the defendant alleged. The plaintiffs moved to strike out of this plea the third and fourth of the above paragraphs, on the ground that the matters alleged in them were (1) immaterial and impertinent; (2) could not be taken advantage of by plea in abatement; and (3) were not matters of which the defendant could take advantage under an appearance for the sole purpose of pleading to the jurisdiction. The court denied the motion. The plaintiffs then demurred to the plea in abatement for the following reasons: (1) To the whole plea, because the allegations thereof are immaterial and irrelevant; (2) to the paragraphs relating to the nonresidence of the parties, want of personal service on defendant, and the fact that none of her property had been attached, because this was, in substance, a proceeding to set aside a void judgment, or one that had been procured by fraud, which could not be brought in any other jurisdiction, and which invoked the exercise of a power in the court not dependent upon the presence of the parties by whom the fraud was perpetrated; (3) to the third and fourth paragraphs of the plea, as hereinbefore stated, because of the reasons alleged

In this case the court said: "The defendant in the judgment should, on motion to the court, have the error [in the calculation] corrected, if there be one. No ground is afforded a stranger to the record to make such an objection."

And grantees seeking to vacate a judgment cannot avail themselves of the fact that the debt on which the judgment was rendered was usurious. Black v. Pattison, 81 Miss. 599. In this case the court said: "The motion to vacate the judgment by confession was properly denied. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, who consented for judgment to be given on the note, although it was not due. It was competent for them to do so, and no legal cause of complaint exists because they did so. The objection for usury in the note is not available."

So, where a judgment was rendered by confession in open court, upon an allegation of indebtedness and appearance of the parties, whatever errors intervened, they cannot, at the instance of one not a party to the judgment, be invoked to set aside or show the judgment a nullity. Cloud v. El Dorado County, 12 Cal. 128, 78 Am. Dec. 526. In this case the court said it was wholly immaterial whether there were errors or not, or how many or how gross; the jurisdiction having attached, the judgment could not be collaterally attacked by a stranger.

But in Bernard v. Douglas, 10 Iowa, 370, it was held that junior judgment creditors were entitled to maintain a motion to set aside a judgment by confession, where the statement of facts did not comply with the statute in showing out of what the indebtedness arose, and it did not appear that the amount for which the judgment was confessed was justly due or to become due; Following Chappel v. Chappel, 12 N. Y. 222, 64 Am. Dec. 496; Dunham v. Waterman, 17 N. Y. 15, 72 Am. Dec. 408.

And under Mo. Rev. Code 1855, p. 1283, art. 12, § 24, providing that where a judgment by confession is rendered, under a power of attorney from the debtor, the affidavit must be made by the plaintiff; other judgment creditors are entitled to have the same set aside on motion where the attorney in fact, or agent of the plaintiff in the confessed judgment, made the required affidavit. Bryant v. Harding, 29 Mo. 347.

In How v. Dorschelmer, 31 Mo. 349, it was said that a confession of judgment which sets out a promissory note as the consideration, and not a statement of facts out of which the indebtedness arose, is subject to be set aside by other judgment creditors of the judgment debtor who show that they are prejudiced thereby.

Anyone interested can move to set aside a judgment that is null and void for defect of substance, as where a judgment is confessed by one party for the firm. Mills v. Dickson, 6 Rich. L. 487. In this case the court said that no one not a party to the judgment can impeach upon mere irregularity.

See Cassem v. Brown, 74 Ill. App. 346, supra, holding the reverse.

A judgment will be set aside where the defendant was dead at the time of entering the confession. Milnor v. Milnor, 9 N. J. L. 93; Knott v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 511, 6 S. E. 788; Taylor v. Gooch, 110 N. C. 387, 15 S. E. 2.

In New York it was early held, under the act of 1818, that a judgment entered on confession on a defective statement was constructively fraudulent as to creditors, and the subsequent sections of the Code of Procedure and Code of Civil Procedure defining the statement were intended to take the place of that act. Some of the cases refer to the question of fraud, and others do not. The cases cited here do not include those where the debtor actually intended to defraud his creditors.

A judgment on confession may be set aside on motion of judgment creditors on account of a defective statement. Bonnell v. Henry, 13 How. Pr. 142; Winnebrenner v. Edgerton, 30 Barb. 185, 8 Abb. Pr. 419, 17 How. Pr. 363.

And it may be set aside by suit in equity. Dunham v. Waterman, 17 N. Y. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 406, 6 Abb. Pr. 357.

In Wood v. Mitchell, 53 Hun, 451, 6 N. Y. Supp. 232, it was held that one judgment creditor could have a judgment of another creditor set aside where a person confessed a judgment in favor of an infant for liability on a tort, as upon contract, and this judgment would be in the way of other creditors pursuing their remedies, which judgment the plaintiff could repudiate upon attaining his majority.

The supreme court may set aside a judgment, entered therein without action, for a defect in the statement upon which it is entered, upon the application of a junior judgment creditor. Chappel v. Chappel, 12 N. Y. 215, 64 Am. Dec. 496. In this case the court said: "Had the plaintiff in the judgment by confession shown by satisfactory evidence that the debt for which this judgment had been entered up was really due him and originated out of a bona fide transaction, that the form of the confession was defective on account of a misapprehension of the practice and the requirements of the statute, it might have been proper for the supreme court, in the exercise of its discretion, to have in the motion to strike out. After this the complaint was amended by striking out the prayer for relief by way of damages. The court overruled the demurrer on the grounds (1) that it had acquired no jurisdiction over the defendant; (2) that the plaintiffs had no standing in court, because they were not parties to the action for divorce, and were not legally prejudiced by the judgment therein. The reasons of appeal relate to the action of the court in denying the motion to strike out, and in overruling the demurrer.

Messrs. Bill & Tuttle and Robert C. Dickenson, for appellants:

The general power of a court to vacate and annul one of its own decrees when void for any reason, or when procured by fraud, is everywhere abundantly recognized.

permitted an amendment, thus preserving its lien and priority." It was further held that Code Proc. § 883, is to be construed as the act of 1818, in order to prevent fraud.

In Lawless v. Hackett, 16 Johns. 149, holding that a judgment confessed on a defective statement should be set aside on motion of a judgment creditor, it was further held that, under N. Y. act April 21, 1818 (Sess. 41, chap. 269, § 8), providing for the statement on confession, the object of the act was to prevent fraud. It was also held that the specification could be amended, but not to interfere with the rights of any judgment creditors which might have attached in the meantime.

In Flour City Nat. Bank v. Doty, 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 141, an action to set aside a judgment confessed by a debtor for defective statement in not complying with N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1274, providing for statement, it was held that it should be set aside, and that where the statement is defective the judgment is fraudulent as to creditors.

In National Park Bank v. Salomon, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 8, 5 N. Y. Supp. 632, on a motion by a creditor to set aside a judgment on confession for defective statement, it was held that the supreme court may amend a confession of judgment notwithstanding the fact of such amendment will prejudice judgment creditors.

And such a judgment may be set aside at the instance of purchasers under mortgage foreclosure. Marks v. Reynolds, 12 Abb. Pr. 403, note, 20 How. Pr. 338.

In Shufelt v. Shufelt, 9 Paige, 137, 37 Am. Dec. 381, it was held that a subsequent mortgagee (a father of mortgagor) could not impeach the consideration of a prior judgment voluntarily confessed by his son to an administrator.

In James v. Johnson, 6 Johns. Ch. 417, it was held that mortgage creditors are bona fide purchasers, within the meaning of the act of the 21st of April, 1818 (Sess. 41, chap. 259), relative to judgments entered by confession on warrants of attorney, which declares such judgments fraudulent and void, as against "other bona fide judgment creditors" and "every bona fide purchaser," where a particular specification of the consideration of the debt is not filed. But this case was reversed in James v. Morey, 2 Cow. 246, 14 Am. Dec. 475.

In Schooncraft v. Thompson, 7 How. Pr. 446, a judgment on confession was set aside at the instance of a junior judgment creditor for defective statement, but in 9 How. Pr. 61, this was reversed on the ground that the statement was not defective.

A judgment entered upon confession will not 54 L. R. A.

The exercise of this right is not dependent upon the residence or presence of the parties in the original suit; otherwise it would be ineffectual, for all that would be

be set aside at the instance of another judgment creditor on the ground that it is excessive on account of including interest, where it appears from the evidence taken on the trial that the note did, by its terms, draw interest from its date. Rothchild v. Mannevoitch, 29 App. Div. 580, 51 N. Y. Supp. 258.

In Simpson v. Burch, 4 Hun. 315, where a junior creditor moved to vacate a judgment and execution in attachment on the ground of the want of jurisdiction of the defendant, it was held that under Code Proc. § 139, providing that from the time of the service of the summons in a civil action or the allowance of a personal summons the court shall have acquired jurisdiction, the omission to serve a summons personally or by publication within thirty days was an irregularity which entitled the defendant to avoid all proceedings after the issuing of the attachment. But such omission did not render the proceedings void as regards third persons. In this case the court said: "The defendant undoubtedly might waive the effect of such omissions, and that is the test whether the defect shown is a nullity or a mere irregularity. Upon this ground we think the case of Gere v. Gundlach, 57 Barb. 13, was rightly decided."

In Barron v. South Brooklyn Saw Mill Co. 18 Abb. N. C. 352, it was said: "It is decided in Gere v. Gundlach, 57 Barb. 13, and Simpson v. Burch, 4 Hun. 315, that a noncompliance with this proviso that publication must be commenced in thirty days is a mere irregularity, and that a third person cannot take advantage of it."

III. Matters of administration, probate, heirs, guardian.

The administratrix of a purchaser under partition may have a judgment in foreclosure of a parol agreement to make a mortgage set aside. This is under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 724, authorizing relief from a judgment taken through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Ladd v. Stevenson, 112 N. Y. 325, 19 N. E. 842. In this case the court said that in consequence of filing a notice of lis pendens the first judgment bound these defendants, and persons thus situated could not only claim to be made parties, but could also move the court in reference to any judgment rendered therein affecting their rights. "The plaintiff had no written stipulation giving or agreeing to give him a lien upon real estate. If he had any agreement for a lien upon this real estate, it all rested in parol, and there was no part per-necessary to enable the offending party to retain the benefit of his fraud and injury would be to remain absent from the state whose court of justice he had wronged.

formance and no ground whatever authorizing the maintenance of the action."

An administrator seeking to reverse a judgment to which he was not a party must aver, in his petition for a writ of error, that he has been duly appointed, and that the property in controversy would be assets in his hands. Thomas v. Jones, 10 Tex. 52.

And relief was granted to an administrator where judgment on confession was taken against the decedent after death. Wood v. Hopkins, 3 N. J. L. 689.

Any lienor or judgment creditor, or any general creditor of an estate of a decedent, may maintain a motion to set aside a judgment rendered against an administrator, where the petition does not aver presentation of the claim, and contains counsel fees contrary to Wyo. Stats. 1890-91, chap. 14, § 9, chap. 70, providing that no holder of any claim against an estate shall maintain any action thereon unless the claim is first presented to the executor or administrator, but to enforce a lien no counsel fees shall be recovered unless such claims are so presented. O'Keefe v. Foster, 5 Wyo. 343, 40 Pac. 525.

But where an administrator appealed from the probate court disallowing his claims, and creditors under an appearance on appeal subsequently consented to a decree of reversal, other creditors who stood by and knew of the proceeding cannot maintain a petition to set aside the decree where there is no showing of fraud. Pierce v. East Greenwich Probate Ct. 19 R. I. 472, 34 Atl. 992. In this case the court said that if the petitioner was a party to the appeal by reason of being a creditor of the estate, he was estopped; and if he was not a party, he had no standing to disturb the action taken by all who were parties to the appeal.

Creditors of decedent cannot have a decree dismissing a bill filed by the executors set aside in order to introduce additional evidence, where such creditors had notice of the proceedings, and did not apply to be made parties. Koons v. Koons, 6 Kulp, 317.

An heir who was not a party in a proceeding to probate a will wherein it was adjudged that the writing was not the will of the testator is entitled to maintain a bill of review, and he may have a review, rehearing, and reversal of the decision, though it may be that of the appellate court. Singleton v. Singleton, 8 B. Mon. 340.

And relief was granted to an heir where a judgment was taken after the defendant's death. Blodgett v. Blodgett, 42 How. Pr. 19.

Fraud in procuring said divorce may consist in taking up a fictitious residence for the purpose of getting jurisdiction, concealing the commencement of the suit from the defendant, and falsifying testimony.

Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437; 2 Bishop, Marr. Div. & Sep. § 1568, p. 1568.

This is in the nature of an application to correct the record and prevent wrong and injustice from the effect of the judgment as it now stands. In this respect it only invokes the exercise of the power of the court for which there are precedents in analogous cases.

Stickney v. Davis, 17 Pick. 169; Oapen v. Staughton, 16 Gray, 364; Downs v. Fuller, 2 Met. 135, 35 Am. Dec. 393; Schouler, and did not appear, may have a judgment by default against them vacated under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 75, § 8, authorizing the persons proceeded against as unknown heirs to be allowed to defend at any time within one year after notice of the entry of judgment. Boeing v. McKinley, 44 Minn. 392, 46 N. W. 776.

But after judgment in an action wherein A. B. was defendant, and who was represented to be the only heir of C. D., through whom he derived title, another party claiming to be the only heir cannot have the judgment set aside and annulled, as his rights are in no manner affected by the judgment. McGhee v. Romatka, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 436, 44 S. W. 700.

And relief was denied devisee not in privity where the decree was taken after a party died. Slingsby v. Hale, 1 Ch. Cas. 122.

Under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 5434, providing that a judgment obtained by means of perjury or any fraudulent act or practice of the prevailing party may be set aside, an heir cannot set aside a judgment obtained in the probate court to sell lands to pay debts, on the ground that the claims were not presented in time, and were not debts due by the estate, where it is not shown but that these heirs appeared in that action. O'Brien v. Larson, 71 Minn. 371, 74 N. W. 148.

A guardian seeking to reverse a judgment to which neither he nor his cestui que trust are parties must show his right to have it reversed by proper averments. Cochrane v. Day, 27 Tex. 585.

IV. Assignment for creditors.

The assignee for creditors has no right to have two judgments against his assignor set aside on the ground that they were taken upon the same specialty, as no one but the defendant in an execution can complain of a judgment for being irregular. The judgments mentioned above are not irregular. Creditors complaining of them cannot be relieved by motion to set them aside, but have another appropriate remedy. Jacobs v. Burgwyn, 63 N. C. 196.

So, an assignee for creditors cannot have a judgment on confession set aside on the ground of insufficiency of statement, as he has no standing in court in such a case. Beekman v. Kirk, 15 How. Pr. 228.

And a purchaser of claims against an insolvent after the latter's discharge cannot maintain an action to set aside the decree of discharge. Such an assignee is not within Cal. act 1880, § 53, providing that any creditor whose debt was provable may, after the discharge, set it aside after two years on the ground of fraud. Sanborn v. Doe, 92 Cal. 152, 28 Pac. 105.

The general assignee for the benefit of creditors has not such a standing in court as entitles him to question the validity of the judgment confessed by his assignor, which is insufficient in not stating what amount remained due upon the bond. It is only a judgment creditor, or one claiming under him, that is authorized to invoke the summary exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court to set aside an illegal or fraudulent judgment. A creditor at large cannot be heard. Beekman v. Kirk, 15 How. Pr. 228.

But in Mills v. Dickson, 6 Rich. L. 487, it was held that an assignee for creditors may have a judgment confessed by one partner for the firm set aside.

V. Garnishment.

A claimant of money garnished cannot have the judgment sustaining the garnishment opened up where such judgment is satisfied, although he notified the garnishee before judgment that the fund in his hands belonged to the claimant, but the garnishee admitted the indebtedness in court and allowed the judgment to be taken. A stranger to the record cannot have the judgment opened after it is satisfied. Shultz v. Hoffman, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 90.

A garnishee not a party to the record cannot go before the court and move to set aside a judgment which is not against him. Merchants' & Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Halman, 80 Ga. 624, 5 S. E. 795. In this case the court said: "The Code, § 3587, evidently confines the motion in arrest of a judgment, or a motion to set it aside, to the parties to the record."

VI. Foreclosure of mortgage.

A judgment of foreclosure should not be set aside for the purpose of allowing a person whose rights were not affected by it to come in and be made a party to the action and set up a defense. Bean v. Fisher, 14 Wis. 58.

And after a foreclosure sale a third party will not be allowed to file a bill in the nature of a bill of review for the purpose of having the decree reviewed and set aside on the ground that the mortgage debt had been paid before foreclosure. Ward v. Clark, 6 Wis. 509. In this case the court said: "From these cases it appears that it is not competent for a person who is a stranger to the record, and not in any sense a party to the suit, to appear therein and make a motion. He must procure a status in court, by petition or bill, as the nature of the case may require, and then he may proceed §4 L. R. A.

Neither of the plaintiffs was a party to the divorce suit. They were absolutely strangers to it. They had no rights or interests affected by the judgment of divorce. They cannot directly attack it. Only the defrauded party to the divorce action can do that.

The plaintiffs have no standing in court; no cause of action which the court will consider.

as his interests and the practice of the court may allow."

A terre-tenant who bought subject to the lien of the unpaid balance of a mortgage has no standing after a sci. fa., and after the land has been sold by judicial sale, to have the judgment opened on the ground of usury, where the mortgagee renounces all right to a personal judgment on the bond. Reap v. Battle, 155 Pa. 265, 26 Atl. 439. In this case the court said: "The only person who can defend a sci. fa. because of usury included in a mortgage is the mortgagor."

In Sumner v. Coleman, 20 Ind. 486, it was said that one who was not a party to an action of foreclosure, and who was a proper, though not a necessary, party, cannot open the judgment, and cannot contest the amount of the judgment unless he shows it to be fraudulent.

VII. Judgments against partners.

In an action against a firm where one of the partners served an offer of judgment without consent of his codefendants, and judgment was taken against all the defendants, another judgment creditor was entitled to have the same set aside, as the offer did not purport to be signed by all the defendants or in their behalf. The signature "D. M. & Co." does not authorize a judgment against all the members. Bridenbecker v. Mason, 16 How. Pr. 203. The court said: "Third persons cannot take the objection that the judgment or proceeding is irregular. (2 Chitty, Arch. 1876). But when a judgment is fraudulent or is invalid by reason of some substantial defect, it will be set aside on the application of any party interested in impeaching it." This case follows the New York rule that judgments on confession, and defective statements, are constructively fraudulent. See II., supra, Judgments on confession.

And in Mills v. Dickson, 6 Rich. L. 487, it was held that a judgment confessed by one partner for the firm would be set aside.

But in Cassem v. Brown, 74 Ill. App. 346, the court refused to set aside a judgment confessed by one partner for the firm, on the ground that the moving party must first establish that the claim was unjust.

VIII. Judgments against corporations.

A stranger cannot set aside a judgment after the lapse of twenty years on the grounds that all the necessary parties were not before the court, and that the corporation defendant was dissolved by reason of insolvency. The new

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appeal in this case involves to some extent the consideration of the power of the superior court over its recorded judgments, and its duty to exercise that power under certain circumstances. Over its recorded judgments it may exercise two powers, separate and distinct in their purpose and object, if not in their nature; namely: (1) the power to correct and amend the record so that it shall speak truth,—shall truly show what the judicial action really was; (2) trustees, who were alleged to have been necessary parties, may have disclaimed any interest in the absence of any showing in the record as to their being proper parties. The death of a trustee before judgment devolved the trust on the other trustees who were parties. One who was not a stockholder or a creditor cannot urge that the corporation was dissolved. F. G. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 121 Mo. 614, 26 S. W. 387.

And the appointment of receivers, in the absence of an injunction restraining the officers of the corporation from defending an action, did not deprive such officers of the right to continue the defense thereof; and such receivers have no standing to move to set aside an answer which was served and a judgment which was entered, and to move for leave to serve an answer on their own behalf. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Hoffman House, 7 Misc. 358, 27 N. Y. Supp. 634. In this case it was further questioned whether the receiver was properly appointed, where no injunction was granted under N. J. act April 7, 1895, § 72, in case of insolvent corporations, authorizing the court of chancery "at the time of ordering the said injunction," or at any time afterwards "during the continuance of said injunction," to appoint a receiver of the corporation.

In Rogers v. Haines, 114 Ala. 50, 21 So. 411, it was said that where judgments were rendered prematurely against a corporation the remedy of a receiver subsequently appointed was not plain, adequate, and complete by motion to set aside or by certiorari, but that he could, by bill in equity, enjoin the same.

In Sharp v. Danville, M. & S. W. R. Co. 106 N. C. 308, 11 S. E. 530, where judgments were confessed by a corporation and entered at night on the same day that a receiver was appointed for the corporation, and the receiver moved to set them aside for irregularity, it was held that they were regular and valid. The court does not discuss the question as to the right of a receiver to make the motion.

IX. For death of party.

The general rule seems to be that on the application of an heir, administrator, or creditor a judgment taken against a party who was dead at the time of the judgment will be set aside. But it was held that after twenty years an heir not in privity could not set aside a decree against a plaintiff where one of the defendants was dead at the time of the decree.

A judgment rendered against a person who is dead is irregular and voidable, and will be vacated on the application of representatives 54 L. R. A.

the power to set aside, annul, and vacate such judgment. Many of the limitations and conditions under which it will exercise one of these powers may not limit or condition its exercise of the other. It may rightfully exercise its powers merely to amend or correct the record of the judgment so as to make it speak truthfully, under circumstances which would not at all justify it in exercising its power to vacate the judgment. As the record is a history of the court proceedings, the power to make it speak truthfully is one of necessity belonging to every court of record, and may be exercised as well during the term at which the judgment was rendered, on the court's own motion or otherwise, as afterwards; but, when exercised afterwards, it will generally be done only upon notice to the adverse party. Wilkie v. Hall, 15 Conn. 32; Weed v. Weed, 25 of the deceased, or by any person having acquired an interest in the suit after it is begun, if application is made in due season. Knott v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 511, 6 S. E. 788; Doe ex dem. Taylor v. Gooch, 110 N. C. 387, 15 S. E. 2.

In this latter case the court said that, as a general rule, only the party against whom an irregular judgment is rendered can complain of it. "But it has been held in a proceeding between these same parties (Knott v. Taylor, 99 N. C. 511, 6 S. E. 788), that he can make such motion. It would be very strange if he could not, since it is held in that case that he could not set up his rights and enjoin the execution of plaintiff's writ of possession in an independent action."

And a judgment entered upon a bond with a warrant of attorney after the death of the obligor, who was insolvent at the time, will be set aside as irregular on a motion of another creditor. Milnor v. Milnor, 9 N. J. L. 93.

And where the facts disclosed authorized the court to assume that the defendant was dead when the plaintiff commenced his action against him, and consequently that the judgment obtained in the action was void, it is an apparent lien or cloud on the real estate of the defendant, which may be set aside on motion, by an heir at law of the defendant, having an interest in such real estate. Blodget v. Blodget, 42 How. Pr. 19. In this case the court said that "this court has control of its own judgments, and has not unfrequently vacated them on motion of parties having an interest in a property on which they are a cloud."

And where a judgment and warrant of attorney was entered up after the death of the defendant, his administrator could have the same set aside, on motion, for irregularity. Wood v. Hopkins, 8 N. J. L. 689. This was because, if it should turn out that the estate was insolvent, the creditors would stand on the same footing.

A bill was brought by a mortgagor against a mortgagee to have a redemption. It was decreed accordingly, and that if the plaintiff failed to pay the money at a day set the defendant should hold discharged of all equity of redemption. Pending the reference the suit abated by the death of one of the defendants, and no notice was taken of this and the decree was enrolled. Twenty years afterwards a devisee of the mortgagor brought a bill of review on the ground that there was no cause in the court when the account was stated, and that the decree was erroneous. It was held that the plaintiff, being a devisee, was not entitled to a bill of review, being not in privity with the testa-

Conn. 337-342; Calhoun v. Terry Porter & Co. 21 Conn. 526-530; Smith v. Moore, 38 Conn. 105-109; Rouse v. Smith, 51 Conn. 266, 50 Am. Rep. 16. As to the other power,—to vacate or set aside a recorded judgment,—the authorities are agreed that it may be exercised during the term at which the judgment was rendered, substantially at the discretion of the court. "It is a general rule of law that all the judgments, decrees, or other orders of the courts, however conclusive in their character, are under the control of the court which pronounces them during the term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and that they may then be set aside, vacated, modified, or annulled by that court." Bronson v. Schulten, 104 U. S. 410-415, 26 L. ed. 797-799. See also to the same effect, Sturdevant v. Stanton, 47 Conn. 580; Wilkie v. Hall, 15 Conn. 37;

Weed v. Weed, 25 Conn. 342; Foster v. Redfield, 50 Vt. 285; Maryland Steel Co. v. Marney, 91 Md. 360, 46 Atl. 1077. But whether this power can be exercised upon equitable grounds after the term at which the judgment was rendered has ended, and, if so, upon what conditions and under what limitations, are questions upon which the courts in the different states are not in accord with each other. In many of the states a more or less limited control over its judgments, after the expiration of the term at which they are rendered, has been conferred upon the courts by statute, while in others a more or less limited power of this kind is held to be inherent in the court without the aid of legislation. Then, too, the mode of procedure in such cases, and the circumstances under which this exercise of such power can be invoked successfully, tor, against whom the decree was rendered; and the bill was dismissed. Slingsby v. Hale, 1 Ch. Cas. 122.

X. For usury.

A purchaser of land that is subject to a judgment cannot have the same set aside on the ground that it contains usury. Reap v. Battle, 155 Pa. 268, 26 Atl. 439; Black v. Pattison, 61 Miss. 599.

So, where a party filed a bill for relief from a judgment against him on the ground of usury, but afterwards consented to a decree dismissing his bill, it was held that a subsequent purchaser of the land on which the judgment was a lien could not impeach it on the ground of usury. French v. Shotwell, 5 Johns. Ch. 555.

And one creditor is not entitled to have a prior judgment of another creditor against his debtor set aside on the ground that there was usury in the original mortgage debt, where such complaining creditor, when the lien was about to be made, assisted the debtor in endeavoring to pay a part of the debt, and thus to postpone the final execution of the judgment. Mahan v. Cavender, 77 Ga. 118. In this case the court said that he could only obtain relief in case the judgment was fraudulent, and in that event he must not have been negligent.

XI. Application by surety or guarantor.

The executor of the surety on a bond of an administrator cannot have a judgment against such administrator set aside where neither the administrator nor his administrator complained of any alleged irregularity in the judgment. Waiton v. McKesson, 101 N. C. 428, 7 S. E. 566.

And a surety on an appeal bond is not entitled to maintain a bill in equity to have the judgment declared void on the ground that the cause of action was a gambling contract, under Ill. Crim. Code, § 135, providing that all judgments, etc., given, granted, drawn, or executed contrary to the provisions of this chapter may be set aside and vacated by any court of equity upon bill filed for that purpose by the person so granting, giving, entering into, or executing the same, or by his executors or administrators, or by any creditor, heir, devisee, purchaser, or other person interested therein. West v. Carter, 129 Ill. 249, 21 N. E. 782. In this case the court said: "In no sense can appellee be said to be a person 'interested,' either in the original contract, or in the judgment rendered thereon by the justice of the peace, within the contemplation of the section of the statute quoted. In respect of this judgment he was a 54 L. R. A.

mere volunteer, who, at the instance of the defendant, voluntarily obligated himself to pay the judgment rendered against his principal by said justice."

"The party aggrieved" does not mean "any party aggrieved" under Minn. Laws 1877, chap. 131 (Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 66, § 285), authorizing an action to be prosecuted by "the party aggrieved" to set aside a judgment obtained by means of the perjury or fraudulent conduct of the prevailing party. Stewart v. Duncan, 40 Minn. 410, 42 N. W. 89. In this case the court said that "this plaintiff was not a party to it, although he was directly interested in the result, as it would affect his liability to the sheriff under his indemnifying bond . . . It would be a liberal construction, rather than a strict one, which should give to the words 'the party aggrieved' as used in this connection a meaning equivalent to 'any person aggrieved.'"

And where the defendant in claim and delivery consented to a judgment for the recovery of property, the sureties on the delivery bond were not entitled after judgment to procure an order making them parties defendant and to have the judgment vacated, where they did not offer to interplead and claim the property as prescribed by N. C. Code, § 331, providing that when property taken by the sheriff shall be claimed by any person other than the plaintiff or the defendant, claimant may interplead upon filing an affidavit of his title and right to the possession. McDonald v. McBryde, 117 N. C. 125, 23 S. E. 103. In this case the court said that the judgment could only be set aside by civil action, and not by a motion in the cause.

But in Hoffman v. Steinau, 20 N. Y. Week. Dig. 122, it was held that a surety in a replevin bond may be permitted to protect himself where it is equitable to open a judgment obtained against the plaintiff by default, and to prosecute the action in the latter's name.

And a party who pays under a contract of indemnity a Wisconsin judgment obtained on a New York judgment may, after reversal by the Supreme Court of United States of the New York judgment, have the Wisconsin judgment set aside. Aetna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 38 Wis. 107. In this case the court said: "We conceive it, therefore, quite incorrect to say that they are to be regarded as strangers to the record,—that they are not entitled to complain against the judgment, nor to ask the court to set it aside. Such a view would, or might, lead to great injustice, and certainly would sacrifice the substantial rights of parties upon very technical grounds. The case is not analogous to that of Packard v. Smith, 9 Wis. 184; Drexel's Appeal, 6 Pa. 272; and Berry v. Atty.

very very much in the different jurisdictions. In some the mode of procedure is, in a more or less summary way, by motion supported by affidavits, while in others it must be by bill of review in equity, or by petition for a new trial, or by some other mode of application to the court which rendered the judgment sought to be set aside. For these and other reasons of a similar nature the decisions in one jurisdiction afford but little aid in determining matters of this kind in another. In the case at bar the equitable power of the superior court in Fairfield county is invoked to set aside a judgment rendered six years before. This is the only court to which an application of this nature could be brought, and such court is invested with full power to entertain and grant applications of this kind. Smith v. Hall, 71 Conn. 427-432, 42 Atl. 86. The real question in this case is not whether the superior court possesses the power to set aside the judgment of divorce in question upon the grounds alleged in the complaint, but it is whether the court erred in not exercising that power in favor of these plaintiffs. The judgment which the plaintiffs seek to open is one of a peculiar character. It establishes the personal status of the parties to it in a particular which was of the highest importance to the parties and to the community. They had been married. It made them single and unmarried. If such a judgment can under any circumstances be reopened at the suit of a stranger, this judgment cannot be reopened at the suit of the plaintiffs. Its consequences, if harmful to them, are of too remote and indirect a character to give them any cause of action. The court is not called upon to exercise this power at the instance of such parties. Courts are instituted to give relief to parties whose rights have been invaded, and to give it at the instance of such parties; and a party whose rights have not been invaded cannot be heard himself to complain if the court refuses to act at his instance in righting the wrongs of another who seeks no redress. The courts are practically unanimous in holding that it is not error to refuse to exercise the power here in question at the instance of a mere stranger,

Gen. 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 232, 2 Macn. & G. 16, 1 Hall & Tw. 520; and the reason of those decisions does not apply."

See note,—Enjoining judgments against, or in favor of, sureties,—to Michener v. Springfield Engine & Thresher Co. (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 59.

XII. Application by party claiming property affected.

In the absence of statutory or Code provisions, it seems the weight of authority is that a grantee, mortgagee, or claimant is not entitled to relief against judgments to which he was not a party.

A judgment in personam will not be set aside at the instance of one who was not a party to the record, on the ground that the property standing in the name of the defendant, against whom judgment was rendered, belonged to him. Gaehring v. Haedrich, 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 507.

In Leonard v. Bryant, 11 Met. 370, where a writ of entry was sued out against the grantor of the deed before it was recorded, and the judgment was erroneous for defective service of summons, it was said that the grantee could not maintain a writ of error to reverse the judgment, but that his remedy was to avoid it by plea and proof.

A judgment in an attachment suit cannot be set aside for irregularity on the motion of a person to whom the property attached had been conveyed by the defendant, after the service of the attachment, but who is a stranger to the record. People ex rel. Hyde v. Calhoun County Circuit Judges, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 417.

And a stranger to a judgment cannot maintain a collateral action to have it declared not a lien on certain property on account of matters preceding its rendition. Johns v. Pattee, 55 Iowa, 665, 8 N. W. 668. In this case the court further said that it was rendered in a proceeding at law, and there is some question whether such a judgment can be set aside or modified in an action in equity because of matters which preceded the judgment, under Iowa Code, § 2522, providing that "judgment obtained in an action by ordinary proceedings shall not be annulled or modified by any order in an action by equitable proceedings except for a defense which has arisen or been discovered since the judgment was rendered." 54 L. R. A.

The plaintiff claimed that his vendor procured a fraudulent judgment against himself before he conveyed to plaintiff.

The assignee of a defendant served by publication has no right to appear and demand a retrial upon his own account under Iowa Code, § 2877, providing that when a judgment has been rendered against a defendant served by publication only, and who did not appear, such defendant, or any person representing him or them, may at any time within two years move to have the action retried. Parsons v. Johnson, 66 Iowa, 455, 23 N. W. 921.

And under Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 82, providing for the opening of the judgments obtained on publication within five years, a grantee who held title prior to the execution of a trust deed, and conveyed his interest by quitclaim deed before the foreclosure, cannot have the decree opened with leave to file an answer, as he has no interest in the subject of the suit. Powell v. McDowell, 16 Neb. 424, 20 N. W. 271.

And a purchaser will be denied relief from a judgment on confession where it is claimed that there was irregularity in the entry, signing, and docketing. Packard v. Smith, 9 Wis. 184.

A subsequent mortgagee of the judgment debtor cannot call in question the validity of that judgment on the ground of illegality of the consideration, where the judgment debtor himself could not file a bill to set aside a judgment voluntarily confessed. Shufelt v. Shufelt, 9 Paige, 137, 37 Am. Dec. 381. In this case the court said this "was an indirect purchase by a stranger to the transaction of the privilege of bringing a suit in this court to set aside or overreach this judgment by the use of the testimony of the party against whom the judgment was recovered."

On an application by a party who was not a party to the action, but whose lands were affected by judgments to cancel the same, and who claimed that they had been paid, the motion was refused on the grounds that it was not made by the defendant, nor had the plaintiff any notice of the application, but it was made by a party who had no equities so far as appeared in the case, and there might be other persons who had an interest in sustaining the judgment. Re Beers, 5 Robt. 643. In this case the court said: "Before the court can interfere and can-whose rights are not at all affected by the judgment he seeks to have set aside. Foster v. Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. 146 U. S. 48, 36 L. ed. 899, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 38 Wis. 107; Drevel's Appeal, 6 Pa. 272; Robinson v. Stevens, 63 Vt. 555, 22 Atl. 80; Smith v. Hall, 69 Conn. 651-665, 38 Atl. 386; 1 Black, Judgm. §§ 317, 359. This is merely a special application of the wide general principle that courts will act only in behalf of parties who show themselves entitled to such action. They sit to vindicate rights at the instance of parties whose rights have been invaded, and not to vindicate mere abstract principles of justice at the instance of anyone. In the case at bar the complaint, as finally amended, is merely a petition to set aside the judgment of divorce upon equitable grounds; and it shows upon its face, and without the aid of the allegations in the plea in abatement, that the plaintiffs were strangers to the judgment, and that their rights, legal or equitable, were in no way affected by it. There are no facts stated in the complaint which bring the plaintiffs within any of the recognized exceptions to the general rule that strangers to a judgment are not entitled to have it set aside. The mere fact that the setting aside of the judgment would be an advantage to the plaintiffs is not enough. They must show that some legal or equitable right of theirs was invaded by the judgment, before they can complain of the refusal of the court to act upon their petition to have it set aside. The court below based its judgment in this case upon two grounds, namely: (1) The want of jurisdiction over the defendant; (2) the want of interest in the plaintiffs. Even if the court erred as to the first ground, the second ground is sufficient to justify the judgment. In this view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to decide whether the court erred in denying the motion to strike out, or in overruling the demurrer to the plea in abatement, and about these matters we express no opinion.

There is no error.

The other Judges concur.

cel these judgments the application should be made by some party to the record or having some interest based upon such legal or equitable considerations as the court can recognize. Certainly, a stranger to a judgment cannot with any propriety ask the court to vacate or order it satisfied without furnishing some reason therefor. If this judgment is a lien upon property held by Georgina E. Beers she must by action or motion bring before the court all those who are or may be interested."

A grantee cannot have vacated a judgment on confession given by consent of his grantor before the debt was due, and which contains usury. Black v. Pattison, 61 Miss. 599.

And a grantee cannot have a judgment of foreclosure set aside on the ground that it is excessive. Sumner v. Coleman, 20 Ind. 486.

And where several persons were sued as members of a joint-stock company, and the suit was discontinued as to B., one of the defendants, and judgment was then taken against all the others, upon which execution was subsequently issued, and the property of one M., who was not a party to the suit, taken to satisfy the same, it was held that M. could not, by a bill in equity against the plaintiff in the judgment, set it aside upon the ground that the discontinuance of the suit as to B. was a discontinuance as to all of the defendants. The judgment cannot be attacked in this collateral manner. Markley v. Rand, 12 Cal. 275. In this case the court said that if he is not the real defendant, and the sheriff levies on his property, the sheriff is responsible in an action at law, and there is no need of equitable interference.

A grantee cannot sue to set aside a judgment for land against his grantor and in favor of a person who had possession at the time of the deed, although the judgment was procured by fraud. Whitney v. Kelley, 94 Cal. 146, 15 L. R. A. 813, 29 Pac. 624. In this case the court said: "They had neither the title, the possession, nor the right of possession; and, under such circumstances, their conveyance to plaintiff carried nothing but a mere naked right to bring an action to set aside a judgment for a fraud practised upon them. A plaintiff with such a right has no equity, and is not entitled to recognition in a court of equity."

But under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that the court may, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representatives from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, the grantees of land which is the subject-matter of an action are the legal representatives of the grantor within the meaning of this section, and are entitled, on such terms as may be just, to be relieved from a default taken against him through their mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Plummer v. Brown, 64 Cal. 429, 1 Pac. 703.

So, under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 473, a purchaser after the rendition of a judgment by publication against his grantor made without jurisdiction is entitled to have the judgment set aside, as the grantee is the legal representative of the defendant. People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. 848.

And where judgment is taken against defendants in an action to enforce laborers' liens against mining property, the defendants convey the property and appeal, and after a reversal upon appeal another judgment is rendered against the same defendants by default, the grantee of the property may move to set aside the judgment on the grounds of mistake or excusable neglect in failing to plead, under § 473, Cal. Code Civ. Proc. Malone v. Big Flat Gravel Min. Co. 93 Cal. 384, 28 Pac. 1063.

But where lands were conveyed by the defendant before an action by the state to foreclose a certificate of purchase, the grantee of the defendant, not having recorded his deed for twelve years from the date of the judgment, during which time part of the lands had been sold to other parties, is not entitled to a motion to set aside and vacate the judgment under § 473, Cal. Code Civ. Proc. on the ground that publication service was void against the defendant where the judgment was not void on its face. The grantee will be left to his remedy by an equitable action to vacate the judgment. People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 571, 36 Pac. 9.

A judgment absolutely void for want of jurisdiction appearing on its face may be set aside on the motion of any person who, although not a party to the action, has an interest in the property upon which it is a cloud. Such a motion is not, strictly speaking, a proceeding in the action, but an application to have the records purged of an unauthorized and illegal entry. Mueller v. Reimer, 46 Minn. 314, 48 N. W. 1120. But in this case it was held that the motion should be denied, as the moving party had a pending action against the purchaser at execution sale, where the same question was at issue.

In an action of ejectment the plaintiff filed a lis pendens; the defendant asked affirmative relief and obtained judgment. A grantee of plaintiff taking title after suit moved to set the judgment aside, and to be allowed to prosecute the suit as substituted plaintiff. It was held that under Cal. prac. act, § 68, authorizing the court to relieve a party or his legal representatives from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, that the grantee could only be heard as the plaintiff might have been heard, and the defendants could resist the application on any ground available against the plaintiff. Corwin v. Bensley, 43 Cal. 253.

Where no showing was made in court that an action was pending for the possession of mining property for seven and one-half years, and then a substituted copy of summons was filed as a record, and a judgment of default taken quieting title in plaintiffs as against defendants and their successors in interest, it was held that a person who was not a party to the action, but the real party in interest at the time the judgment was obtained, could move to have the same vacated and set aside. This was under S. D. Comp. Laws, § 4881, providing that upon a transfer by a defendant of his interest in the subject of an action the same may proceed in the name of the original parties, or the court may allow the transferee to be substituted. Brettell v. Deffebach, 6 S. D. 21, 60 N. W. 167, 173. In this case the court said that, as an officer is prohibited from serving summons when he is a party to the action, the same principle should apply as in proving the substitution of a summons by a private person who is a party; and the question can be raised on motion to vacate and set aside a judgment by default.

And under Utah Comp. Laws 1888, § 3256, providing that the court may, upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representatives from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, a party who has succeeded to the interest of the defendant may apply to set aside a judgment on the ground of excusable neglect, where the real defendant and his counsel were absent on account of a misunderstanding between counsel, and a judgment was given against the defendant. Thomas v. Morris, 8 Utah, 284, 31 Pac. 446.

A judgment may be set aside upon the motion of a person not a party to the suit when such person, after the commencement of the suit, has acquired rights in the subject-matter thereof, for the protection of which it is necessary that he should be made a party and have an opportunity to interpose a defense after the entry of said judgment. Ladd v. Willett, 22 N. Y. Week. Dig. 521. This was under a liberal construction of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 723, 724, 1282, providing for vacating a judgment.

XIII. Application by creditors seeking relief.

It seems that creditors may have relief from judgments obtained with intent to defraud their rights. This note is not intended to include that class of cases.

There is some conflict of authority as to the creditor's right to have a judgment set aside or vacated for errors or irregularities that might be available to a party to the record. This is controlled to some extent by the position of 54 L. R. A.

the assailing party, the error complained of, and the view taken by the courts in the state where the relief is sought. In some cases it is controlled by a liberal or strict interpretation of the Code or statute. The facts in the different cases will be found in the appropriate subdivision, but the cases are grouped here in order to obtain a comparative view of all the cases where relief was sought by creditors.

In the following cases it was held that judgment creditors, not parties to the record, may obtain relief on application to set aside, vacate, or annul judgments:

From a judgment on confession on account of defective statement of debt or irregularity. How v. Dorschelmer, 31 Mo. 349; Bryant v. Harding, 29 Mo. 347; Wood v. Mitchell, 53 Hun, 451, 6 N. Y. Supp. 232; Chappel v. Chappel, 12 N. Y. 215, 64 Am. Dec. 496; Bonnell v. Henry, 13 How. Pr. 142; Winnebrenner v. Edgerton, 30 Barb. 185; Dunham v. Waterman, 17 N. Y. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 406, 6 Abb. Pr. 357; Lawless v. Hackett, 16 Johns. 149; Flour City Bank v. Doty, 11 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 141; Bernard v. Douglas, 10 Iowa, 370.

So where the defendant was dead. Milnor v. Milnor, 9 N. J. L. 93.

From a judgment against an administrator. O'Keefe v. Foster, 5 Wyo. 343, 40 Pac. 525 (demand insufficient).

But it was held in the following cases that creditors were not entitled to relief:

From judgments on confession. Cassem v. Brown, 74 Ill. App. 346 (judgment confessed by one partner); Martin v. Judd, 60 Ill. 78 (irregularity); Kellogg v. Keith, 4 Ill. App. 386 (irregularity); Adam v. Arnold, 86 Ill. 185 (excessive); Walton v. Walton, 80 N. C. 26 (not excessive); Uzzie v. Vinson, 111 N. C. 138, 16 S. E. 6 (affidavit and statement); Drexel's Appeal, 6 Pa. 272 (by president of corporation).

And relief was denied in Gere v. Gundlach, 57 Barb. 13 (judgment premature); Simpson v. Burch, 4 Hun, 315 (question of jurisdiction); Mahan v. Cavender, 77 Ga. 118 (usury); Walton v. Walton, 80 N. C. 26 (judgment on sale bond was regular); Pierce v. East Greenwich Probate Ct. 19 R. I. 472, 34 Atl. 992 (creditor estopped).

XIV. Application by other persons.

The general rule is laid down that strangers cannot have judgments vacated, annulled, or set aside. Murchison v. White, 54 Tex. 78; Smith v. Newbern, 73 N. C. 303; Covey v. Wheeler, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 467 (judgment confessed by "trustee").

And the same was said to be the rule in Hardin v. Lee, 51 Mo. 241; Walton v. Walton, 80 N. C. 26; Cloud v. El Dorado County, 12 Cal. 128, 73 Am. Dec. 526.

And the same was held where the complaining party had no interest. Mayes v. Woodall, 35 Tex. 687.

And where he had not first obtained leave. Berry v. Atty. Gen. 19 L. J. Ch. N. S. 232, 2 Macn. & G. 16, 1 Hall & Tw. 520.

The superior court has no power to set aside a judgment once rendered, upon the motion of a stranger to the original cause, and to order such stranger to be made a party thereto, under N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 133, providing that the judge may, in his discretion, at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Smith v. Newbern, 73 N. C. 303.

Where the order for substituted service is not warranted by the statute upon the evidence produced, and the copy of the summons was delivered in not less than twenty days before judgment, another creditor cannot take advantage of the irregular and void service. Gere v. Gundlach, 57 Barb. 13.

A motion by a stranger to set aside a decree does not keep the cause pending, so as to allow other parties to intervene, before such motion is overruled. Stern v. Willoughby, 78 Ill. App. 491, Affirmed in 179 Ill. 31, 53 N. E. 1134; Rosenberg v. Stern, 77 Ill. App. 248, Affirmed in 177 Ill. 487, 53 N. E. 78.

XV. Summary.

It is difficult to summarize the law in regard to practice in matters of obtaining relief by third parties by motion to set aside, vacate, and annul judgments. The difficulty arises from the difference in the errors complained of and the status of the complaining party and the local practice under the Code or statute of each state. It may, however, be said, as a general proposition, that a stranger to the record is not, in the absence of a Code provision, entitled to relief by vacating a judgment. The weight of authority follows this rule in matters of divorce, and where the objection is for usury, and where applications for relief were made by sureties and guarantors and grantees and mortgagees, and in matters of assignment for creditors, and foreclosures. Where judgment is taken against a party who is dead at the time of the judgment, it seems the weight of authority is in favor of granting relief. Where objection is made against judgments entered on confession there is a conflict of authority. The rule in New York is in favor of granting relief. I. T.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

William M. SMITH, Appt.,

v.

CAPITAL GAS COMPANY, Respt.

(182 Cal. 209.)

A gas company required by statute to furnish gas to persons within a certain distance from its mains may refuse to do so unless the customer agrees to pay a reasonable rent for a meter, where the value of gas required by him will not amount to one sixth of such reasonable rent, although other consumers are not charged such rent, where it does not appear that any other consumer fails to consume gas enough to pay the meter rent.

(March 13, 1901.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sacramento County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty for refusal to furnish gas. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Shinn & Catlin, for appellant:

The statute expressly required the furnishing of the gas. Similar statutes have been universally sustained.

Moiers v. Metropolitan Gaslight Co. 11 Daly, 119; Jones v. Rochester Gas & Electric Co. 7 App. Div. 465, 39 N. Y. Supp. 1105, 158 N. Y. 678, 52 N. E. 1124; Capital Gas Co. v. Young, 109 Cal. 144, 29 L. R. A. 463, 41 Pac. 869.

The defendant arbitrarily discriminated against the plaintiff when it demanded that he should furnish a meter or agree to pay meter rent.

A gas company is a corporation of a public nature, and must supply gas under regulations which are uniform and certain.

L. R. A. 424, 28 Pac. 244; Bath Gaslight Co. v. Claffy, 56 N. Y. S. R. 426, 26 N. Y. Supp. 287; Portland Natural Gas & Oil Co. v. State ex rel. Keen, 135 Ind. 54, 21 L. R. A. 639, 34 N. E. 818; Coy v. Indianapolis Gas Co. 146 Ind. 655, 36 L. R. A. 535, 46 N. E. 17.

It was the duty of the defendant to furnish a meter. Such was its uniform custom and regulation, and such was its primary obligation.

Prosecutors, v. Jersey City*, 45 N. J. L. 246; Capital Gas & Electric Light Co. v. Gaines, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1464, 49 S. W. 462; Ohouteau v. St. Louis Gaslight Co. 47 Mo. App. 328; Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Carter, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 632.

On petition for rehearing.

The complaint alleged every fact specified by the section, upon which the liability of the defendant depended.

Plaintiff's position was in no wise exceptional. The court does not find that it was exceptional. The opinion, however, decides that plaintiff should allege and prove that his position was not exceptional. A complaint should contain only facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Where a plaintiff counts upon a statutory cause of action, he need allege only the facts which bring him within the statute.

Siemens v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418; Munson v. Bowen, 80 Cal. 572, 22 Pac. 253; Jaffe v. Lilienthal, 86 Cal. 91, 24 Pac. 835; Woodroof v. Hovee, 88 Cal. 184, 26 Pac. 111.

A corporation engaged in furnishing gas to the inhabitants of a city is a corporation of a public nature. It may be compelled to furnish gas by writ of mandate, and must supply gas under regulations which are uniform and certain.

Owensboro Gaslight Co. v. Hildebrand, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 983, 42 S. W. 351; Haugen v. Albina Light & Water Co. 21 Or. 411, 14

The defendant could easily have made a rate for those who used a minimum quantity of gas, so as to provide for the expenses of meters, etc.

State ex rel. Weise v. Sedalia Gaslight Co. 34 Mo. App. 501.

This the defendant did not choose to do, because it desired to reserve, if possible, the right to discriminate.

By refusing gas to those who patronized the South Yuba Company, and allowing its own customers to retain meters and gas without any charge excepting the regular rate of $2.50 per thousand feet, the defendant exercised a powerful inducement for custom, and thereby could drive the South Yuba Company out of business in Sacramento.

Messrs. Devlin & Devlin, for respondent:

If the statute requires the gas company to supply a meter, put in service pipes, examine the same, be responsible for damages done by gas escaping, etc., and does not authorize it to collect a fair rent for the use of its appliances and apparatus and for labor in this behalf, then the law is unconstitutional, as it is depriving a person of his property without due process of law and without just compensation.

Railroad Tax Cases, 13 Fed. 722; Santa Clara County v. Southern P. R. Co. 118 U. S. 394, 30 L. ed. 118, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1132; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418.

The company was not obligated, either directly or indirectly, to furnish a meter.

Ferguson v. Metropolitan Gaslight Co. 37 How. Pr. 189; Sheffield Waterworks Co. v. Bingham, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 443.

The law does not compel any person or corporation engaged in a business to conduct the same at a loss, but such would be the effect if the company was required to furnish meters to those who would not pay it a fair return for the expense which it incurred and the detriment it suffered in the matter.

State ex rel. Weise v. Sedalia Gaslight Co. 34 Mo. App. 501; Louisville Gas Co. v. Dulaney, 100 Ky. 405, 36 L. R. A. 125, 38 S. W. 703; Silkman v. Yonkers Water Comrs. 152 N. Y. 327, 37 L. R. A. 827, 46 N. E. 612.

More than two years prior to the filing of the complaint plaintiff caused the premises to be wired for the furnishing of electric light, and suitable fixtures and appliances to be arranged therefor; and during the two years last past the plaintiff has used electric light of a company other than this defendant for the purpose of lighting the said place. The company was justified in refusing to supply gas to the defendant. 54 L. R. A.

Fleming v. Montgomery Light Co. 100 Ala. 657, 13 So. 618.

Smith, C., filed the following opinion:

The suit was brought to recover of the defendant liquidated damages amounting to $1,300, alleged to be due under the provisions of § 629 of the Civil Code, for refusal to furnish gas to the plaintiff. The judgment was for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals. The provision of the Code in question is that, "upon the application in writing of the owner or occupant of any building or premises distant not more than 100 feet from any main of the corporation the corporation must supply gas as required for such building or premises," etc.; and, further, that "if, for the space of ten days after such application, the corporation refuses or neglects to supply the gas required, it must pay to the applicant the sum of $50 as liquidated damages, and $5 a day as liquidated damages for every day such refusal or neglect continues thereafter." The case as presented by the findings is as follows: The defendant is a corporation engaged in supplying the city of Sacramento with gas, and the plaintiff is an occupant of premises within 100 feet of one of its mains. September 22, 1898, the plaintiff served on the defendant a written notice, which (omitting date, address, and signature) was as follows: "You will please immediately supply me with gas for the premises occupied by me," etc. (describing them). The defendant, in reply, within ten days thereafter "notified plaintiff that it would supply plaintiff with gas for said building and premises if plaintiff would furnish a meter, or agree to pay defendant 50 cents per month as rent for a meter;" and "plaintiff refused to furnish a meter, or to pay said rent to the defendant." The rent demanded was found by the court to be "fair and equitable," representing the monthly cost of the meter to the defendant for care, labor, interest on investment, etc. But it is found that the defendant had no rule requiring payment of rent for meters, nor did it charge its other customers therefor. The defendant, it seems, had, prior to September 8, 1898, been supplying plaintiff with gas; but the plaintiff, during the year preceding that date, had used electrical lights mainly, and almost exclusively, and the total amount of gas used on the premises amounted only to the value of $1.75; and the defendant on that date had removed the meter, thereby depriving the plaintiff of gas. It is found, in a passage following the statement of the above facts and the written notice, that "said gas" was and is necessary for the plaintiff's use on the premises in question; but, unless this expression be construed as referring to the gas used prior to September 8, 1898, it does not appear how much or what gas was needed.

There can be no doubt, I think, of the right of gas companies ordinarily to charge rent for meters. Civil Code, § 632; Sheward v. Citizens' Water Co. 90 Cal. 641, 27 Pac. 439. But the point is made by the appellant that in charging him with such rent when other consumers were not required to pay it "the defendant arbitrarily discriminated against the plaintiff." But I do not think this is the case. Ordinarily, compensation for the meter is received from the return for the gas consumed. But here the value of the gas consumed during the year preceding the removal of the meter was not equal to a sixth part of the annual expense of the meter. The plaintiff's written demand did not specify, even in a general way, the amount of gas required, or even that he required more gas than he had been in the habit of using (Andrews v. North River Electric Light & Power Co. 23 Misc. 512, 51 N. Y. Supp. 872), and the defendant was quite justified in supposing that he required no more (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41). A "state of mind once proved to exist is presumed to remain unchanged until the contrary appears." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 42. The case, therefore, stands as though the plaintiff's demand had been simply for the restoration of the status quo, i. e., for the use of the quantity of gas he had been using. The plaintiff's case was, therefore, altogether exceptional, and, we may assume, unique; for there is neither finding nor allegation that there were any others in the same category, and, if none, then there was no discrimination; and if there were any such, it devolved on the plaintiff to allege and to prove it; for, to render one liable for a penalty, every material fact necessary to bring the case within the statute must be affirmatively shown. Conly v. Clay, 90 Hun, 20, 35 N. Y. Supp. 521; Hardwick v. Vermont Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 70 Vt. 180, 40 Atl. 169.

The defendant was justified, then, in notifying the plaintiff that he would be charged with rent for the meter if supplied by the company, and the plaintiff's refusal to agree to this was its sufficient justification in refusing to furnish gas. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: Gray, C.; Cooper, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

J. A. VAN HARLINGEN, Appt.,

v.

J. B. DOYLE, Auditor of Tuolumne County, Resp't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. That portion of a statute providing for county printing, which requires the NOTE.—While there do not seem to be any decisions closely similar to the above in respect to the facts involved, the general question of equal privileges and immunities of citizens under the Constitution is considered in a note to Louisville Safety Vault & T. Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 14 L. R. A. 579.

supervisors to fix the price and allow the procurement of the needed amount and certification of the bill to the board, is separable from the part which prohibits the employment for the purpose of a paper established less than a stated time, and may be upheld, although the latter part is unconstitutional.

2. A statute prohibiting the letting of public printing to papers which have been established less than a year violates the constitutional provisions that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and that no citizen shall be granted privileges which upon the same terms shall not be granted to all citizens.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Tuolumne County in favor of defendant in a suit to enjoin the drawing of a warrant to pay a claim for county printing. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. J. B. Curtin, for appellant:

A newspaper when not published one year does not stand upon the "same terms" in relation to the law as does a newspaper which has been published for one year.

To treat one man differently from another man—to deny one man a privilege extended to another man—is not partiality. It may be a just discrimination. To constitute partiality and the invidious discrimination against which the Constitution aims, the denial to another of what is given to one must be made upon substantially the same facts, or, to express the idea differently, the denial must be of the same claim before accorded.

Messrs. F. W. Street and F. P. Otis, for respondent:

The statute is class legislation, and grants special privileges to those who have been engaged in the newspaper business in any county for the period of more than one year.

The classification is not founded upon differences defined by the Constitution, or natural, or which will suggest a reason which might naturally be held to justify the diversity of legislation.

Chipman, C., filed the following opinion:

Action to restrain defendant, as auditor of Tuolumne county, from drawing a warrant to pay the claim of one Richardson for printing the delinquent tax list for the year 1898 in a newspaper called the "Mother Lode." The court found that Richardson was the proprietor of the paper on May 27, 1899, and that the tax collector of the county on that day caused the delinquent tax list for the year 1898 to be published in said paper for the period required by law. The list was duly published, and the bill for the work was allowed and ordered paid by the supervisors. The said newspaper was first printed in said county on January 20, 1897, and continued to be printed until September 24, 1898, when the printing was suspended, and was resumed on the 27th day of May, 1899, since which latter date, inclusive, the paper has been published. On May 3, 1899, the supervisors fixed the rate of printing and advertising in said county, in accordance with subd. 21 of § 25 of the county government act, approved April 1, 1897 (Stat. 1897, p. 452, at p. 464). The tax collector offered said delinquent tax list to all the newspapers printed, published, and established for one year prior to the 3d day of May, 1899, in said county, and each and all the proprietors of said newspapers refused to publish said list at the price fixed by said supervisors. Thereupon said tax collector caused the list to be published in said Mother Lode at the rates fixed by the said supervisors. Judgment was given for defendant, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant contends that the printing of the delinquent tax list by the Mother Lode newspaper was in violation of § 3766, Pol. Code, which, as amended in 1895, provided that "the publication must be made once a week for three successive weeks in some newspaper, or in supplement thereto, published in the county, and the board of supervisors must contract for such publication with the lowest bidder, and after ten days' public notice that such will be let. The bidding must be by sealed proposals." Section 25, subd. 21, of the county government act, requires the board of supervisors of the several counties to advertise for sealed bids for furnishing the county with stationery and various other supplies. Then follows this provision: "The board shall annually fix the price at which the county shall be supplied with job printing and blank books, from a schedule prepared by the clerk of the board, showing all blanks and blank books used in the several offices and departments, and also the price of all county advertising; and each county officer shall procure such blank books, job printing, and advertising required for the proper discharge of his official duties such printing and advertising to be done by such person or newspaper as such officer may designate, at a price no greater than is so fixed, and certify the bill therefor to the board of supervisors.

No supplies, printing, stationery, or books shall be procured of any person or firm whose paper has not been established or whose place of business has not been established in the county for one year or more prior to the time of fixing said prices." Section 11, art. 1, of the Constitution, provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Section 21 of the same article reads as follows: "No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the legislature; nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens." The trial court held that the part of § 25 of the county government act stated in italics is unconstitutional. The advertising was let under the other provisions of the act, which, being inconsistent with the section of the Political Code referred to, and later in date, worked its repeal. It was within the power of the legislature to require the supervisors to annually fix the price of certain county supplies and all county advertising, and to allow each officer requiring any advertising or such supplies to procure the same at the prices so fixed, and certify the bill to the board. These provisions of the law are clearly separable from the part claimed to be unconstitutional, and may stand although that part be set aside. After failing to procure the advertising by any of the older established newspapers the supervisors let the printing to the Mother Lode newspaper, in disregard of the requirement above referred to. We are to determine whether the bill for this work is illegal. An act of the legislature is not to be set aside upon any doubtful or uncertain construction to be given the Constitution. But, where its infraction is clear and unmistakable, the duty of the court is plain, and should be fearlessly performed. That the part of the act now drawn in question is violative of the organic law of the state we think can admit of no doubt. It declares that county officers shall not supply the county requirements except through persons who have had established places of business in the county for a fixed period of time. No reason can be suggested why this period of time was not made longer or shorter, and the power which could fix it at one year could name any other period not absurdly or unreasonably long or short. The act manifestly was intended to limit all job printing and advertising and purchases of blank books to persons who had established places of business in the county to the exclusion of all others. Not only must the purchases be made from, and the advertising be done by, persons having established places of business in the county, but such places of business must have been established for one year prior to the time when the prices are fixed by the supervisors. The unfortunate merchant or newspaper proprietor who engages in business in the county the day after the supervisors fix the prices to be paid for supplies or for printing is precluded for one year from competing for the county's patronage. He must contribute to the county's support by paying taxes, and he must perform whatever duties the law devolves upon him as a citizen of the county, but he may not share in the privilege of dealing with the county officers in respect of county supplies and printing—a privilege which the law accords to the more fortunate merchant or printer who happened to have started in the business one day sooner than he. We think the Constitution was intended to prohibit all such discriminatory legislation. If the legislature may restrict county officers in their purchases for the county to a class of dealers who have had an established business in the county for one year, it may restrict them to still other classes which the legislature may create. Such laws cannot be regarded as general laws, for the reason that they are not uniform in their operation.

Appellant contends that a newspaper which has not been established and published for one year does not stand upon the "same terms" in relation to the law as does the newspaper which has been published for one year; that the term "all citizens" does not necessarily include all persons, but only all citizens who stand in the same relation to the law. As illustrative of the principle relied on, we are cited to People ex rel. Smith v. Twelfth Dist. Judge, 17 Cal. 556; Re Madera Irrig. Dist. Bonds, 92 Cal. 309, 14 L. R. A. 755, 28 Pac. 272, 875; Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 136, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057; Fortain v. Smith, 114 Cal. 497, 46 Pac. 381. In speaking of laws of general nature which must have a uniform operation, the court said in Hellman v. Shoulters: "It has been uniformly held that a law is general which applies to all of a class,—the classification being a proper one,—and that the requirement of uniformity is satisfied if it applies to all of the class alike;" citing the case in 17 Cal. 556. But whether the classification in the present case is a proper one, is the very point involved. We do not think the legislature can arbitrarily create the class, and when thus created that the courts are in all such cases bound to accept such classification as a proper one.

It was said in Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 383, "that an act, to be general in its scope, need not include all classes of individuals in the state; it answers the constitutional requirement if it relates to, and operates uniformly upon, the whole of any single class." But this statement was commented upon in Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604, as erroneously supposed to support the proposition "that a law is not special if it applies equally to all members of any single class defined by the legislature, no matter how arbitrary and senseless the classification may be." And it was said that, "although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions, in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." All merchants and publishers of newspapers in a county stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law in furnishing supplies and doing the advertising for the county. But the act confers particular privileges upon certain merchants and publishers, and imposes peculiar disabilities and burdensome conditions on other merchants and publishers, all of whom stand in the same relation to the law. It was not within the power of the legislature to evade the operation of the constitutional provisions by creating an arbitrary and unnatural distinction between persons thus related to the law. If it were possible to classify merchants and publishers of newspapers in any case so as to apply one law to one class and another law to another class, it is certain that they cannot be classified upon any such line of demarkation as is attempted in this act. Fortain v. Smith, cited by appellant, involved the constitutionality of § 2853, Pol. Code, prohibiting the supervisors from authorizing the establishment of a toll bridge or ferry within 1 mile above or below a regularly established ferry or toll bridge. It was held that the section grants no privileges or immunities which "upon the same terms shall not be granted to all citizens." The court said: "The theory upon which such rights are granted is to promote the public good and convenience, the advancement of commerce, and the more ready intercourse of the people; and a reasonable protection of those who hazard their private means in thus ministering to the public need is in the interest and direction of good government by encouraging enterprise." No such theory or reason can be said to support the legislation in question. On the contrary, the law operates to prevent competition where the highest interests of the people require free and untrammelled business intercourse. It would puzzle the mind to suggest any natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction with which a newspaper that has been established thirteen months is clothed, or may be clothed, that a newspaper established eleven months may not possess. We can perceive no possible public good to come from the distinction made by the law before us, while it is easy to suggest much harm that it may do. All the older established newspapers in the county refused to do the work at the prices fixed by the board, which we must assume were fair and reasonable. It is now insisted that the county has no right under the law to have the printing done because the newspaper designated does not stand upon the same terms in relation to the law as the other newspapers. But the only reason why it does not stand upon the same terms results from no natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, but from an arbitrary and unreasonable distinction created by the law itself. It is one of the highest privileges of the citizen that he may engage in legitimate business upon equal terms—"the same terms"—granted to all citizens. He may buy and sell from whom and to whom he pleases. The law may require him to pay a license for the privilege, and it may regulate his business if the safety of the community requires its regulation. But the law cannot say that he must have conducted an established business for a given period of time before he can sell to a county officer while he may sell without restriction to all other persons. As well might the legislature say that the county shall not employ any citizen of the county to work on the public road unless he has resided within the county one or more years. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. *393.

The county of Lassen undertook by ordinance to require owners of sheep to pay a license on sheep grazed in that county on which the county and state taxes were paid in another county, but exempting from the license the owner who paid taxes on his sheep in Lassen county. This court held the ordinance to be in violation of § 21, art. 1, Const. Lassen County v. Cone, 72 Cal. 387, 14 Pac. 100. There was no question but that the county could pass a license ordinance applicable alike to all owners of sheep, and such an ordinance was upheld in Ex parte Mirunde, 73 Cal. 365, 14 Pac. 888; El Dorado County v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 268, 34 Pac. 716. But the Lassen county ordinance granted a privilege to the resident owner of sheep which it denied to the non-resident owner. It allowed the resident owner the privilege of grazing sheep in Lassen county free from any license tax, while imposing such tax on the nonresident owner, and it was thus held to have violated the Constitution. Nor does the fact that, in the present case the restriction was limited to dealings with the county officers relieve the act from its discriminating character. That plaintiff was permitted to publish advertisements for all persons save only the county officers, but emphasizes the obnoxious feature of the law. The judgment should be affirmed.

BODE & HASLETT, Appts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. Although the burden is upon a warehouseman to excuse failure to deliver spirits deposited with him for storage in accordance with the terms of the contract, yet, when he shows a return of the packages stored, and that the contents were lost by leakage, the owner must, in order to hold him liable for the loss, prove that the leakage was caused by his fault.

2. A notice printed plainly on the face of a warehouse receipt, to the effect that loss by leakage shall be at the risk of the owner of the goods, is a part of the contract.
3. A provision in a warehouse receipt, that loss by leakage shall be at the risk of the owner of the goods, exempts the warehouseman from the duty of watching the packages to detect leakage resulting from any cause other than improper handling or storage.
4. Improperly piling casks of spirits in a warehouse in double tiers, so as to prevent convenient inspection to discover leakage, will not render the warehouseman liable for leakage in the absence of any attempt at inspection on the part of the owner of the casks, where the storage contract places the duty of inspection on him.
5. A warehouseman to whom are delivered spirits in defective casks is under no obligation to exercise any care to discover and cure the defect or prevent loss by leakage, where by the storage contract the risk of loss by leakage is placed on the owner of the spirits.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for loss of spirits while in defendant's possession for storage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George T. Wright, for appellant:

The burden of proving the leakage to have been the result of defendant's negligence was upon plaintiffs.

It was the duty of plaintiffs to supply casks in every way good and sufficient to hold the spirits during the period for which they were to be stored, and no recovery can be had for loss occurring through defective coöperage.

Nelson v. Stevenson, 5 Duer, 539; Hudson v. Barendale, 2 Hurlst. & N. 575.

The receipt given by a warehouseman for goods stored with him is at once a receipt and a contract.

4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 521.

The receipt being a contract, then the provision therein that all leakage is to be at owner's risk must be binding upon the parties, unless it be such as the law prohibits and refuses to give any effect to as repugnant to sound policy and good morals.

A provision that all leakage shall be at owner's risk is not against sound policy or good morals.

Even a common carrier can stipulate, not only against his common-law liability as an insurer, but also against liability for any degree of negligence not gross or wilful.

If a common carrier can stipulate against liability for negligence, a warehouseman certainly can.

The strictness of the rule as to the liability of common carriers is dependent in a large measure upon the circumstance that a carrier has exclusive control of the freight, and the consequent impossibility in many cases of the consignor's being able to prove the method of loss.

Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing. 220.

These goods were piled in a manner customary with the warehouseman, and plaintiffs, being familiar with it and knowing that their goods were to be so piled, cannot be heard to complain of this method of storage.

If the plaintiffs proximately caused or contributed to the injury the defendant was not liable under the circumstances of this case unless he was guilty of wilful neglect of duty.

The burden of proof is on defendant to account for failure to deliver the full quantity stored. A bailee is as much bound to deliver the full quantity received as to deliver any; and if the loss is one which in the ordinary course would not happen but for want of proper care, it is incumbent on the bailee to prove that he took proper precautions. Failure to furnish such proof subjects him to the inference that the proper precautions were omitted.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is proprietor of a bonded warehouse in the city of San Francisco. On the 20th of January, 1896, it received from the plaintiffs, and stored in its warehouse, 64 barrels of spirits. About the 4th of March following, it discovered that some of the barrels were leaking, and immediately notified the plaintiffs, who, upon examination, found that 8 barrels showed excessive outage. One barrel was practically empty, three or four leaking badly, and the others to some extent. The total amount of loss over and above the ordinary allowance for evaporation was 181½ gallons, equal to 225½ proof gallons, of the value of $434.50. The plaintiffs sue to recover that amount, and charge by the first count of their complaint that the loss was due to leakage caused by the careless, negligent, and improper handling and storage of the barrels by the defendant. In a second count they simply allege a delivery of the 64 barrels to defendant on a contract of storage, and a failure and refusal of the defendant to redeliver on their demand 181½ gallons of the amount stored. The cause was tried by a jury upon evidence relating almost exclusively to the first count, and the instructions requested by the parties and given or refused by the court bore mainly upon the measure of defendant's responsibility for a loss caused by leakage from the barrels during the time they remained on storage. The jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

Some question is made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and with reference to this point there is a controversy as to the burden of proof; but as to this little need be said. We agree with respondents that in a case of this character proof of the deposit, and of failure of the bailee to redeliver in accordance with the terms of the contract, makes a prima facie case, and that the burden is upon the warehouseman to excuse the failure to redeliver; but we also agree with the appellant that when, as in this instance, he shows a return of the packages stored, and that the contents have been lost by leakage, the burden shifts to the plaintiffs to prove affirmatively that the leakage was caused by the fault of the bailee. This was the principle decided in Wilson v. Southern P. R. Co. 62 Cal. 164, and it is entirely reasonable and just. But even in this view there was evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict for plaintiffs if the instructions of the court correctly stated the law. Not that the defendant was shown to have stored or handled the casks improperly, which is one of the things that the plaintiffs undertook to prove, but only because there was a failure on the part of defendant, according to the rule laid down by the court, to make sufficiently frequent and careful inspection of the casks for the purpose of determining whether they were leaking. There was an effort to prove that the warehouse was improperly constructed, or badly arranged, so that the casks were exposed to drafts, the effect of north winds, etc., causing shrinkage of the staves. But upon this point we think there was a failure of proof, while on the other hand there was very strong evidence that the casks that leaked were faultily constructed; and, besides, the plaintiffs knew, or had the means of knowing, all about the arrangement and situation of the warehouse,—whether, and to what extent it was exposed to drafts or north winds, how casks were ordinarily piled and arranged on the floor, and in what position, with reference to the doors of the warehouse, these 64 casks were paced. It was shown, however, that the casks were piled in a double tier, chine to chine, and two tiers high, with no passageway between, so that one head of each cask was concealed from view as they lay, and so that they could leak at the covered ends without discovery. Under the instructions of the court the jury were at liberty to find that this was actionable negligence on the part of the defendant, and, in view of the extreme weakness of the evidence as to any other fault or negligence of the defendant, we are justified in assuming that the verdict was based wholly upon a finding of negligence in this particular, and, at all events, the verdict cannot be sustained if the jury was erroneously instructed to the prejudice of the defendant in respect to this matter.

Whether it was actionable negligence on the part of the defendant to fail to inspect the casks for the purpose of detecting leakage depends primarily upon the terms, express or implied, of the contract of storage, construed in the light of the circumstances of its execution. The only circumstances material to be considered in connection with the terms of the contract as contained in the warehouse receipt are that the plaintiffs had been storing spirits in the defendant's warehouse for several months before these 64 casks were stored in January, 1896; that the practice was to have the spirits shipped directly to the warehouse; that on the arrival of a car load the plaintiffs were notified, and sent their agent to inspect the goods, and especially to see that the cooperage was all right,—to see, in other words, that the casks were in a condition to be safely stored. Both parties were equally well informed as to the volatile nature of spirits, and the danger of loss from leakage and evaporation. On the arrival of these 64 casks at the warehouse, the plaintiffs were notified, and, in accordance with their usual practice, sent their agent to inspect the cooperage. Both he and the agents of defendant satisfied themselves that the barrels were in good condition, and fit to be stored, and thereupon the defendant issued its receipt in the following terms:

General Internal Revenue Bonded Warehouse, No. 1.
First District of California.
No. 121. Bode & Haslett, Proprietors.
N. E. Cor. Third and King Streets.

San Francisco, January 20, 1896.
Received on storage from Louis Taussig and C.

Distiller and Brand.	No. of Numbers.	Packages.
Amer. Dist. Co.	124901/904	64 sixty-four bbls. spirits.

Bode & Haslett.

Nonnegotiable.

Defts. Ex. 1.

This receipt is given in accordance with the California Warehouse Laws, as well as the laws of the United States. Loss or damage by fire, theft, shrinkage, leakage, or natural decay at owner's risk.

Parties are reminded that transfers of merchandise are not complete unless made on the books of the warehouse.

Counsel for the respective parties differ as to the effect of the notice printed on the face of this receipt that loss by leakage was at the owner's risk. Respondents claim: First, that the notice is no part of the contract; and, second, that, even if it is treated as a binding stipulation, it could not exempt the appellant from liability for loss by leakage which, as they contend, might have been discovered and prevented if the casks had been inspected from time to time, or if they had been piled in a single tier, leaving both ends exposed to view. Both of these propositions are controverted by the appellant, and upon their determination the case seems to depend. We think it clear that the notice is a part of the contract. It was printed plainly on the face of the receipt. The whole paper is extremely brief. It was the duty of respondents to take note of its contents if they had the opportunity, and their opportunity was ample. The presumption, therefore, is that they did read it. Against this presumption there is no evidence, and none, we think, would have been admissible to show that the respondents had failed to do what their duty required them to do. Assuming, then, that they read the receipt, and, whether they did or not, that they are chargeable with knowledge of its contents, they had fair warning that any loss by leakage was at their risk; or, in other words, that the appellant declined all responsibility for loss by leakage. Their acceptance of the receipt and storage of the goods with knowledge of this condition made it binding upon them as one of the terms of the contract. The cases cited by counsel in which it has been held that notices printed or stamped on bills of lading, but not signed by the consignors, do not exempt common carriers from their common-law liability, are not in point. They rest upon the peculiar nature of the public duties of common carriers and the public policy of preventing them from limiting their liability by mere notices not expressly assented to by the shippers. The principle of those decisions is very clearly stated by Mr. Justice Davis, delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Michigan C. R. Co. v. Mineral Springs Mfg. Co. 16 Wall., at page 328, 21 L. ed. 302. The case of warehousemen is entirely different. There is no public policy to be infringed by stipulations limiting their liability for loss or deterioration caused by the inherent qualities of the articles stored, or by defects in the vessels containing them. They are not bound to receive articles offered for storage, and may make such terms as they choose to impose as conditions of their contract. In this case we think that it was clearly one of the terms of appellant's contract that it should not be responsible for loss by leakage. This, of course, would not exempt it from liability for leakage due to its fault, but did exempt it from the duty of watching these casks to detect leakage caused by defects in the casks, or resulting from any cause other than improper handling or storage. If prudence required the casks to be watched or inspected from time to time to see whether they were leaking, that duty devolved upon the respondents, not upon the appellant. And there was nothing to prevent the respondents from making such inspection as often as they desired. The warehouse was open to them, but, so far as appears, they never sent any person to look after these goods until they were notified by appellant of the leakage discovered by those in charge of its warehouse. This, it seems to us, is an answer to their complaint as to the manner in which the casks were piled in a double, instead of a single, tier. There is no satisfactory evidence that such mode of piling was either unusual or improper; but, if we assume that it was improper for the reason that it prevented convenient inspection, in the absence of any attempt at inspection by respondent, upon whom the duty rested, the improper piling of the casks was of no consequence. If they had gone to the warehouse, and found themselves unable to make the necessary examination, they could have required the casks to be piled in a single tier, or they could have removed them. But sufficient has been said concerning the case presented by the evidence.

The vital question to be decided is whether the law was correctly given to the jury in the instructions of the court. Generally the instructions given were correct, but with regard to the duty of inspection for the discovery of leakage we think the rule stated by the court was incorrect. One of the instructions was as follows: "The owner of liquids shipped or stored in barrels of any description is charged with the duty of supplying proper packages, especially where the liquid is volatile, such as spirits; and hard to contain or confine in receptacles; and the warehouseman is not responsible for damages arising from any inherent defect in the barrels delivered to him for storage, nor is he responsible if the negligence of the owner occasioned or contributed to the loss. Therefore, if you shall find that the barrels from which the leakage of the spirits took place were of defective construction, and unsuited for storage of spirits, and that such defect occasioned or contributed to the loss of the spirits, then you will find for the defendant. If the plaintiffs were negligent originally, or the coeprage originally defective, and the leakage resulting was discovered by the defendant, or could, by ordinary care, then the defendant was bound to have been prevented or cured by defendant upon such discovery by the exercise of ordinary care, then the defendant was bound to use such ordinary care in the premises." By the latter part of this instruction the jury were plainly told that, even if the leakage was due to the original negligence of the plaintiffs in storing the spirits in leaky casks, the defendant was nevertheless liable for the loss, if, by the exercise of ordinary care, the defendant could have discovered and cured the defect, or prevented the loss. In another instruction, given at the request of plaintiffs, the jury were told "that, if you find from the evidence that the loss of the spirits for which the plaintiffs claim damages in this action was due to leakage or shrinkage while said spirits were in the defendant's custody as a warehouseman, and if you should further find that the defendant could have prevented said leakage or shrinkage by the exercise of ordinary care, and that the defendant failed to exercise such ordinary care in the premises, and that the plaintiffs were damaged thereby, your verdict should be for the plaintiffs for the amount of damage." And ordinary care was by another instruction defined to be that degree of care which a man of ordinary caution and prudence would manifest in looking to his own interests. In short, by the instructions given and refused the case was left to the jury to be decided upon the proposition that the defendant was responsible for the loss if it had not exercised the same care in watching and guarding against leakage as the owners of the property should themselves have exercised if the goods had been in their own store, and the defendant was allowed no advantage whatever from its stipulation against loss from leakage. This, we think, was error. In view of the contract, it was the duty of respondents, and not the duty of the appellant, to guard against latent defects in the casks, and against the effects of shrinkage. They knew, as well as the defendant, the danger of loss from these causes, and the means of guarding against it. The defendant had declined that risk, and it rested upon them to take the necessary precautions in view of the danger.

The judgment and order of the Superior Court are reversed.

We concur: Temple, J.; Harrison, J.

McFarland, J., concurring:

I concur in the judgment of reversal. I also concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice, except so far as it might be construed to intimate that the evidence showed any negligence whatever on the part of appellant. In my opinion, the respondents would not have been entitled to recover, under the contract and upon the evidence, if the instructions had been entirely free from error.

A municipal corporation may make the mere possession of a lottery ticket a misdemeanor, where by the Constitution it has power to make and enforce such police and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, and the suppression of lotteries is part of the public policy of the state as evidenced by its penal laws.

(September 6, 1901.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the discharge of petitioner from custody to which he had been committed for violation of an ordinance forbidding the possession of lottery tickets. Prisoner remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. N. S. Wirt for petitioner.

Mr. Charles L. Weller for respondent.

Mr. A. S. Newburgh, amicus curiæ.

Henshaw, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By ordinance No. 68 of the city and county of San Francisco, it is made "unlawful for any person to have in his possession any lottery ticket," etc., and upon conviction of a violation of the terms of the ordinance, the defendant may be punished by fine, imprisonment, or both. The petitioner here was convicted of a violation of this ordinance, and seeks his release under this writ, upon the asserted ground that the ordinance in question is unreasonable and void. The United States government refuses the use of its mails to advertising lotteries, transmission of lottery tickets, the announcement of the winning numbers in lotteries,—in short, to the sending of any literature in aid of such gambling schemes; and it makes penal the violation of its laws in any of these respects. The state of California by its penal laws prohibits the setting up of a lottery, and declares it to be a misdemeanor for any person to sell a lottery ticket. There are, then, against all gambling devices of this kind, not only the public policy of the general government and of this state, but also the express mandate of their criminal laws, so that the avowed policy and the expressed intent is to stamp out by penal legislation the traffic in lottery tickets. It is true that the state, while declaring it to be a penal offense to sell a lottery ticket, has not made the purchaser equally culpable. But no one will question the right of the state to declare, if it see fit so to do, that the purchaser of a lottery ticket, equally with the seller, is guilty of a misdemeanor. It may be concluded, therefore, that in a reasonable exercise of its police powers a municipality may pass any ordinance in furtherance of the avowed general policy of the national and state government. In this regard our cities and counties draw their power, not from legislative permission, but from the direct grant of the Constitution itself, which by article 11, § 11, empowers them to make and enforce within their limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.

The matter of this ordinance being, then, clearly one of police regulation, and the power to pass such ordinances being expressly conferred upon a municipality, there is left for consideration the question whether the exercise of that power in this instance be unreasonable or oppressive for the accomplishment of the end in view. Against its validity it is urged that it is unreasonable in making the mere possession, without reference to any ultimate intent of the possessor, an offense; and, as is usual when a law is attacked upon this ground, harrowing instances are cited, as of a blind man to whom might be given a lottery ticket, he not knowing it to be such, or of another into whose pocket might be thrust the damnatory paper, without knowledge upon his part that it was in his possession, and even—so run the argument and citations—the peace officer who arrests a violator of the law, and takes into his own custody the criminatory evidence, is, under the terms of this ordinance, equally guilty. But the answer to all this is the answer that has been made by every court as often as the argument has been pressed to consideration. The matter is discussed in Ex parte Lorenson, 128 Cal. 431, 50 L. R. A. 55, 61 Pac. 68, wherein is quoted the language of Mr. Justice Field in United States v. Kirby, 7 Wall. 482, 19 L. ed. 278, which may well be repeated here: "General terms should be so limited in their application as not to lead to injustice or oppression or an absurd consequence. It will always be presumed that the legislature intended exceptions to its language which would avoid results of this character. The reason of the law in such cases should prevail over its letter."

This kind of legislation is not new to jurisprudence, nor novel upon the statute books of this state; yet it has never been found necessary to overthrow a law otherwise valid because in some supposititious case a person might be charged with its violation who came within the letter, yet not within the spirit, of the enactment. An ordinance of this city and county, for example, prohibits the carrying of a concealed weapon. It is the mere carrying, under the letter of the law, which constitutes the offense, not a carrying with intent to commit some act of violence. Yet this court has found no difficulty in upholding the law. Ea parte Choney, 90 Cal. 617, 27 Pac. 436. The citizen who bought a pistol or knife at a gun store, caused it to be wrapped in a parcel, and proceeded to carry it to his home, might be said, under the letter of the law, to have committed a violation of it. Yet he has not violated the spirit of the law, and the law would hold him guiltless. The statute books of this and other states abound in provisions for the protection of fish and game, and among them is commonly found a law making it penal for one within certain designated months "to have in his possession" fish or game of prescribed kinds. In such laws it is not the purpose of the possession, but the fact of possession, which prima facie establishes the offense. And so, while in their construction of the game laws courts have differed as to their scope,—some holding that the defendant was exculpated if he showed that the game in his possession was killed without the boundaries of the state, others holding that it applied equally to game so destroyed,—in all cases there has been an agreement by the courts that the fact of possession prima facie evidenced a violation of the act. Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10, 19 Am. Rep. 140; State v. McGuire, 24 Or. 370, 21 L. R. A. 478, 33 Pac. 666; Com. v. Wilkinson, 139 Pa. 304, 21 Atl. 14; Ea parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402; State v. Judy, 7 Mo. App. 524;

Bellovs v. Elmendorf, 7 Lana. 462; People v. Fishbough, 134 N. Y. 393, 31 N. E. 983. The design of the ordinance is to stamp out lotteries and the traffic in lottery tickets. For, if there were no buyers of lottery tickets, there would be no sellers of them; and while, as has been said above, by the state law only the seller is made culpable, it is clearly within the power and province of the municipality, in its endeavor to eradicate the evil, to hold the purchaser or possessor also culpable.

In the case of Wong Hane [108 Cal. 680, 41 Pac. 693] the attention of the court was directed more particularly to the requirements of the ordinance which seemed to exact from the defendant proof of his innocence. If a variance shall be thought to exist between the views there expressed and those here announced, it need but be said that we are satisfied that the present views enunciate a sound principle of statutory construction.

For the reasons above given, the writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; McFarland, J.

Garoutte, J., concurring:

I concur in the judgment, but deem the language of Justice Field, cited in the main opinion, entirely too general to serve as authority in support of the conclusion here declared. Neither am I at all disposed to agree to the reasoning contained in the opinion of the court promulgated in Ea parte Lorenzen. At the same time I see no reason why the law-making power may not declare that the possession of a lottery ticket by a person shall constitute a misdemeanor. The statute clearly means a possession knowingly, and, so construed, there is no legal objection to its validity. Ford v. State, 85 Md. 465, 41 L. R. A. 551, 37 Atl. 172; Ea parte Mon Luck, 29 Or. 421, 32 L. R. A. 738, 44 Pac. 693.

(.....Conn.....)

1. Evidence of the use, by the wife of accused, of an endearing expression in regard to one whom her husband had killed for alleged criminal intimacy with her, uttered after she had left the scene of the murder, is not admissible in favor of accused, although she could not be compelled to become a witness in the case.

(September 27, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County convicting him of murder. Reversed.

Statement by Baldwin, J.:

The defendant upon the trial introduced evidence, mainly for himself as a witness in his own behalf, that on the day in question he discovered his wife in a piece of woods near his house, with a man, whom he did not recognize; that they were partially reclining on the ground, and that the man had his arms around her; that, thinking the man might be armed, he ran home, and got his rifle; that he returned, loading it as he ran, and found her in the man's arms, lying on her back, with her clothes up, and the man in a position justifying the belief that they were in the act of adultery; that he rushed upon them through the bushes, and in so doing the rifle was accidentally discharged, killing the man. The state claimed and offered evidence tending to prove that he had previously made statements materially different as to the circumstances of the homicide; that the man killed, George Goering, had been on friendly and familiar terms with Yanz, and was well acquainted with Mrs. Yanz; that he had occasionally called upon the defendant at his house; that on this occasion the defendant found him standing in the wood, in conversation with Mrs. Yanz, and, having got his rifle and loaded it, deliberately shot him as he (Goering) was walking away. Immediately after the homicide, Mrs. Yanz, who was greatly excited, was assisted into her house by a neighbor, Mrs. Week, who laid her upon the lounge. This question was put to Mrs. Week on the witness stand, as a witness for the defense: "At the time you took Mrs. Yanz in and placed her upon the lounge, did she say anything concerning George Goering?" Mr. Yanz was not then in the house. The defendant claimed that an answer would show that she used an endearing expression in regard to Goering. This question was excluded. The defendant, through his counsel, claimed that, if the jury should not believe his story that the shooting was accidental or involuntary, then, at the very most, he could only be convicted of manslaughter.

Messrs. William C. Case and Jacob P. Goodhart, for appellant:

The conversation that was offered and excluded occurred immediately after the shooting, and was in explanation of the acts of the parties, and characterizing them.

Norwalk ex rel. Fawcett v. Ireland, 68 Conn. 14, 35 Atl. 804; Stirling v. Buckingham, 46 Conn. 464.

What difference can it make whether the husband saw them in the act, or whether he saw them in such a position, and from the surrounding circumstances, that he believed they were committing the act of adultery, and the circumstances were such as to justify that belief? The injured husband's anger must necessarily be aroused to the same pitch, and the effect on his mind will be the same, for in all these cases he is suddenly brought face to face with the convincing evidence produced by his own eyes that his wife has been or is dishonoring him.

It is sufficient that the defendant is apprised of facts that justify him in the belief that his wife just has committed, or is just about to commit, or is committing, adultery with the deceased.

Mr. Alfred N. Wheeler, with Mr. William H. Williams, for appellee:

The court correctly charged as to the law of manslaughter.

Manslaughter is the unlawful killing of another without malice, express or implied. The difference, then, between murder and manslaughter, is that in murder there is present always what in law is known as malice aforethought, while in manslaughter there is no such malice.

1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 304.

Whether a homicide committed by a man smarting under the sense of dishonor is murder or manslaughter depends upon the question whether the killing was in the first transport of passion or not.

The killing of the adulterer deliberately and upon revenge is murder, and evidence of the adultery is only admissible when the time of the husband's discovery of it is brought so near to the homicide as not to allow space for cooling.

1 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 459.

If the husband is not actually witnessing the wife's adultery, but knows it is transpiring, and in an overpowering passion, no time for cooling having elapsed, he kills the wrongdoer, the offense is reduced to manslaughter.

2 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 708; 3 Russell, Crimes, International ed. pp. 49-54; 1 Archbold, Crim. Pr. & Pl. 8th ed. p. 700; Clark, Crim. Law, p. 165.

The sight by a husband of the act of adultery committed by his wife is provocation to him, on the part both of the wife and her paramour; and if he kills either or both he is guilty of manslaughter only. He must see the act, however, for knowledge of his wife's infidelity is not sufficient.

Clark, Crim. Law, pp. 169, 170, and notes; Pearson's Case, 2 Lewin, C. C. 216; State v. John, 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 330, 49 Am. Dec. 396; State v. Pratt, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 249; State v. Avery, 64 N. C. 608.

The claim that the accused shot the deceased because he observed him in adultery with his wife has no foundation in the evidence in the case, and only originates in the claims of his counsel.

Baldwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was no error in excluding the question put to Mrs. Week. It called for mere hearsay. The homicide had taken place, and Mrs. Yanz had left the scene of the transaction. Her declarations could not have served to characterize any contemporaneous act, and therefore could not be claimed as part of the res gestæ. That she could not be compelled herself to take the witness stand was no cause for their admission.

The trial court, in its charge to the jury, used this language: "If the accused saw his wife in any such situation as he has described, he had at least a legal right to interfere and separate them, and to carry with him a weapon for defense against any possible attack. And, further, if in pushing his way through the bushes, and under the excitement naturally and ordinarily to be expected under the circumstances, the rifle was accidentally discharged, and the man thus met his death, then the homicide was by misadventure, and the verdict should be 'Not guilty.'" "There is one kind of provocation, gentlemen, which is of such a grievous nature that the law concludes it cannot be borne in the first transport of passion. This is where or when a man finds another in the act of adultery with his wife; when, if he kills him in the first transport of passion thereby aroused, he is only guilty of manslaughter. The law does not hold him altogether guiltless of crime. To kill, even in the first transport of passion, when under that highest and strongest provocation, is in law criminal. It is manslaughter, the lowest form of criminal homicide; not murder. The adulterer, under our law, has a right to live; and the injured husband has no legal right to kill him, even in the first transport of passion aroused by finding him in the act. To have the effect of reducing the homicide from murder to manslaughter, the husband must find the adulterer in the act of adultery. The finding may be by any such observation of the circumstances and of the situation of the guilty parties as justifies the belief that adultery is being committed. Knowledge that the adultery is at the time being committed is sufficient; but if the husband, merely hearing that the adultery had already been accomplished, or merely observing the situation which leads to the belief that adultery has been accomplished, pursues and kills the offender, it will be murder. The witnessing of a passing fact is regarded as having a greater tendency to excite a transport of passion than the mere hearing or the mere belief that it has been accomplished. If, in fact, no adultery was going on, and the husband is mistaken as to the fact, though the circumstances were such as to justify a belief, even, of adultery, the offense would not be reduced to manslaughter. The husband must judge at his peril that the jury may find that he was mistaken, and so find him guilty of murder instead of manslaughter." There are inconsistent expressions in these instructions, but it is to be presumed that those used last were accepted by the jury as controlling, and they were the least favorable to the accused. In case, then, they believed so much of the defendant's testimony as described the circumstances in which he found his wife and Goering together, and the effect which they produced, and were reasonably calculated to produce, upon his mind, but disbelieved his statement that the gun was accidentally discharged, the charge gave them to understand that, if the act of adultery was not in fact committed, the killing was murder. The law justifies a jury in calling it manslaughter when, on finding his wife in the act of adultery, a man, in the first transport of passion, kills her paramour. This is because from a sudden act of this kind, committed under the natural excitement of feeling induced by so gross an outrage, malice, which is a necessary ingredient of the crime of murder, cannot fairly be implied. The excitement is the effect of a belief, from ocular evidence, of the actual commission of adultery. It is the belief, so reasonably formed, that excites the uncontrollable passion. Such a belief, though a mistaken one, is calculated to induce the same emotions as would be felt were the wrongful act in fact committed.

The crime of murder in the second degree, under our statute, rests upon implied malice. It is not sufficient to establish merely a criminal intent followed by a homicide. Malice is not to be implied if the fatal act were the sudden result of what the law deems either a sufficient provocation or an uncontrollable passion naturally excited by the circumstances of the occasion. State v. Johnson, 41 Conn. 584, 587, 588. The law deems a husband's passion, excited by surprising his wife in the act of adultery, so far uncontrollable, from the frailty of human nature, that, if he kill her paramour on the impulse of the moment, and no actual malice is disclosed, none ought to be implied. He is not justified; but he is not a murderer. The reason of this rule of law being the existence of an uncontrollable passion, naturally induced, it must logically follow that it suffices if such a passion has been naturally induced in the mind of the slayer by the sight of his wife in the embrace of the man whom he killed, and a reasonable belief of her guilt, formed under circumstances such as those to which the accused testified in the present case. If the jury believed this testimony, or so much of it as showed a state of facts which, in their opinion, justified and produced a reasonable belief on the part of the accused that adultery was being committed when the shot was fired, then, there having been no proof of actual malice, although they may also have believed that it was fired intentionally, the natural excitement of passion and want of premeditation make the offense manslaughter. Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75, 83. There is error.

The judgment is set aside, and a new trial is ordered.

Torrance and Hall, JJ., concur. Andrews, Ch. J., and Hamersley, J., dissent.

Hamersley, J., dissenting:

The particular passage of the charge claimed to be erroneous is this: "If in fact no adultery was going on, and the husband is mistaken as to the fact, though the circumstances were such as to justify a belief, even, of adultery, the offense would not be reduced to manslaughter." The statement is correct. The particular form of manslaughter the court was called upon to explain was this: An intentional killing in a transport of passion induced by an immediate wrong done to the killer by the person killed, which the law deems to be of such nature that the ordinary man is unable, under the first sting of its infliction, to control a natural impulse to punish the offender. Such an injury, if unprovoked, constitutes a provocation which may render the immediate killing of the offender, in the transport of sudden anger caused by the injury received, manslaughter, and not murder. It is a principle common to most systems of jurisprudence, arising from essential conditions of life, that the punishment for unjustifiable, intentional killing should be less severe when the fatal blow is impelled by a transient rage, reasonably induced by and immediately following a wrongful act done by the person killed to the slayer. Such wrongful act constitutes legal provocation, which demands the milder punishment; that is, under our law reduces murder to manslaughter. It should, however, be remembered that to call for the milder punishment the killing must be in fact the result of a sudden rage, difficult for the ordinary man to control, directly induced by a grievous injury. If in fact it is the result of the cruel spirit of revenge that must have life for a wrong, it is murder, no matter what the provocation may be. In drawing the line between the crimes of murder and manslaughter, the law repels the notion that killing in revenge can be less than murder. The cases in which particular facts have been held to show legal provocation point to a principle, common to all, by which each is determined, and suggests its foundation, namely, when the mind of the slayer is not possessed by that conscious cruelty indicated by voluntary killing, but by a sudden transient rage, being the natural product of an injury then done to him by the person killed, the offense may be manslaughter. Mere rage is insufficient. It must arise directly from an injury then received, which must be as real as that caused by a severe battery. Mere insult is insufficient in law to produce this rage, unless it involve some grievous injury; not a fanciful one, such as may result from mocking words or gestures, but a substantial injury, such as may be caused in some conditions of life by an unpunished personal affront, or such as may be suffered by a husband or father in the degradation of his wife or child. It is the combination of adequate insult and injury received, of sudden and uncontrollable transient rage thereby naturally produced, and of unlawful killing directly resulting from that rage, which marks such killing as manslaughter. The essence of the common law, as affecting the distinction between murder and manslaughter (excluding some arbitrary tests), is this: Murder implies the presence as dominating a voluntary act causing death of an inhuman or unnaturally cruel state of mind; manslaughter implies its absence. It is thus stated by Lord Holt in 1707: "He that doth a cruel act voluntarily doth it of malice prepensed." Reg. v. Mawgridge, 1 Kelyng, 119 et seq. Sir J. F. Stephen characterizes this definition of malice aforethought as correct and happy, and with the insertion of the words "or cruelly reckless" as solving nearly all questions as to the distinction between murder and manslaughter. 1 Stephen, History Crim. Law Eng. pp. 70, 73. Russell thus explains what may be involved in a cruel act: "Violent acts of resentment bearing no proportion to provocation or insult are barbarous, proceeding rather from brutal malignity than human frailty; and barbarity will often make malice." 1 Russell, Crimes. Intentional lawful killing is necessarily a cruel act, which implies murder; but when the person killed is himself the aggressor through giving a provocation adequate to produce a sudden anger and impulse to punish the wrong, sufficient to dominate the will of the killer, the inherent cruelty of the act is so far modified as to make the offense manslaughter. Provocation, therefore, is legally effective, because for the moment it prevents, subdues, or excludes from the mind of the criminal actor that unnatural cruelty which is the earmark of murder through the controlling presence of natural rage immediately induced by an adequate injury. The essential test of an adequate injury is its inherent and judicially known capacity, under existing social conditions, to cause such rage, as a rule, when inflicted on the ordinary man. The conditions to which this part of the charge applied were these: (1) An admittedly intentional, unlawful killing; (2) in a transport of rage; (3) induced by an injury and insult done to the defendant by adultery committed with his wife in his presence. To make the offense manslaughter, the injury must have been done. Intentional unlawful killing in a rage is murder, and not manslaughter. Anger thirsting for the blood of an enemy is in itself an earmark of murder, no less than revenge or brutal ferocity; but when it is provoked by the wrongful act of the person slain, who thus brings upon himself the fatal blow, given in the first outbreak of rage, caused by himself, the offense is manslaughter; not only because the voluntary act is, in a way, compelled by an ungovernable rage, but also because the victim is the aggressor; and his wrong, although it cannot justify, may modify, the nature of the homicide thus induced. The court therefore correctly told the jury that, to make the offense manslaughter, the injury claimed as a provocation must have in fact been done. Our law of homicide recognizes no provocation as legally competent to so modify the cruelty of intentional, unlawful killing as to reduce the offense to manslaughter, except the provocation involved in an actual and adequate injury and insult. A different rule of provocation applies when the killing is not intentional; as where it results from the use of force, not intended, and not naturally adapted, to cause death. But where the killing is both intentional and unlawful, the only legal provocation is that given by an actual injury and insult.

The decision of the majority of the court is based on the assertion that the intentional unlawful killing of an innocent person who has done the slayer no wrong may be manslaughter; or, in other words, an actual injury done to the slayer is not essential in order to reduce such killing from murder to manslaughter. I find no authority in our law for this assertion. During the three centuries in which the distinction between the crime of murder and that of manslaughter has been developed and established, there is, so far as I have been able to discover, no dictum, or jurist, or decision of court which has failed to recognize the necessity of an actual injury and insult given by the killed and suffered by the killer as necessary to the reduction of intentional unlawful killing from murder to manslaughter. It seems to me unquestionable that the decision involves a clean-cut and radical change of existing law. I think such a change would be unwise, and inconsistent with the considerations of public policy that underlie our law of homicide. It is, however, unnecessary to discuss the wisdom of the change, for it is one within the province of the legislature, and not of the court, to make. The only authority cited in the opinion of Judge Baldwin as supporting its position that a belief in an injury may be equivalent in effect in this case to an actual injury, is the case of Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75, 85. If the court may properly change the law heretofore clearly established so that an honest belief in an imaginary injury can make manslaughter of murder, then there is no need for the citation of authority. Its ipse dixit is sufficient. But as the law stands the case cited is wholly irrelevant. In Morris v. Platt the court was dealing with a homicide claimed to have been committed in the exercise of the right of self-defense, and correctly stated the law applicable to such a case, namely, killing in self-defense is not a crime. The right of self-defense includes the right of protection against a reasonably apprehended danger, otherwise the right of self-defense would in most cases be an impotent right. A well-grounded apprehension of danger, as well as a certainly existing danger, may justify a killing in self-defense. The lawfulness of the act is determined, not by the fact of an actually existing danger, but by the fact of an honest, reasonable, and well-grounded belief in its existence. In this case the court is dealing with an admittedly intentional and unlawful killing. The crime is murder unless the person so intentionally killed had himself given a provocation consisting in an actual grievous injury and insult. There is no analogy between the two cases. The principle governing the former case, that the right of self-defense justifies killing done to prevent a reasonably apprehended danger, is well settled. The principle governing this case, that intentional unlawful killing is murder unless provoked by an adequate injury and insult, is equally well settled. The argument of the opinion seems to be this: A reasonable belief in an existing danger may justify killing in self-defense, and in such case the reasonable belief is equivalent to the fact of existing danger; ergo, a reasonable belief in a nonexistent injury is equivalent to the actual injury essential to reduce the crime of intentional unlawful killing from murder to manslaughter. Such logic is not convincing. It is plain that, unless the alteration in the law announced in the majority opinion is justifiable, the error imputed to the charge cannot be sustained. That alteration provides that intentional, unlawful killing, done in anger reasonably aroused, may be manslaughter, although the killer has received no injury, and the person killed is innocent of any wrong. Such alteration seems to me plainly unjustifiable. If there is any mistake in the particular passage of the charge, it is the statement of a general rule not material in the state of evidence before the jury. The only question in respect to the alleged injury claimed as a provocation was the truth or falsity of the testimony describing the positions of the defendant's wife and the deceased just prior to the firing of the fatal shot. The defendant testified that he discovered his wife upon the ground, lying on her back, with her clothes up, and the man in the position detailed, and which the finding says justified the belief that they were engaged in the act of adultery. There was no qualifying evidence. If the testimony was credible, adultery had been committed, and the injury alleged had been given. There was, therefore, no occasion to state the rule of law applicable to a state of facts which might justify a reasonable belief that adultery had been committed, and also show that in fact it had not been. The court might properly have omitted reference to a rule not applicable to the state of fact as claimed; or, possibly, if the reference were made, might properly have added that, if the conduct of the deceased with the prisoner's wife did not satisfy the jury that adultery had been committed, yet the conduct detailed was in itself a grievous injury and insult and legal provocation. That such conduct is a legal provocation seems to me demonstrable, but such question is not now involved, and no claim in respect to it is made. If it were a mistake to state the rule of law governing a case where there was a reasonable belief in adultery which was in fact unfounded, the mistake was harmless, and would not be less harmless if the qualification suggested had been made. The record shows with certainty that the only question before the jury as to this part of the case was the credibility of the defendant's testimony as to the fact of adultery. If credible, adultery had been committed, and the offense was manslaughter. Upon this question the charge of the court is clear, full, and impartial. It could not have been misunderstood, and could not have been affected by the statement in the general definition of legal provocation as to the necessity of proving the fact of adultery. Neither court nor counsel contemplated the contingency of the jury finding as a fact the circumstances under which the parties were claimed to have been discovered, and also finding that no adultery had been committed. There was no such contingency. It involved an absurdity approaching grotesqueness, and yet a new trial cannot be lawfully granted without gravely assuming the probability of the verdict having been influenced by such an absurdity. A mistake, or even an error, in the passage of the charge objected to, would relate to a state of facts not before the jury, was rendered harmless by those portions of the charge directly dealing with the evidence, and could not have affected the conclusion of the jury. The defendant has had a fair trial. The charge of the court is correct in law, full and impartial in its review of the evidence and presentation of all claims made by the parties; and, even if the passage objected to might properly have been omitted or qualified, there is no ground for a new trial. State v. Griswold, 73 Conn. 95, 100, 46 Atl. 829. I think there is no error, and that a new trial should be denied.

(.....Idaho.....)

*A statute making it unlawful to herd or graze sheep within 2 miles of an inhabited dwelling, and making the owner of sheep so herded or grazed liable for damages to the injured party, is a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not unconstitutional.

(Stockslager, J., dissents.)

(June 21, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Blaine County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the statutory penalty for pasturing sheep within a certain distance of plaintiff's house. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Guy C. Barnum, for appellant:

The 2-mile limit mentioned in § 1210, Idaho Rev. Stat., does not apply to this case.

The language of said section is: "It is not lawful for any person owning or having charge of sheep to herd the same or permit them to be herded on the land or possessory claims of other persons, or to herd the same or permit them to graze within 2 miles of the dwelling house of the owner or owners of such possessory claim."

A claim is the possession of a settler upon the wild lands of the government of the United States,—the lands which such a settler holds possession of.

Bouvier, Law Dict.; McGinnis v. Friedman, 2 Idaho, 301, 17 Pac. 635.

Plaintiff's dwelling house is not that of an owner of a possessory claim.

Mr. L. L. Sullivan, for respondent:

Under the provisions of § 1210, it is made unlawful for any person owning or having charge of sheep to herd them or permit them to be herded on the land or possessory claims of other persons, and the latter part of said section is clearly intended to prevent the grazing or herding of sheep within 2 miles of the dwelling house of the owner of such land, whether he has the title in fee, or is in possession of such land under the public land laws of the United States.

A reasonable police regulation has been established for the protection of the rights of the farmers of the state, and for the preservation of the peace and good order of society.

Quarles, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced this action in the justice's court of Soldier precinct, in Blaine county, to recover damages from the defendant by reason of trespass committed by sheep belonging to and under the control of the defendant upon the premises, and within 2 miles of the same. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appealed to the district court; and upon a trial in the district court plaintiff recovered a verdict for $100 damages, upon which a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $100 and costs. Defendant then moved for a new trial, which being denied, he appealed from the order denying a new trial and from the judgment.

It appears from the record that the respondent owns the lands upon which he resides and which he farms in fee simple; that he has his said lands inclosed, and, at the date of the trespass complained of, had growing crops thereon, same being inclosed with barbed-wire fences; that the sheep of appellant were herded and grazed immediately around the residence and farm of the respondent, and trespassed within his inclosures; that a few of the sheep died,—some within the field of respondent, and some very near to his house,—and were permitted by appellant to there remain. The damage done to respondent was estimated at from $100 to $250 by the witnesses, including that within his inclosure, and that to the pasturage without, but within 2 miles of his dwelling. The evidence also shows that appellant had five bands of sheep—about 2,000 in each band—grazing within 2 miles of the dwelling of the respondent, and so destroyed the pasturage that cattle and horses could not exist there; that cows will not graze where sheep have been grazed the same season. The respondent expostulated with appellant about the latter grazing his bands of sheep about and around his dwelling; whereupon appellant said to respondent, in substance, that “when he was in the cattle business the sheep men ran sheep in on his range and destroyed the range, and he had to go out of the cattle business, and now he was in the sheep business, and he didn’t know any way for us to do but to take our medicine.” It appears that the jury took into consideration both the damages that respondent sustained by reason of the sheep trespassing within his fields and those sustained by him by reason of the sheep being grazed within 2 miles of his dwelling.

Sections 1210–1212, Idaho Rev. Stat. are as follows:

“Sec. 1210. It is not lawful for any person owning or having charge of sheep to herd the same, or permit them to be herded on the land or possessory claims of other persons, or to herd the same or permit them to graze within 2 miles of the dwelling house of the owner or owners of such possessory claims.

“Sec. 1211. The owner or the agents of such owner of sheep violating the provisions of the last section, on complaint of the party or parties injured before any justice of the peace for the precinct where either of the interested parties may reside, is liable to the party injured for all damages sustained; and if the trespass be repeated, is liable to the party injured for the second and every subsequent offense in double the amount of damages sustained.

“Sec. 1212. When the owner or the agent of such owner of sheep found trespassing upon the land or possessory claims of another, or within 2 miles of the dwelling house of the claimant or occupant of such possessory claim, is unknown to the party injured by such trespass, all sheep so trespassing may be treated as estrays.”

It is contended by appellant that these statutes are unconstitutional and void. Appellant also contends that, if these sections are held valid, they do not apply to this case, for the reason that the respondent owned the land upon which his dwelling was situated, and the same was not upon a possessory claim. The latter contention is not tenable, as the legislature evidently intended to protect settlers from the injury and annoyance of having sheep herded and grazed around their habitations, whether they possessed the same absolutely and had title thereto, or held only by mere naked possession. The other contention raises the serious question in the case. As we view it, this is purely a question of police power. The police power of the state is very great. Under it many things may be done which at first glance seem to infringe upon natural and civil rights. The protection of health, prevention and suppression of nuisances, controlling the conduct of business which affects others not engaged in the same, the preservation of the public peace, and protection of the public welfare are legitimate subjects calling for the exercise of the police power of the state. Judge Cooley, in his work upon Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed., at page 704, says: “The police of a state, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its whole system of internal regulation, by which the state seeks, not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offenses against the state, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of the rights of others.” The same author, at page 705, quotes from Chief Justice Shaw, in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, with approval, this language: “We think it is a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. . . . Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient.” At page 743 the said author says: “The most proper business may be regulated to prevent its becoming offensive to the public sense of decency, or for any other reason injurious or dangerous.” In his work upon State and Federal Control of Persons and Property, Mr. Tiedeman, at page 838, says: “In every state the keeping of live stock is under police regulation. . . . The clash of interest between stock raising and farming calls for the interference of the state by the institution of police regulations; and whether the regulations shall subordinate the stock-raising interest to that of farming, or vice versa, in the case of an irreconcilable difference, as is the case with respect to the going at large of cattle, is a matter for the legislative discretion, and is not a judicial question. In the exercise of this general power of control over the keeping of live stock, the state or municipal corporation may prohibit altogether the running at large of such animals, and compel the owners to keep them within their own inclosures." Inasmuch as the legislature may prohibit the running at large of live stock, we see no reason why it should be held that it may not prohibit the running at large altogether of certain live stock, nor why certain live stock (for instance, sheep) should not be forbidden to be herded within 2 miles of the dwelling of a settler. We have statutes which, in effect, prohibit hogs from running at large. See §§ 1340 to 1344, inclusive, Rev. Stat. wherein it is provided that the owner or occupant of premises need not fence against hogs; that the owner of hogs that trespass upon the inclosure of others is liable for damages; for the impounding of trespassing hogs, etc. These statutes, like those in question here, were enacted to protect the farmers from annoyance and injury caused by the trespassing of hogs, and to save them expense in fencing against hogs. It is a matter of common knowledge and experience that a fence will keep out cattle and horses that will not sheep or hogs. It is evident that in passing the statutes cited, relative to the running at large of hogs, and the herding and grazing of sheep within 2 miles of dwelling houses, the legislature intended to further the public good and preserve the peace, by preventing those conflicts which would naturally result from the herding of sheep about the dwellings of settlers. The statutes were intended to promote the public good and avoid danger and injury to the citizen. They were also evidently intended to protect the health of the settlers, and as those questions are of legislative discretion, and not judicial, we are not authorized to hold the statutes unconstitutional.

It is contended by the appellant that every citizen has the right to pasture the public domain, and that, if the statutes in question are held valid, it amounts to taking property without due process of law. There is nothing in this contention. We know of no statute enacted by Congress which grants the citizen the right of pasturage upon the public domain, and counsel for appellant cites no such statute. Citizens graze their stock upon the public domain by sufferance of the general government, and not by virtue of any vested right. When Idaho was admitted into the Union of states, she was not fettered or restricted in the exercise of the police power that attaches to statehood by any provision in the admission act, and it cannot be reasonably contended that, because lands are situated within her borders that belong to the general government, and which private parties are permitted, by sufferance, to pasture, she is limited in the exercise of what would otherwise be legitimate police power. It follows from what has been said that the statutes in question are valid.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the order denying a new trial and the judgment are affirmed, with costs of appeal to the respondent.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

INDIANAPOLIS UNION RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

John J. HOULIHAN.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The appellate court is not precluded from considering the correctness of the overruling of a demurrer to an amended complaint by the fact that the original and amended complaints as they appear in the transcript are alike, on the theory that the original complaint was erroneously copied where the amended one should appear, where the clerk has certified that the amended complaint was correctly copied, and his duty required the copying of only that paper.
2. That an injury was caused, by the negligent use of an engine by a servant in charge thereof, to another servant of the same corporation, both being at the time in the line of duty as employees, is sufficient to render the employer liable under a statute imposing liability where injury is caused by the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation who has been given charge of any engine, or where such injury is caused by the negligence of any servant acting in the place of the corporation in that behalf, and the person injured is obeying at the time of such injury the order of some superior having authority to direct, without showing that the negligent servant represented the employer, or that the injured one was obeying the order of a superior.

3. A statute making railroad companies liable to all employees for injuries caused by negligence of any of their servants in charge of any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, round house, locomotive engine, or train, is not unconstitutional as unequal, but is sustainable as an exercise of the police power for the protection of persons

4. One in charge of a locomotive engine is negligent in running it at 20 miles an hour, without warning, past a place where he knows it is the duty of an employee to cross the track to receive the report of a train then passing, and whose view along the track is obstructed by posts and weeds.
5. Where a railway company is by statute made liable for the negligence of its engineer, an averment that its negligence was the cause of an injury will include the negligence of the engineer.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Boone County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was responsible. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. S. M. Ralston, C. M. Zlom, and Baker & Daniels, for appellant:

If the amended complaint is construed as counting upon a common-law liability, it is bad, because:

1. The alleged defects in the defendant's railroad track, as respects obstructions to view, etc., along the side of the track, were open to view and necessarily known to the plaintiff.

Hattaway v. Atlanta Steel & Tin-Plate Co. 155 Ind. 507, 58 N. E. 718; Wabash R. Co. v. Ray, 152 Ind. 392, 51 N. E. 920; Griffin v. Ohio & M. R. Co. 124 Ind. 326, 24 N. E. 838; Swanson v. Lafayette, 134 Ind. 625, 33 N. E. 1033; Big Creek Stone Co. v. Wolf, 138 Ind. 496, 38 N. E. 52.

2. Any negligence of the defendant's engineer, if such be averred, was the negligence of a fellow servant.

New Pittsburgh Coal & Coke Co. v. Peterson, 136 Ind. 398, 35 N. E. 7; Robertson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 146 Ind. 486; 45 N. E. 655; Hodges v. Standard Wheel Co. 152 Ind. 680, 62 N. E. 391, 54 N. E. 383; Thompson v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 152 Ind. 461, 53 N. E. 462; Orgeon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. v. Frost, 21 C. C. A. 186, 44 U. S. App. 606, 74 Fed. 965; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 13 C. C. A. 233, 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. 952; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Clark, 6 C. C. A. 281, 16 U. S. App. 17, 57 Fed. 125.

If the amended complaint is construed as counting upon a liability under the so-called employers' liability act (3 Burns's Rev. Stat. § 7083) it is bad upon demurrer, because:

1. The only negligence averred against the defendant is the negligence in furnishing "defective ways," and the common-law rule that the servant assumes obvious risks is 54 L. R. A.

equally applicable to a case brought under the provisions of the employers' liability act touching defective ways.

Thomas v. Quartermaine, L. R. 18 Q. B. Div. 685; Osborne v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 220; Cunningham v. Lynn & B. Street R. Co. 170 Mass. 298, 49 N. E. 440; *Donahue v. A. 457, 13 So. 8; Bridges v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. 109 Ala. 287, 19 So. 495.

The "defective ways" mentioned in the amended complaint made a danger that "was easily apparent, immediately present, and stood out so prominently as to press observation upon the servant of ordinary intelligence, and made such danger a risk of his employment which plaintiff assumed."

2. The specific and particular acts of the defendant's engineer, characterized in the pleading as negligent (in order to bring the case within the provisions of the 4th clause of said § 7083, Burns's Rev. Stat.), are not in law negligent, and were not in fact the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

3. Because it is necessary, under the 4th clause of § 7083, Burns's Rev. Stat. that a complaint shall contain an allegation which is wanting in the amended complaint here, namely, that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was "obeying or conforming to the order of some superior, at the time of such injury, having authority to direct."

The statute should be interpreted so that it shall stand, if possible. It is possible to so interpret it if the persons in whose favor it was enacted are persons that are subjected to the unusual dangers of railroad operation, namely, all railroad employees who, in the doing of their work, do not control their own actions, but act in conformity with the order of some superior employee who has authority to direct.

Standard Oil Co.* 153 Ind. 513, 55 N. E. 440.

There is no averment in the complaint that authorizes the inference that plaintiff was acting in an emergency.

It was possible for him, even within the 6 feet between the target pole and the track, to so use his eyes and at the same time so control his body as not to give up his place of safety, and yet ascertain that the engine was coming. His failure so to do was negligence which contributed to his injury.

E. 462; Whitcomb v. Standard Oil Co. 153 Ind. 513, 55 N. E. 440.

The plaintiff testified, in effect, that he did not see the engine until just at the instant he was struck; that when he stood south of the target pole he could see an object upon the Belt track 10 or 15 feet; that as he stepped toward the track he was watching for whatever might be there, aiming to see that he was clear in crossing the track. Taken together, these facts are conclusive proof that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Messrs. A. J. Shelby and T. J. Terhune, with Messrs. Addison O. Harris and Wymond J. Beckett, for appellee:

The consideration stated in the writing consists of two elements: (1) a cash payment of $25; (2) an agreement to pay "all fees and charges payable to physicians and St. Vincent's Hospital for services and care rendered to said Houlihan on account of said injuries."

The cash payment of $25 is not contractual; the writing contains no agreement or promise to pay the same.

The mere agreement to pay a sum in cash, without conditions, is never contractual; it is a mere inattentive recital. Money, being the common medium of exchange does not evidence contractual intention.

Under the circumstances and conditions under which the services were rendered to the appellant for which said fees and charges were made the appellant was bound to pay these fees and charges, or at least appellee was not.

Appellant's agreement to pay these fees and charges was an agreement to pay its own debt, which would be no consideration for the release.

If we concede that the fees and charges constitute a debt, and that they constituted Houlihan's debt, then the appellant's agreement to pay these fees and charges would be a promise to pay the debt of another, and, as the writing was not signed by the appellant, would be unenforceable and void under the statute of frauds.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Judgment for appellee for $15,000 on account of personal injuries. Appellant assigns that the court erred in overruling (1) its demurrer to the amended complaint, (2) its motion for judgment on the jury's answers to interrogatories notwithstanding the general verdict, and (3) its motion for a new trial.

1. The amended complaint alleges that appellant operates a railway in and about Indianapolis known as the "Belt Line;" that outside of the city, near the stock yards, the Belt Line crosses the Vandalia Railroad at right angles; that the Belt Line runs north and south, and the stock yards are south of the crossing; that each line has two tracks at the crossing, which are parallel and about 6 feet apart; that on August 8, 1895, appellee was employed by appellant as a telegraph operator at the crossing, and it was his duty to keep an account and take a report of all the cars of other railways that passed in and out at the crossing over appellant's line, and report the same to appellant, and set the targets at the crossing, and appellee had no other duties; that trains coming south into the stock yards ran on the west track of the appellant's line, and trains passing north out of the stockyards ran on the east track; that it was appellee's duty to go from the telegraph office, which was located in the northwest angle of the crossing, and about 3 feet from the west track, over the west track, to receive reports from the outgoing trains on the east track; that some one in charge of the outgoing train would hand the appellee a report of such train while it was in motion, passing north over the crossing; that there was no other way by which appellee could receive such reports, and this fact was well known to appellant and its engineer in charge of the locomotive engine hereinafter mentioned; that on August 8, 1895, appellee was in the discharge of his duties at the crossing; that, without any negligence on his part, he stepped out of the telegraph office, and was in the act of stepping onto and across the west track in order to receive a report from an outbound train which was then passing north on the east track, as was his duty to do; that appellee did not know of the approach of an engine on the west track; that he could not see the engine as it approached the crossing, by reason of posts and high weeds between the telegraph office and the west track, which appellant had negligently permitted to be and grow upon its right of way, completely obstructing appellee's view of the north; that he could not hear the engine approaching the crossing, by reason of the noise of the outbound train; that appellee was in the act of stepping on the west edge of the west track, without any negligence on his part, when an engine owned by appellant, and in charge of appellant's engineer, was negligently run by the engineer against appellee without fault on his part, inflicting permanent injuries; that the engineer negligently failed to stop the engine while approaching the crossing from the north, and negligently failed to give any signal of the engine's approach, although he knew that there was an outbound train running north on the east track over the crossing, and that appellee would be compelled to cross the west track in discharge of his duty to get the report, but negligently ran the engine at the high and dangerous speed of 20 miles an hour towards and over the crossing, negligently striking appellee as aforesaid and inflicting the injuries as aforesaid, all without fault or negligence of appellee, but by reason of all of appellant's negligence as herein alleged, from which injuries, etc. Wherefore, etc.

Appellee insists that the ruling on the demurrer to this amended complaint cannot be considered, because the transcript contains a copy of the original complaint, which is found to be, word for word, the same as the amended complaint. The argument from this state of the record is that the clerk has erroneously copied the original complaint into the transcript where the amended complaint should have been inserted. But the clerk certifies that the paper copied into the record as the amended complaint is the amended complaint. The presumption is that the clerk has properly performed his official duty. It was his duty to embody the amended complaint in the transcript, and to omit the original complaint. (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 650; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 650; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 662). Matter that should have been omitted will not be held to discredit the clerk's certificate of the correctness of the matter which it was his duty to include. The case of Ellis v. Indianapolis, 148 Ind. 70, 47 N. E. 218, is not in point.

Appellant contends that the amended complaint is bad at common law, because the facts show that appellee assumed the risks arising from the obstructions to his view and from the negligence of the engineer, who was a fellow servant. Since appellee does not attempt to controvert this contention, it will be passed without consideration, and the sufficiency of the complaint will be determined alone from the employers' liability act (Acts 1893, p. 294; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 7083-7087; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, §§ 5206a-5206c). The 1st section of the act provides "that every railroad . . . corporation . . . shall be liable in damages for personal injury suffered by an employee while in its service, the employee so injured being in the exercise of due care and diligence, in the following cases: . . . Fourth. Where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation who has charge of any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, round house, locomotive engine or train upon a railway, or where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person, coemployee or fellow servant engaged in the same common service in any of the several departments of the service of any such corporation, the said person, coemployee or fellow servant at the time acting in the place and performing the duty of the corporation in that behalf, and the person so injured obeying or conforming to the order of some superior at the time of such injury having authority to direct." The amended complaint does not aver that appellee was "obeying or conforming to the order of some superior at the time of such injury having authority to direct," and appellant claims that this omission leaves the pleading fatally deficient. The 4th subdivision of the 1st section of the act is divisible into two parts. A railroad company is liable for damages for personal injury suffered by an employee while in its service (that is, while acting within the scope of his employment), the employee being free from contributory negligence, (1) "where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation [that is, acting within the scope of his employment] who has charge of any . . . locomotive engine or train upon a railway," or (2) "where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person, co-employee or fellow servant . . . the said person, coemployee or fellow servant at the time acting in the place and performing the duty of the corporation in that behalf, and the person so injured obeying or conforming to the order of some superior at the time of such injury having authority to direct." From the words used, and the structure and scope of the act, we are of opinion that the concluding clauses of the 4th subdivision limit and qualify only the liability expressed in the second part of the 4th subdivision, and that railroad companies are answerable for the negligence of their servants in charge of signals, telegraph offices, switch yards, shops, round houses, locomotive engines, and trains upon their railways, to their employees the same as to strangers. This was the effect given to the 4th subdivision in the case of Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Little, 149 Ind. 167, 48 N. E. 862, and in Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Peterson, 156 Ind. 364, 59 N. E. 1044. In Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Montgomery, 152 Ind. 1, 49 N. E. 582, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff was a freight brakeman in the defendant's service, and that he was injured through the negligence of the defendant's engineer. The sufficiency of the complaint to exempt the plaintiff from the operation of the common-law rule as to fellow servants, and to state a cause of action under the 4th subdivision of the employers' liability act, was challenged on the ground that there was no allegation that the engineer was performing the duty of the corporation in that behalf, and that the plaintiff was obeying or conforming to the order of some superior having authority to direct. The opinion was written by a member of the court who did not agree with the majority in their construction of the 4th subdivision, and there may be difficulty at some points in distinguishing between what he said for himself and what for the court; but we are of opinion that the decision of the court on this point was wholly expressed in the words "the holding of the court is that in order to make the complaint good under the first part of the subdivision quoted [the 4th subdivision], as to the point in question, it 54 L. R. A.

is only required that it state that the engineer, while in the service of the appellant, in charge of a locomotive engine, negligently injured the appellee, both being at the time in the line of duty as employees of appellant," and that that holding is not departed from in the present case.

Appellant contends, however, that the construction which limits the operation of the qualifying clauses in the second part of the 4th subdivision to the liability expressed in that part of the subdivision, and which holds railroad companies liable to their employees, the same as to strangers, for the negligence of their servants in charge of signals, and so forth, brings the first part of the fourth subdivision into conflict with the equality clauses of the Federal and state Constitutions. The argument, briefly, is this: At common law every employer is protected by the doctrine that every employee assumes, as an incident of his employment, the risk arising from the negligence of his fellow servants. There is no justification of the withdrawal of railroad companies from the general class of employers, except the exercise of the police power for the protection of employees. The only reasonable basis for a classification in the exercise of the police power is the protection of employees who are subject to unusual dangers. A classification that selects for protection only those employees who are subject to unusual dangers by reason of acting in obedience to the orders of some superior having authority to direct is constitutional; but a classification that selects for protection all employees, without regard to the dangers naturally incident to their work, and whether they act on their own initiative, or in obedience to the order of some superior who had authority to direct (as the attorney of the railroad company and its downtown ticket seller, for example), is a classification in name only, is arbitrary, has no relation to the object to be accomplished, discriminates against railroad companies by subjecting them to liability for injuries to a class of employees with respect to whom employers in other businesses are not made liable by the act, and is therefore unconstitutional. Our answer is: It is competent for the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to take steps for the protection of the lives and limbs of all persons who may be exposed to dangerous agencies in the hands of others. The powerful forces in railroading that are under the direction and control of those in charge of "any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, round house, locomotive engine or train upon a railway" were proper to be selected as sources of unusual danger which should be guarded against. The object to be accomplished was to incite railroad companies to use the utmost diligence in the selection and supervision of their servants who are put in charge of these dangerous agencies, so that fewer lives and limbs of those who are entitled to claim the protection of our laws would be sacrificed. The legislature evidently considered that strangers and employees (the attorney and the ticket seller, for example) who were not fellow servants of those in charge of the agencies named were sufficiently protected by the railroad companies' existing liability to them for the negligent operation of those dangerous agencies. The legislature evidently determined to protect all persons who were not already protected from the negligent use of particular instruments. The classification is made on the basis of the peculiar hazards in railroading, relates directly to the object to be accomplished, and applies equally to all employers within the class. To separate railroading from other businesses was not an unconstitutional discrimination, because the dangers (the basis of the classification) do not arise from the same sources; but the claim that a classification not made on the basis of the dangerous agencies employed in the business, but founded on the question whether the employee who was injured without his fault by a fellow servant's negligent use of a dangerous agency was acting at the time on his own initiative in the line of his duty, or under the orders of a superior, is the only constitutional classification, is unwarranted. A train is wrecked through the negligence of the engineer. Two brakemen are injured without fault on their part; one acting at the time in obedience to the conductor's orders; the other acting on his own initiative, within the line of his duty. There should be and there is no constitutional limitation upon the legislature's exercise of the police power by which a law may not be enacted to protect both brakemen equally from the negligence of the engineer. We hold, therefore, that the act is not obnoxious to the objections urged by appellant. Under the employers' liability acts in other states,—Alabama, Colorado, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts,—the argument of appellant in reference to the interpretation of the 4th subdivision of § 1 of our statute could not have been advanced; for the corresponding subdivision of their statutes is limited to creating a liability for the negligence of those in charge of signals, engines, etc., in favor of coemployees. And such legislation has been upheld by the state and Federal courts. Reno, Employers' Liability Acts, §§ 84, 85; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1101.

It is asserted by appellant that the amended complaint does not charge actionable negligence. The situation was this: Appellee could not hear the engine approaching from the north, on account of the noise of the freight train passing over the crossing from the south. His view to the north was obstructed so that he could not see the approaching engine until he came to the west rail of the west track. It was his duty to cross the west track to get the report from the conductor of the train on the east track. That train was then passing the crossing, and the time had arrived when it was necessary for appellee to cross the west track to get the report. The engineer on the west track knew that it was appellee's duty to get the report. The obstructions between appellee and the approaching engine, and also the train on the east track, and its position with reference to the crossing, were within the view of the engineer. He gave no signal by bell or whistle of his approach, did not stop or check the speed of his engine, but ran it at 20 miles an hour (about 30 feet a second) upon appellee as he was in the act of stepping on the west edge of the west track. Conceding that the engineer's statutory duties to sound the whistle and ring the bell on approaching a highway crossing, and to stop his engine before crossing an intersecting railroad, do not apply in this case, it does not follow that the engineer owed no duty to appellee. It was his duty to exercise that diligence for appellee's safety which a man of ordinary prudence would have exercised under like circumstances. Ordinary prudence, not to say common humanity, should have restrained the engineer from hurling a missile of many tons weight at a speed of 30 feet a second at a point where he knew his fellow man was about to step in discharge of his duty, without any warning (which the engineer might have given) until it was too late to escape the danger. Appellant suggests that the amended complaint does not show that the negligence charged was the proximate cause of appellee's injury. The averment is that the injuries were inflicted "all without fault or negligence of appellee, but by reason of all of appellant's negligence as herein alleged." Counsel draw a distinction between "appellant's negligence" and the "engineer's negligence." The complaint, they say, charges negligence of appellant in permitting obstructions to view, but that could not be the proximate cause, because the risk from that source was apparent to appellee, and assumed by him. The engineer's negligence, if any, they say, is not alleged to be the proximate cause. But a corporation can only act through agents. Under the employers' liability act, a corporation is made answerable for the negligence of an engineer the same as for that of a road master. The engineer's negligence is therefore included in the averment that the injury was due to "all of appellant's negligence as herein alleged." Appellant has shown no error in the ruling on the demurrer.

2. Under the assignment that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion for judgment on the jury's answers to interrogatories, the first question raised is as to the necessity for appellant's acting at the time of his injury in conformity to the orders of some superior who was present and directing his movements. The answers to interrogatories disclose that appellee was acting upon his own initiative. It was not necessary for appellee to prove that any superior was present and ordering his action. The jury answered that the target pole was 6 feet 2 inches west of the west rail of the west track, and that a person standing against the east side of the target pole could see an engine coming from the north on the west track when it got within about 20 feet. Appellant contends that these answers overbear the general verdict that the appellee was free from fault. The jury do not find that appellee occupied the position named when the engine was 20 feet or less away. If he was at that point, and the engine was more than 20 feet distant, he could have seen it. Standing at the east side of the target pole, his body may have taken up a foot or more of the 6-foot space between the pole and the track. The pilot beam of the engine may have projected 18 inches or 2 feet over the rail. There may have been less than 3 feet between appellee and the line of danger. He may have listened attentively, and heard nothing of the approaching engine, on account of the noise made by the freight train. He may have looked attentively, and found no engine in sight on the west track. He may have taken one step, and been unable to check himself and retreat in the two thirds of a second which the engine took to cover 20 feet. There is nothing in the answers to the interrogatories to negative these conjectures, which may have been the evidence. On the other hand, the jury were asked, "Could the plaintiff, just before he was injured, as he approached the track where he was injured, have seen the engine which injured him in time to have avoided it, if he had looked vigilantly to the north?" And they answered, "No." Appellant's motion for judgment was properly overruled.

3. Among the grounds for a new trial, it is claimed that the court erred in permitting appellee to contradict the terms of a written contract by parol evidence. Appellee claims that the evidence is not in the record. The case was tried in 1898, and the sufficiency of the bill is therefore to be determined by the act of 1897. The same objections are made to the bill that were considered and held unavailing in Diesi v. G. H. Hammond Co. 156 Ind. 583, 60 N. E. 353. Appellant pleaded a release, and appellee replied that he executed the release without consideration. Appellant proved the execution of the following instrument:

The Indianapolis Union Railway Company.

To John J. Houlihan, Dr.:

To amount in compromise of claim for injuries received by him on August 8, 1895, at the Vandalia crossing of the Belt Railroad by his being struck by an engine of said company on said Belt Railroad while he was attempting to cross the track in the discharge of his duties as a telegraph operator in the employ of said company; said amount being in addition to all fees and charges payable to physicians and St. Vincent's Hospital for services and care rendered to said Houlihan on account of such injuries, which amount of fees and charges said company, as a part of said compromise, agrees to pay; and in consideration of the said agreement to pay said fees and charges, and the amount herein mentioned as a cash payment to him, the said Houlihan, by his signature to the receipt below, does release and discharge the said company from any and all claims, demands, actions, and rights of action that he now has or may hereafter have by reason of said injuries and accident.

Received of the Indianapolis Union Railway Company twenty-five dollars as payment in full of the above account, in consideration of which I release and discharge said company as above specified.

After this contract had been proved and introduced in evidence, it was purely a matter of law for the court to determine whether the consideration from appellant to appellee was contractual or not. If the instrument stated a contractual consideration, parol evidence was not admissible to vary or contradict the consideration expressed; but, if the consideration was expressed merely as a recital of a precedent or contemporaneous fact, parol evidence was receivable to prove that the recited fact was untrue, and that the recited consideration was not paid at all, or was paid on a different account. The court held that the consideration from appellant to appellee was not contractual, and permitted appellee to testify that there was no consideration for his execution of the release, and that the $25 paid him at the time was a gratuity. This was error. Pickett v. Green, 120 Ind. 584, 22 N. E. 737; Conant v. National State Bank, 121 Ind. 323, 22 N. E. 250; Reisterer v. Carpenter, 124 Ind. 30, 24 N. E. 371; Stewart v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. 141 Ind. 55, 40 N. E. 67; Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan, 6 Ind. App. 109, 32 N. E. 802. In Pickett v. Green a written contract was executed, by the terms of which Pickett, in consideration of the after-expressed covenants of Green, sold his office furniture and the goodwill of his medical practice to Green; and Green, in consideration of the sale and Pickett's covenants, agreed to pay Pickett $100. Pickett set up in practice in violation of the contract, and, in answer to Green's complaint for injunction, pleaded that the real consideration for his covenants was Green's undertaking to purchase certain real estate at $1,400, and that Green had repudiated his agreement. The ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer to this answer was affirmed. The following extract from Conant v. National State Bank indicates the scope of that decision: "In this instance the appellants cannot add to the written contract a stipulation that the sellers of the mill machinery agreed to furnish and place in operation machinery that would manufacture three designated grades of flour, and with a capacity of 100 barrels daily; for the specific and unambiguous provision of the contract is that the sellers agreed to furnish and put in operation 'machinery for a 100 barrel mill,' and the machinery which they agreed to furnish is particularly described and designated. The provisions of the contract are specific, and these specific provisions cannot be supplanted by oral statements. To permit parties to substitute oral statements for written stipulations would render written instruments valueless, and leave to the uncertainty of human memory the terms of contracts." In Reisterer v. Carpenter certain personal property was sold by written contract, in which the purchaser agreed to pay therefor by taking up and canceling certain specified debts of the seller. In the absence of any charge of fraud or mutual mistake, the seller was not permitted to show that the consideration for the sale was other than that expressed in the written instrument. On the other hand, the cases of Stewart v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. and Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan are illustrative of the class in which the consideration is not contractual, but is expressed merely as a recital of a fact. In both of these cases the form of the contract was this: "Know all men by these presents, that I, for and in consideration of the sum of [a stated number of] dollars to me paid by the Pennsylvania company, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do release and discharge the Pennsylvania company from," etc. In such a contract it is manifest that the railroad company does not agree to pay the sum of money named, or to do anything else for the benefit of the other party. The only contractual covenants are those of the employee, and they are made, not in consideration of the company's covenants to pay or to do something for the employee, but in consideration of a sum of money recited as having been paid. In this case appellee's covenants of release were made "in consideration of appellant's agreement to pay said fees and charges [to the physicians and hospital], and the amount herein mentioned as a cash payment to him." The consideration on each side was the mutual covenants of the other. In the absence of any issue of fraud or mutual mistake, appellee should not have been permitted to deny that the consideration for his release was correctly stated in the contract.

Other questions as to evidence and instructions are presented, but, as they will not necessarily arise on another trial, they are not considered.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to sustain appellant's motion for a new trial.

STATE of Indiana, Appt.,
v.

Lewis A. HENDRY.

(156 Ind. 392.)

Forgery by alteration of an elevator receipt given by a railroad for grain to be stored and shipped is not committed where the alteration is of a memorandum of the weigher's judgment as to the grade of the grain, indorsed on the back of the receipt to enable a purchaser to fix the price to be paid for the grain, since the memorandum is not part of the receipt, so that its alteration does not change the legal effect of the receipt.

IV. Conclusion.

I. Scope.

This note is not intended to include complete contracts, or memoranda amounting to complete contracts. The memoranda designed to be covered in this note consist rather of brief written statements of contracts, acts, or matters embodying something designed to be fixed in the memory, or made to fix the attention, or for the information of others, not intended to operate as a record of the whole contract or mat-

A PPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Steuben County quashing an indictment charging defendant with forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William L. Taylor, Attorney General, Willis Rhoads, Sol A. Wood, Thomas R. Marshall, William F. McNagny, and Philemon H. Clugston, for appellant:

The memorandum on the back of the receipt was as much a part of it as though it had been in the body of it.

ter, but merely to act as a reminder or suggestion.

II. The general rule.

The question as to what constitutes forgery by making or altering mere memorandum is but part of the more general doctrine as to what constitutes forgery generally, and is based upon the same general principle; and forgery generally has been defined to be the falsely making, or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability.

In accordance with the general definition, the question as to whether or not a memorandum is a subject of forgery turns upon whether upon its face it will have the effect to defraud those who may act upon it as genuine, or the person in whose name it is forged. People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 217, Sheldon, 549; Burden v. State, 120 Ala. 388, 25 So. 190.

Since a memorandum is not a complete contract, therefore, but a mere minute to aid the Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 228; Sanders v. Bagwell, 32 S. C. 238, 7 L. R. A. 743, 10 S. E. 946.

Any instrument which comes fairly within the provisions of the statute, which, if genuine, would have some apparent legal efficacy, is a subject of forgery.

Abbott v. Rose, 62 Me. 194, 16 Am. Rep. 427; Shannon v. State, 109 Ind. 407, 10 N. E. 87.

It is not necessary that it should work prejudice to another, nor that it should mislead or deceive him; it is sufficient that it might work prejudice to his rights of person or property, or that it might deceive or mislead him.

State v. Covington, 94 N. C. 913, 55 Am. Rep. 650; People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 503.

It is sufficient if it has an apparent legal efficacy, or if, upon the facts, it might be the foundation for a legal liability.

memory, or fix the attention, or convey information with relation to some more extended matter, act, or contract, such writings frequently have no apparent legal efficacy, and, though acted upon as genuine, would not on their face have the effect to defraud anyone, and consequently are not subjects of forgery.

But the general rule that a memorandum or instrument void on its face is not the subject of forgery must be taken with the limitation that, when the instrument does not appear to have any legal validity, or show that another might be injured by it, but extrinsic facts exist by which the holder of the paper might be enabled to defraud another, then the offense is complete, and an indictment averring the extrinsic facts, disclosing its capacity to deceive and defraud, will be supported. Rembert v. State, 53 Ala. 467, 25 Am. Rep. 639.

The fact that a memorandum or paper is incomplete or imperfect in itself, and that without the knowledge of extrinsic facts it does not appear that it has any vicious capacity, or is of any legal validity, does not render the instrument not the subject of a forgery, but only renders it necessary that the indictment should aver extrinsic facts showing its vicious capacity, and its capability of effecting fraud. Ibid.

And it is not essential that the person in whose name it purports to have been made should have had legal capacity to make it, or that the person to whom it is directed should be bound to act upon it if genuine or have a remedy over. People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 217, Sheldon, 549.

Where the counsel for the defense in a prosecution for the forgery of a memorandum or other instrument objects to the introduction thereof as being inadmissible in evidence because it is not an instrument of such a character as is essential to serve as a basis for a prosecution for forgery, it is the duty of the judge to pass on the objection one way or the other, and he should not remit the matter to the consideration of the jury, as it is the duty of the court to pass upon questions as to the admissibility of evidence, and of the jury to pass upon its force and sufficiency. State v. Stephen, 45 La. Ann. 702, 12 So. 883.

III. Application to particular kinds of memoranda.

a. In the nature of a promise or order.

It would seem that a memorandum in the form or nature of a promise to pay, or a direction or order to pay, or to deliver goods, will always be deemed to possess legal efficacy, either 54 L. R. A.

State v. Johnson, 26 Iowa, 407, 96 Am. Dec. 158; Rudicel v. State, 111 Ind. 595, 13 N. E. 114.

Legal efficacy within the rules with reference to forgery is declared to mean where by any possibility the instrument might operate to the injury of another.

People v. Rathbun, 21 Wend. 509.

The instrument need not be shown to be a perfect instrument; it is sufficient if it has some legal effect.

Gurmire v. State, 104 Ind. 444, 4 N. E. 54.

Nor need it be an instrument upon which an action can be maintained; it is sufficient if it is one that can be used in evidence, either in a suit against the person whose act it purports to be, or against any other person.

State v. Johnson, 26 Iowa, 407, 96 Am. Dec. 158.

with or without extrinsic averments and evidence, so as to be a subject of forgery, unless it is such that its meaning cannot be ascertained, or unless the extrinsic matter is such that it does not make its meaning clear.

Thus, a paper reading "Due Jacob Finch, 1 dollar on settlement this day. February 7th, 1809. David Knight,"—is a note for the payment of money which is a subject of forgery within the New York statute. People v. Finch, 5 Johns. 237.

So, an instrument in words and figures as follows: "Due 8.25, Askew Brothers,"—the indictment for the forgery of which alleges that thereby the defendant meant that $8.25 were due him from Askew Brothers, who were a partnership composed of certain specified individuals, though incomplete, appears on its face to be one which, if true, would possess some legal validity, and be legally capable of effecting a fraud, and is therefore a subject of forgery. Rembert v. State, 53 Ala. 467, 25 Am. Rep. 639.

And an indictment alleging the false making of an instrument in words and figures as follows: "Due 8.50 c. J. D.,"—is sufficient to show a forgery for which a prosecution may be had, where it also contains allegations that the meaning of the instrument was that the sum of $8.50 was due to the bearer thereof as change from a designated mercantile firm at the store of such firm, as certified to by a clerk in its employment, who had authority to make such certificate in the regular course of business at such store. Neison v. State, 32 Ala. 44, 2 So. 463.

And such a memorandum is not subject to objection in a prosecution for forgery thereof, on the ground that it shows on its face that it was made and emitted to answer the purposes of money, and for general circulation, which is an indictable offense under the Alabama statute, and is not prevented from being a subject of forgery thereby, as, though such an emission would be an indictable offense, the making of the paper itself would not be. Ibid.

So, a plantation ticket which at the option of the holder calls either for money from the owner of property or for goods at the plantation store belonging to the owner is of such a character as to furnish a proper foundation for a prosecution for forgery, though it does not appear that the accused sought to obtain money thereon. State v. Stephen, 45 La. Ann. 702, 12 So. 883.

Likewise, an instrument as follows: "I have bought of Barnhardt Krummer two frocks for $7. Ask your employers for the money, and let him have it. Mrs. Williams,"—alleged in the Nor need the instrument be made by one who has authority to make it. It is a subject of forgery although the authority to make it does not exist.

Clinch's Case, 2 East, P. C. 938; Williams v. State, 61 Ala. 33; People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 217.

Although the instrument may be void on its face, and consequently not the subject of forgery per se, yet if extrinsic facts exist and are averred, by which the holder thereof might be enabled to defraud another, the offense is complete, and the indictment is good.

Rembert v. State, 53 Ala. 467, 25 Am. Rep. 639; Powers v. State, 87 Ind. 97.

Messrs. William G. Oroxton and Frank M. Powers, for appellee:

In determining whether or not a writing is of such a character that a charge of forgery can be predicated of it this court will look to the copy of the instrument, and not to the averments of the indictment.

Harding v. State, 54 Ind. 359; Rollins v. State, 22 Tex. App. 548, 58 Am. Rep. 659, 3 S. W. 759.

All that is alleged is that it was the custom of the grain dealers to pay according to Miller's grading. "A custom cannot make a contract where there is none."

2 Beach, Modern Law of Contracts, § 755, p. 920.

A mere memorandum upon the back of a written instrument, not being referred to in the body of it, the instrument being complete without the matter indorsed, forms no part of it.

Robinson v. State, 66 Ind. 331; Current v. Fulton, 10 Ind. App. 617, 38 N. E. 419; Cambridge Sav. Bank v. Hyde, 131 Mass. 77, indictment to purport to have been made by a mother and addressed to her son, and to have been taken by the payee therein to the son representing that the mother had signed it, upon which he procured $7 of the son, is an order for the payment of money, which is a subject of forgery within the statute, so that an acquittal on an indictment for forgery on the merits would be a bar to a subsequent indictment for obtaining the money by the false pretense that the instrument was true. People v. Krummer, 4 Park. Crim. Rep. 217, Sheldon, 549.

But, an instrument in writing as follows: "Per Bearer 2 11-4 counterpane. T. Davies, E. Twell, 88 Aldgate,"—is not a request for the delivery of property for which an indictment for forgery will lie, under 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Wm. IV., chap. 66, § 10, in the absence of an allegation to explain the terms thereof, as a request under that act must import on its face to be a request. Rex v. Cullen, 5 Car. & P. 116, 1 Moody, C. C. 800.

And an instrument as follows: "W. Trim to 2s," is neither a warrant for the payment of money, nor a request for the delivery of goods, within the provisions of that act; and an indictment for forging a warrant for the payment of money and a request for the delivery of goods cannot be supported by proof of the forgery of such an instrument, and by showing that the bearer, on presenting it at a certain shop, would, by the course of dealing between W. Trim and the shopkeeper, be entitled to receive goods to the amount of 2 shillings. Reg. v. Ellis, 4 Cox, C. C. 258.

b. In the nature of a receipt or acquittance.

A memorandum in the nature of a receipt or acquittance is a subject of forgery when the substance of a receipt or acquittance appears either from the memorandum itself, or from a comparison with it of the instrument purporting to have been satisfied thereby, or from extrinsic evidence or averment. But the receipt must have purported to be the act of the person entitled to receive payment.

Thus, the words "Paid sadler," the word "saddler" beginning with a small s, written upon a bill due to a tradesman named Sadler, which had been intrusted to a servant for payment, imports a receipt and acquittance for the money on an indictment against the servant for forgery, and not merely a memorandum by the servant of her having paid the bill. Reg. v. Houseman, 8 Car. & P. 180.

And the words "Settled. Samuel Hughes," at the foot of a bill of parcels, import a receipt and acquittance; and it is sufficient in an indictment for forging such acquittance to set out the bill of parcels with the word "settled" and the supposed signature at the foot of it, without any averment that the word "settled" imports a receipt or acquittance. Rex v. Martin, 7 Car. & P. 549, 1 Moody, C. C. 483.

In Rex v. Thompson, 2 Leach, C. L. 632, note, 1 East, 181, note, however, it was held that an indictment charging the forgery of a receipt for money, specifying the amount and setting forth the language thereof as follows: "Settled I. M."—is bad in the absence of an averment that such words purported to be a receipt.

So, an instrument purporting to be an agreement and stamped as such, reciting that an arrangement had been made between the parties thereto in consideration of a stated sum, the receipt of which was thereby acknowledged, and the party paying it was released from all further claim in the matter with respect to which it was paid, is a receipt or an acquittance, under 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Wm. IV., chap. 66, § 10, and is describable as such in an indictment for forgery. Reg. v. Hill, 2 Cox, C. C. 246.

And an accusation by a mortgagee against a mortgagor of having obtained possession of the mortgage and falsely and fraudulently written therein "Interest paid to Nov. 30th, 1865," when it had not been so paid, is a charge of forgery and with uttering as genuine a false and forged instrument, which will support an action for slander. Hotchkiss v. Olmstead, 37 Ind. 74.

And an instrument as follows: "Augusta, 13th June, 1811. Mr. John Ladd—Bought of Eveleth & Child—2:18 Swedes Iron—$4.80—The above charged to Geo. Carpenter. By order—Eveleth & Child,"—purports to be an acknowledgment by Eveleth & Child that the goods delivered to Ladd were charged to Carpenter by his order, and this amounts, in law, to an acquittance or discharge which is a subject of forgery. Com. v. Ladd, 15 Mass. 526.

So, the writing by a party of his own name on the back of a bill of exchange under the statement "Received for R. A.," is the forging of a receipt within the provisions of 1 Wm. IV. chap. 66. Rex v. Arscott, 6 Car. & P. 408.

But, the act of a person against whom judg-

41 Am. Rep. 193; Miller v. People, 52 N. Y. 304, 11 Am. Rep. 706; Hess v. State, 5 Ohio, 9, 22 Am. Dec. 767; American Nat. Bank v. Bangs, 42 Mo. 454, 97 Am. Dec. 349; Horton v. Horton, 71 Iowa, 448, 32 N. W. 452.

The original receipt remained intact, and the memorandum was merely suggestive of a collateral independent transaction, and had no more effect upon the original instrument than as if written on a separate piece of paper.

Cambridge Sav. Bank v. Hyde, 131 Mass. 77, 41 Am. Rep. 193.

It is not forgery of the original, to obliterate or erase from a bond or note any receipt or indorsement written thereon; because such indorsement or receipt is an independent obligation or assurance, which in no way affects the qualities of the original instrument alleged to be forged.

ment had been rendered for costs in a criminal prosecution, which judgment entitled another person to a fee as a witness in indorsing on the execution docket a statement that he retained such witness fee as attorney, signing his own name, thereby falsely assuming to act as attorney for such party, does not satisfy the claim of the witness, and has no legal tendency to defraud, and is not, therefore, a forgery. State v. Corley, 4 Baxt. 410.

A memorandum stating that one party had paid a sum of money to another, not subscribed by the latter however, or importing any acknowledgment by him of his having received it, is not such a receipt as 2 Geo. II., chap. 25, § 1, makes it capital to forge or utter. Rex v. Harvey, Russ. & R. C. C. 227.

And an indorsement in the following terms: "Espy, Heidelbach & Co. Cincinnati, July 16, 1878. Draft wanted for $910 on New York. Order of A. Henry M. Teller,"—is not a subject of forgery, and the false making thereof is not indictable as forgery, though the indictment averred that the instrument was a receipt issued by Espy, Heidelbach & Co. to the draft clerk in their bank, and that by the rules of the bank the instrument upon its face was a receipt for money, in the absence of an averment showing who the signer was, or showing connection between that signature and Espy, Heidelbach & Co., or how or in what way the instrument would, if genuine, have the operation and effect of a receipt. Henry v. State, 35 Ohio St. 128.

Nor is a paper of the following tenor: "Boston, August 15th, 1868. Rec'd of Wm. J. Dale, surgeon general of Mass., my discharge and check No. 6979, for $100. George P. Gill. Witness, Fred'k P. Cutting,"—an accountable receipt for money, goods, or other property, which is the subject of forgery under Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 162, § 1, as it does not acknowledge that anything has been received which is to be accounted for. Com. v. Lawless, 101 Mass. 82.

And the signature of a witness indorsed on the back of an order upon the treasurer of county stock for the payment of the costs of a prosecution, with the sum allotted to the witness written in figures opposite his name, is merely an authority, and not a receipt or an acquittance, under the statute with relation to forgery. Queen v. Parker, 2 Cox, C. C. 274.

An indorsement of a payment upon the back of a bill or note, however, may be a subject of forgery though not signed, when the indorsement was made at the time of the payment, and was intended to take the place of a receipt and to save the necessity of making a separate one. 54 L. R. A.

8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 478, note; Miller v. People, 52 N. Y. 304, 11 Am. Rep. 706.

The indorsement, to be the subject of forgery, must be something which, if genuine, would be of legal efficacy.

2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 570a.

An instrument incapable of enforcement on account of its indefiniteness and incompleteness is not the subject of forgery.

Waterman v. People, 67 Ill. 91; State v. Wheeler, 19 Minn. 98, Gil. 70; People v. Shall, 9 Cow. 778; Reg. v. Closs, 7 Cox, C. C. 494.

Jordan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee was charged by indictment with the crime of forging, by alteration, a certain receipt, and with having fraudulently and knowingly uttered, published, and passed the

But these facts must be made to appear by allegation and proof.

Thus, the alteration of an indorsement upon a promissory note of the receipt of a designated amount of money thereon without any signature, so as to make it read for a smaller amount, may be forgery though not signed, where the note was present at the time the indorsement was made, and the indorsement was intended as a receipt, as in such case, while a receipt might be demanded, the usual course is for the holder of the note to indorse the payment thereon without signature. Kegg v. State, 10 Ohio, 75.

In the above case Rex v. Harvey, Russ. & R. C. C. 227, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that it is evident from the statement of that case that the writing was upon a separate piece of paper.

But an indorsement on the back of a promissory note acknowledging the receipt of a sum of money without signature forms no part of the note, and the act of the maker thereof in obtaining it from the holder and writing such an indorsement upon its back does not constitute forgery. State v. Monnier, 8 Minn. 212, Gil. 182.

And such an indorsement will not, in the absence of allegation and proof to the contrary, be held to be more than a mere memorandum made by him, in a prosecution against him for the forgery thereof or for the fraudulent alteration thereof, and will not be deemed to have been intended as evidence of payment, or as being in any sense a receipt, the alteration of which would be forgery. State v. Davis, 58 Iowa, 252, 5 N. W. 149.

In the above case, Kegg v. State, 10 Ohio, 75, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case a third person owed the defendant a note and made a payment thereon, and, in the presence, and with the concurrence, and by the direction, of the defendant, made the indorsement on the note, for the alteration of which the defendant was prosecuted.

So, an indorsement upon the back of a single bill, as follows: "Received 23rd Oct. 1841 $500,"—without signature, does not upon its face purport to be a receipt or acquittance; and where it is not averred that it was intended so to operate the erasure thereof by the holder of the bill is not forgery, as such indorsement, so far as appears, is a mere memorandum voluntarily made, perhaps through inadvertence or mistake, in which the obligors had no interest, and the obliteration of which could not in legal contemplation prejudice their rights. State v. Martin, 9 Humph. 55.

receipt so forged as genuine. On his motion the court quashed both counts of the indictment and rendered a judgment discharging him. The state appeals, and predicates error upon the ruling of the court in quashing each count of the indictment.

The instrument alleged to have been forged by the accused is what is generally known as an "elevator receipt" for grain, and was given by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company to the appellee for the storage of wheat in its elevator or grain house situated at the town of Angola, Steuben county, Indiana. Counsel for appellant and appellee, in their briefs, have correctly summarized the facts set out in the indictment, which summary is virtually as follows:

"That the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company operates a railway through the town of Angola, Steuben county, Indiana, and also a grain house or elevator in connection therewith at that town. That one Theron Miller was in charge of the grain house, Timothy E. Purinton was agent of the railway company, and Chester Darr was his clerk or assistant. That the method of doing business at the grain elevator, so far as concerned the storage of grain, was: When a seller brought grain for storage in the elevator and shipment over the railway, he informed Miller to whose account, among the dealers at Angola, the wheat was to be stored. Miller weighed the wheat, and gave the seller a slip or check, stating the name of the seller and buyer, the number of pounds of wheat, and with the figures No. 2 or 3 red, as indicating his judgment as to the quality or grade of the wheat. The seller took the slip or check to Purinton, the Likewise, the separation or erasure of an indorsement by a payee from the back of a note is not forgery within the meaning of the statute. State v. McLeran, 1 Alk. (Vt.) 311.

The intentional destruction of an acquittance in whatever way cannot be regarded either as the making of a written instrument, or the alteration of or addition to a written instrument, so as to bring the act within the definition of forgery; and, in the absence of a statute making the act of erasing, rubbing out, and obliterating an acquittance forgery, as is the case in North Carolina, such erasure of an acquittance upon a bond is not forgery. State v. Thornburg, 28 N. C. (6 Ired. L.) 79, 44 Am. Dec. 67.

See also Reg. v. Pries, 6 Cox, C. C. 165, infra, III, c; Barnum v. State, 15 Ohio, 717, 45 Am. Dec. 601; Rex v. Hope, 1 Moody, C. C. 414, infra, III, d.

c. In the nature of certificates or statements of fact.

STATE v. HENDRY holds an alteration of a memorandum reading "3 red" so as to read "2 red," placed upon the back of a warehouse receipt to indicate to the buyer the opinion of the warehouseman as to the grade of wheat received by him, was not a forgery, since the change in no way affected the legal effect of the warehouse receipt. Like holdings with reference to similar memoranda have been made in a number of other cases, though some of them are based on other reasons.

Thus, a memorandum in writing as follows: "2 hides, $4. Sitman,"—is evidence on its face of no pecuniary obligation, and its alteration by simply changing the figures could neither increase nor diminish any pecuniary obligation, and therefore that act cannot be considered forgery under the statute; and an allegation in the indictment, that under and by virtue of such writing the defendant was authorized to demand and receive certain moneys of designated persons, does not render it a subject of forgery, as, under the law, the defendant had no right, from the face of the instrument, to demand money or property of such person, or of anyone else. Howell v. State, 37 Tex. 591.

So, a writing as follows: "Mr. Holmes, Selma, Ala. Dear Sir:—The value of this chain is $10.00 (Ten.)."—does not create, discharge, increase, or diminish a money liability, or transfer or incumber property, or release or impair an existing claim to or lien upon property, and is not, therefore, a subject of forgery under the Alabama statute, in the absence of a showing of extrinsic facts, which, taken in connection 54 L. R. A.

with the paper, impart to it a capacity to injure or defraud. Burden v. State, 120 Ala. 388, 25 So. 190.

And, an indictment for the false making of an instrument, as follows: "Weighed on Fairbanks Standard Scale Dec. 1, 1888. Load of one load of corn. From Sam Simpson. To Patty & Brockington. On gross 2513 pounds. Off tare 1011 pounds. Fees net 1502 pounds. Net bus Weighed (space for figuring on back),"—purporting to be a certificate of one load of corn weighed, containing no averments showing the facts or reasons why such instrument created a pecuniary obligation, is insufficient to show a forgery, as the writing is so incomplete as to leave an apparent uncertainty in law whether it is valid or not, and the indictment does not show extrinsic facts which will enable the court to see that if it were genuine it would be valid. King v. State, 27 Tex. App. 567, 11 S. W. 525.

The rule is different, however, when, though the paper seems to be a mere memorandum of facts, something of the elements of an order or an acquittance is contained in it.

Thus, a paper as follows: "Aug. 3, 39, One 16 in helmet scoop—1 4 quart kettle. Jaa. Hayward,"—amounts to a request for the delivery of goods within the meaning of the statute with relation to forgery, although not addressed to anyone. Reg. v. Pulbrook, 9 Car. & P. 37.

And, a paper of the following tenor: "Prime Wingard, 507 1 Cot. T. T. P."—is apparently of some legal efficacy, and an instrument upon which money could be obtained, and is therefore a subject for forgery. State v. Wingard, 40 La. Ann. 733, 5 So. 54.

And, an instrument as follows: "By order of R. F. Pries we have this day transferred into the name of Messrs Collman & Stolterfoft, 759 quarters and 4 bushels of wheat ex. August Ferdinand, Captain Richards, a Neustadt. Entered by R. F. Pries, and now lying at our granaries, Bermondsey-Wall. The wheat is insured against risk by fire by us. Brown & Young, Corn Exchange, October 23, 1852,"—purports to be an acknowledgment by the signers that they had goods received from the holder of the instrument for which they were accountable, and is therefore an accountable receipt, for the forging of which an indictment will lie under 11 Geo. IV., and 1 Wm. IV., chap. 66, § 10. Reg. v. Pries, 6 Cox, C. C. 165.

So, a paper of the following tenor: "Willy Johns has picked 215 pounds of cotton, Henry Westly, and David Jefferson has picked 852 pounds of cotton. Henry Wooten,"—indicates that it was issued by someone in authority to acknowledge work done by laborers in a agent of the railway company, or to Darr, who made out the company's receipt, certifying the amount of wheat, red or white, received from the seller, to whose account for transportation to Toledo, Ohio, it had been received, and on the back of the receipt Purinton or Darr, as the case might be, wrote '2 red' or '3 red,' as indicating Miller's judgment as to the grade or quality of the wheat. That the purpose of this designation '2 red' or '3 red' on the back of the receipt was to enable the purchaser to fix the Angola market price of the wheat so stored, and sellers received pay according to this method, in accordance with the grade indorsed on the back of the receipt. That during all the times stated in the indictment this method was adopted and practised by all the grain dealers in Angola, and these methods were also known to appellee. That William C. Patterson was one of the grain buyers at Angola. That on the 21st day of August, 1897, appellee delivered at the grain elevator 3,550 pounds of wheat for Patterson. That Miller weighed it, and graded it '3 red,' and gave appellee the customary check indicating the weight, grade, and that it was stored to the account of Patterson. That appellee took the check to the railway company's office, where Darr, the clerk, who was working under authority of Purinton, agent of the company, made out the receipt for the company, and wrote on the back '3 red,' to indicate the opinion of Miller as to the grade of the wheat, as was the custom."

The receipt in question upon which the charge of forgery is founded is as follows:

Check No. 71. Not Transferable. No. 429.

The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company.

Angola, Ind., Station, August, 21st, 1897.
Received into this company's grain house manner intended to serve as a basis for the computation of what they have earned, and an acknowledgment of that description is equivalent to an order on a disbursing agent, which, on presentation, entitles the party named, or the bearer, to payment of the realized amount, and is therefore a subject of forgery. State v. Jefferson, 39 La. Ann. 331, 1 So. 669.

And an indictment charging the false making of an instrument, as follows: "July 22nd, 1894. This is a correct statement of D. H. Daud's time for work done on section 4 in the month of July: Days' work 14; board due, $6.50; balance due, $8.15. F. Thompson, Section Foreman,"—and charging that the same purported to be the obligation of a designated railroad company signed by its agent, and that it was the usage of the company to execute such obligations on which employees were to receive their pay from the proper agent of the company, and explaining the meaning of the expressions therein, so explains the instrument in question as to give it the character of an instrument, which, if true, would authorize the owner thereof to maintain a civil suit for work and labor done for the railroad company, and is therefore a subject of forgery capable of being uttered as a forged instrument. Daud v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 460, 31 S. W. 376.

Likewise, a written statement by a landlord, who by law was entitled to a lien on cotton raised by a tenant on his premises, that he had nothing to do with the cotton of the tenant, and that the tenant was welcome to do what he pleased with it, is an instrument which, if genuine, would be of apparent legal efficacy as a waiver of his lien and as an authority to encumber or dispose of the entire cotton to which it refers, and is therefore a subject of forgery within the meaning of the Alabama statute prescribing the punishment for the forging or counterfeiting of any instrument purporting to be the act of another by which any right or interest in property is in any way changed or affected. Dixon v. State, 81 Ala. 61, 1 So. 69.

But, while such an instrument would be a subject of forgery, under proper averments where it does not indicate any interest whatever on the part of the alleged landlord, and the indictment does not aver that he was the landlord, a conviction for the forgery of such instrument cannot be sustained, and a recital in the indictment as follows: "meaning thereby that W. W. Roberts, the landlord, waived his lien on the patch cotton,"—is not sufficient as an averment that the said Roberts was the land-

And an indictment for the forging of an instrument in these words: "I hereby waive to W. G. Beville all my rights and immunities as landlord over Ed. Jackson's crop of the present year, for all claims I have, or may have, against the said Ed. Jackson or Henry Williams, except one bale of cotton weighing five hundred pounds, that said Ed. Jackson will owe me as land rent, and twenty-five dollars that he will owe me as mule rent for the present year. June 13th, 1888. I holds no claims on Ed. Jackson but the rent, one bale of cotton, and mule rent, 25 dollars. Yours truly, A. M. Lewis,"—is not sufficient, in the absence of anything to show that Lewis had made advances to Jackson—such advances as gave him a lien, under the statute—as, in the absence of anything to show a lien, such a certificate, though forged, could not injure or defraud anyone, and legal forgery could not be predicated on it. Williams v. State, 90 Ala. 649, 8 So. 825.

And a paper affirming that certain persons are solvent and able to pay a note upon which their names appear as makers is a mere written expression of opinion, and not such a writing as may be the subject of forgery under Alabama act of 1886, defining the punishment for forging or counterfeiting any letter patent, gift, grant, covenant, bond, writing obligatory, note of any bank established by law, or any bill, order, or acceptance or receipt for payment of money or articles of value, or any instrument in writing whatever to secure the payment or delivery of money or other articles, or the discharge of any debt or demand. State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747.

d. Falsification of dates and addresses.

The foregoing part of this note has dealt with cases in which the alleged forgery consisted in the false making or alteration of the instrument or memorandum itself. A date to an instrument, however, though a complete contract or an address attached to a signature thereto, is but a mere memorandum, and this is susceptible of forgery, or rather the instrument is susceptible of forgery through the alteration of such date or address, and in such case, especially if the instrument is complete, there can be but little difficulty in making the proper showing as to apparent legal efficacy.

Thus, an allegation in an indictment that the defendant had an account against another in at this station, from L. A. Hendry, of Pleasant township, county of Steuben, state of Indiana, for account of W. C. Patterson, three thousand five hundred and fifty (3,550) pounds of red wheat, to be forwarded to Toledo, Ohio, under and subject to the conditions and stipulations of this receipt, viz.: That said grain upon its arrival at Toledo is to be delivered into the company's grain elevators, and not elsewhere, except by special agreement; and while said grain shall remain in said grain house at said station, and after it shall arrive at Toledo in cars ready for delivery into said elevator, the only liability of this company therefor shall be that of warehouseman. This company shall not be bound to forward said grain until instructed to do so, but reserves the right to forward the same at any time without instruction. No transfer of this grain will be made except upon the surrender of this receipt, and in accordance with the rules of this company. This company shall not be held liable for any delay in the transportation or delivery of said grain, or any injury from heat, dampness, or for deterioration in quality, or by fire, accident, or shrinkage while in possession of the company, unless such delay or injury arises through the negligence of the company. June, 1841, which was settled in full at that time on his books, and signed by both parties, and purporting to be in full of all demands, and that thereafter and after a further indebtedness had been incurred by the defendant to such third person he fraudulently altered the figure "1" into a figure "4," so that it read "Settled in full of all demands. June, 1844," so as to include in the settlement such indebtedness afterwards incurred, sufficiently shows forgery. Barnum v. State, 15 Ohio, 717, 45 Am. Dec. 601.

And where a pay sergeant of artillery obtained from the paymaster a receipt for a sum of money as part of the subsistence of a company for a designated month, and afterwards erased the name of that month and inserted the name of the following month, and procured money from a tradesman on the receipt according to the usual practice, the tradesman sending the receipt to the agent of the regiment, who paid the amount, an indictment describing the instrument as a receipt is good. Rex v. Hope, 1 Moody, C. C. 414.

So, procuring an acceptance by a person in his own name upon a bill of exchange, and the addition thereto of the address of another person of the same name, who resided at a different place, making the same payable at a stated place where the latter did business, with the intention that the bill should be taken as drawn on the latter, is a forgery, where no authority to draw had been given. Reg. v. Blenkinsop, 1 Den. C. C. 276, 2 Car. & K. 531, 17 L. J. M. C. N. S. 82.

In Reg. v. Epps, 4 Post. & F. 81, however, in which a nurseryman and seedsman got his foreman to accept two bills, the acceptances having no addition, description, or address, and then, without the knowledge of the acceptor, added a false address to one and represented that the acceptance was that of a customer, and, with reference to the other acceptance, represented that of the wheat specified in this receipt, and that I sold said wheat specified in said receipt to the party named in the receipt.

[Signature of Seller] L. A. Hendry.

On the back of this receipt was written the following: "3 red."

"That on the 24th day of March, 1898, appellee altered, forged, and counterfeited this receipt by changing the figure '3' on the back to a figure '2,' for the purpose of defrauding Patterson, and getting the price of No. 2 for the wheat that had been graded No. 3. That Patterson had no knowledge of the kind or quality of the wheat, except as indicated by this writing and figure upon the back of the receipt. That from the 21st day of August, 1897, to the 24th day of March, 1898, there was a difference of 8 cents per bushel between No. 2 and No. 3 red wheat; No. 2 being the higher price."

Counsel for the state contend that the memorandum on the back of the receipt entered into and affected the operation of the latter, because it served to disclose the purchaser of the wheat, the grade thereof, and controlled the price to be paid; that the price of No. 2 red, as shown, was 8 cents higher than No. 3 red; and that, therefore, the alteration or change from "3 red" to "2 red," as made by appellee, compelled the purchaser to pay 8 cents per bushel more for the wheat stored than he would have paid had the memorandum remained as orig-

It was that of a seedsman, there being no such person in fact, it was held that the acceptance to which the false address was added was not a forgery, but that the other acceptance was one.

IV. Conclusion.

A mere memorandum is a subject of forgery or not according to whether or not it is of apparent legal efficacy, and whether or not, either upon its face or through extrinsic averment and proof, it appears that it will have the effect of defrauding those who may act upon it as genuine, or the person in whose name it is forged.

The mere fact that the memorandum appears to be void on its face, however, is not alone sufficient to remove it from the list of subjects of forgery. If extrinsic facts exist by which the holder of the paper might defraud another, the offense is complete, and it is not necessary that the person purporting to have made it should have the legal capacity to do so, or that the other interested party should have been bound to act upon it as genuine, or have a remedy over. It is the duty of the court to pass upon the question of admissibility when an instrument is objected to on a prosecution for forgery as not a subject of forgery.

These rules apply alike to all classes of memoranda, though in case of memoranda in the nature of promises or orders or receipts or acquittances the meaning and application and capacity to defraud appear to be more easily ascertainable, and consequently such memoranda are more frequently held to be subjects of forgery than memoranda consisting of mere statements or recitals. Memoranda consisting of dates and addresses are also subjects of forgery, or, rather, their alteration or falsification may render the instrument to which they were attached a forgery, and in such case the usual rules apply, and their capacity to defraud is usually readily shown. F. H. B.

inally written on the back of the receipt. It is insisted, therefore, that the memorandum in controversy qualified the terms or provisions of the receipt, and that its alteration was material, and, under the law, constituted forgery of that instrument; and that the indictment, under the alleged facts, was sufficient. Counsel for appellee, however, insist that the indictment is bad, and some of the reasons which they assign are the following: "That the acts alleged to have been committed do not amount to or constitute alteration, forgery, or counterfeiting of the receipt. That the '3 red' indorsed upon the back of the receipt was a mere memorandum, independent of the receipt, and of no legal efficacy, the alteration of which could not prejudicially change any liability, because it creates no liability; and that, despite the change of the figure on the back, the receipt remained unchanged. That such a memorandum or writing is not embraced within any class of instruments defined by our statutes as being the subject of forgery. That, assuming the truth of all matters alleged, the indictment discloses merely an attempt to obtain money by a false pretense."

The instrument charged in the indictment to have been altered and changed by appellee is disclosed to be the wheat receipt given by the railroad company to him, and not merely the memorandum indorsed thereon. The accused was not indicted for altering and forging the memorandum, but for altering and forging the receipt by means of the alteration made in the memorandum. The forgery of the receipt, as we have seen, is specifically charged to have been committed by altering or changing the figure "3" into a figure "2" so as to make the memorandum read "2 red," instead of "3 red," as originally written by the agent of the railroad company. The inquiry, therefore, is, Was the indorsement of "3 red" a material part of the receipt, the alteration of which, under the statute of this state defining forgery, would constitute that crime? This statute is embraced in § 2354, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894 (Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 2206), and, when stripped of such words and phrases as have no material bearing upon this case, may be said to read as follows: "Whoever falsely . . . alters, forges, counterfeits, . . . or causes to be falsely . . . altered, forged, counterfeited, . . . any . . . acquittance or receipt, either for money or property, . . . with intent to defraud any person, body politic, or corporation, or utters or publishes as true any such instrument or matter knowing the same to be false, defaced, altered, forged, counterfeited, falsely printed or photographed, with intent to defraud," etc., "shall be imprisoned," etc. An eminent authority on criminal law defines forgery at common law to be "the false making or materially altering, with intent to defraud, of any writing, which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy, or the foundation of a legal liability." 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 523. See also Garmire 54 L. R. A.

v. State, 104 Ind. 444, 4 N. E. 54. This definition is not incompatible with our statute which defines the crime of forgery. Unquestionably, the receipt alleged to have been altered and forged is of such a character as, under the statute, would authorize the charge of forgery to be predicated thereon. As the crime in this case is charged to have been committed by means of the alteration of a genuine written instrument, it must, therefore, be clearly made to appear that the alleged alteration of the genuine document was material, and that its legal effect thereby was in some degree varied or changed to the prejudice of some person having or acquiring rights therein; for the law is well settled that forgery cannot be successfully predicated upon an immaterial alteration of a written instrument. Bitlings v. State, 56 Ind. 101; Gillett, Crim. Law, 2d ed. § 445; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 573. The instrument denominated "receipt" in the statute pertaining to forgery must be held to include all that which, when connected together, constitutes such written receipt or instrument; and, unless a memorandum or writing indorsed thereon or attached thereto is designed by the parties to import something into such receipt or instrument by which the legal effect of its terms or provisions is in some manner varied or affected, such memorandum cannot be said to be connected with the receipt or instrument so as to form a part thereof, and any change or alteration in the memorandum indorsed thereon or attached thereto under such circumstances would not constitute an alteration or change of the legal effect of the receipt or instrument. Where it expressly appears that the memorandum indorsed on or attached to a written instrument, whatever the character of the latter may be, was made by one party or the other at the time of its execution, and that the same was intended to be aside or separate from the main design or object of the instrument itself, then certainly, under such circumstances, the memorandum cannot be said to enter into or form any part of the instrument upon which it is indorsed or to which it is attached; consequently, any change or alteration thereof would not vary or affect the legal import of the instrument.

The history of the case at bar, as disclosed by the facts averred in the indictment, shows that the method of doing business in respect to the storage of wheat in the elevator of the railroad company at Angola was simply as follows: When the owner of wheat brought such grain for storage in said elevator, it was weighed by one Miller, who, after weighing it, would give to the owner or seller a slip or check, which stated the number of pounds of wheat, name of the seller, and the name of the buyer to whose account the wheat was to be stored, with the figures "No. 2 red" or "No. 3 red," the latter indicating only the judgment of said weigher in respect to the quality or grade of the wheat. The seller or owner would then take this check or slip to the agent of the railroad company, who then made out and gave to him the railroad company's receipt for the grain delivered for storage, stating in such receipt the number of pounds of wheat, red or white, received, and to whose account for transportation the grain had been received; and providing further as to the duty and liability of the railroad company in the transportation and delivery of such grain; and on the back of such receipt the agent would write "2 red" or "3 red," as the case might be, merely to indicate the judgment of the weigher in regard to the grade of the wheat. The sole purpose of the indorsement of "2 red" or "3 red" upon the receipt was to enable the purchaser to fix the market price at Angola of the wheat so stored. It appears that the receipt in question was issued by the railroad company to appellee, and the memorandum of "3 red" indorsed thereon in accordance with the method above stated, and that the purpose of the indorsement was to indicate the judgment of the weigher in respect to the grade of the wheat. The receipt appears to be complete within itself, aside from the indorsement thereon, and makes no reference whatever to the memorandum in controversy, and the latter makes no reference to the receipt; and, unaided by extrinsic facts, each is apparently independent of the other as much as though the term "3 red" had been written on a separate piece of paper. Standing alone and unexplained, the term may be said to be vague and uncertain in regard to its meaning or purpose, and cannot, as it stands, unexplained, be read into or construed as being a part of the receipt. When the memorandum is viewed or considered in the light of the extrinsic facts set out in the indictment, it becomes evident that the design thereof was to serve a purpose wholly different from the main object of the receipt, which related to the storage and transportation of the amount of wheat received, while the purpose or object of the term "3 red" related to the price to be paid by Patterson, the purchaser, to appellee, the seller. The memorandum, so indorsed, it appears, might, at the option of such buyer, be accepted by him as evidence of the judgment of the weigher in regard to the grade of the wheat. As a consideration of the facts discloses that a change or alteration of the memorandum would not, under the circumstances, operate to vary or affect the receipt in any degree, consequently any change or alteration thereof cannot be held to be a forgery of the receipt. It would seem that when this memorandum had been exhibited to the buyer by the seller, and the former had accepted it as indicating the grade of the wheat according to the judgment of the weigher, the purpose for which it was designed or intended, as shown by the facts, was accomplished. The alleged alteration of the memorandum, as previously asserted, did not operate to change or vary the legal effect of the receipt; therefore the charge made in the indictment that the receipt was altered and forged by the appellee was not sustained under the facts, and the action of the court in quashing both counts of the indictment was right. Possibly, as insisted, if appellee perpetrated a fraud upon Patterson by means of the false memorandum, he would be amenable to the provisions of the criminal statute relating to false pretenses; but that is not the question presented. Neither is the question as to whether the memorandum itself, when explained by intrinsic facts, is such an instrument or writing upon which forgery might be predicated, presented, or decided, but our decision is confined to the particular facts set out in the indictment.

Judgment affirmed.

WESTERN & ATLANTIC RAILROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

George D. FERGUSON.

(113 Ga. 708.)

*1. The duty imposed by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the negligence of such other is existing, and is either apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend its existence.

2. Failure to exercise ordinary care on the part of the person injured, before the negligence complained of is apparent or should have been reasonably apprehended, will not preclude a recovery, but will authorize the jury to diminish the damages in proportion to the fault attributable to the person injured.

3. The evidence authorized the verdict, and the discretion of the trial judge in refusing a new trial will not be controlled.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Whitfield County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Payne & Tye, R. J. McCamy, and J. McCamy for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Hoke Smith and H. C. Peoples, for defendant in error:

Want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, under all the circumstances, at common law, was a question of fact for the jury.

Failure to look and listen does not constitute negligence as a matter of law, but is a fact to be considered by the jury in connection with the other facts in determining the question of negligence.

There was evidence to show that the defendant was negligent after the exposure of the plaintiff was discovered. This would render it liable independent of the claim of negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

Inland & S. Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 558, 35 L. ed. 272, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653.

Even want of ordinary care by the plaintiff, unless this lack of care was exercised in a failure to avoid the negligence of the defendant, would not defeat a recovery.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Ferguson sued the railroad company for damages alleged to have resulted from personal injuries received by him on account of the negligent operation of one of the defendant's trains. The plaintiff recovered a verdict, and the defendant's motion for a new trial, based on the general grounds only, having been overruled, it excepted.

The evidence introduced in behalf of the plaintiff made substantially the following case: On October 7, 1899, plaintiff was struck and injured by one of the defendant's trains. On the date named the plaintiff desired to take this train for Atlanta, which was due at Dalton at 7:10 in the morning; plaintiff knowing that the train was due to arrive at that time. A short time before the train was due, plaintiff came out of a barber shop, and started to walk obliquely along a footpath towards the depot to take the train. It was raining slightly, and plaintiff was carrying a raised umbrella over his head. There was a side track along by the side of the defendant's freight depot, between the barber shop and the main track, and extending a few feet beyond the freight depot. It was necessary to cross the main track in order to reach the passenger depot, and plaintiff intended crossing the main track lower down than the end of the side track beyond the freight depot. Walking in an oblique direction, plaintiff's face was in a direction diagonally across the track, and his side was towards a train which would approach from the north. There were some freight cars on the side track. When plaintiff reached a point 10 or 12 feet beyond these cars, from which he could see 150 to 200 feet up the main track, he looked up the track, and saw no train approaching. His watch indicated that it would be four minutes before the train was due, though plaintiff was unable to say whether the engineer had the same time that he had. After looking up the main line, and seeing no train approaching, plaintiff walked casually along towards the main track, at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 miles an hour, 8 or 10 steps, or about 30 feet, and, without looking further to see if a train was approaching, stepped upon the main track at a place where it was usual and customary for foot passengers to cross, and was struck by the train, which had run 150 to 200 feet while plaintiff walked 30. There was an ordinance of the city of Dalton prohibiting the running of trains at the place where the plaintiff was struck at a greater speed than 4 miles an hour, and the train which struck the plaintiff was running at a speed greatly in excess of that limit. Had the train been run at 4 miles an hour, the plaintiff could have gotten safely across the track before the train reached the point where he was injured. Plaintiff was given no warning of any kind of the approach of the train.

In the case of Americus, P. & L. R. Co. v. Luckie, 87 Ga. 7, 13 S. E. 105, Mr. Justice Lumpkin used the following language: "It seems to be the clear meaning of our law that the plaintiff can never recover in an action for personal injuries, no matter what the negligence of the defendant may be, short of actual wantonness, when the proof shows he could, by ordinary care, after the negligence of the defendant began or was existing, have avoided the consequences to himself of that negligence." This language can convey no other impression than that, in cases of the character referred to, the duty on the part of the plaintiff to use ordinary care for his protection against the consequences of the defendant's negligence does not arise "until after the negligence began or was existing." The ruling in the Luckie Case was approved in terms in the case of Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Gibson, 97 Ga. 497, 25 S. E. 484, where Mr. Chief Justice Simmons used the expression above referred to, saying that "the plaintiff in an action against a railroad company for personal injuries cannot recover, even though the company may have been negligent, if, after the negligence of the defendant began or was existing, the person injured could, by ordinary care, have avoided the consequences to himself of that negligence." In the case of Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Attaway, 90 Ga. 661, 16 S. E. 958, the present chief justice used the following language: "The rule which requires one to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not apply until he sees the danger, or has reason to apprehend it." In the case of Comer v. Barfield, 102 Ga. 480, 31 S. E. 90, Mr. Justice Fish says, in substance, that if one who was injured by the negligence of another used proper diligence, as soon as his peril was apparent, to avert the catastrophe, it could not be said that by ordinary care he might have avoided the consequences of the other's negligence. In Macon & I. S. Street R. Co. v. Holmes, 103 Ga. 658, 30 S. E. 565, Mr. Justice Lewis says: "A party cannot be charged with the duty of using any degree of care or diligence to avoid the negligence of a wrongdoer until he has reason to apprehend the existence of such negligence. No one can be expected to guard against what he does not see and cannot foretell. The rule, therefore, which requires one to exercise ordinary care and diligence to avoid the consequences of another's negligence necessarily applies to a case where there is opportunity of exercising this diligence after the negligence has begun and has become apparent." From the expressions used and the rulings made in the cases cited,—and there are many others where similar expressions are used and similar rulings made,—the rule of force with reference to the subject under investigation seems to 54 L. R. A.

be well settled, and may be thus stated: The duty imposed by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the negligence of such other is existing, and is either apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend its existence. In such cases, and in such cases only, does the failure to exercise ordinary care to escape the consequences of negligence entirely defeat a recovery. In other cases (that is, where the person injured by the negligence of another is at fault himself, in that he did not, before the negligence of the other became apparent, or before the time arrived when, as an ordinarily prudent person, it should have appeared to him that there was reason to apprehend its existence, observe that amount of care and diligence which would be exercised under like circumstances by an ordinarily prudent person) such fault or failure to exercise due care and diligence at such a time would not entirely preclude a recovery, but would authorize the jury to diminish the damages "in proportion to the amount of default attributable to" the person injured. Comer v. Barfield, 102 Ga. 480, 31 S. E. 90; Macon & I. S. Street R. Co. v. Holmes, 103 Ga. 658, 30 S. E. 565; Macon & W. R. Co. v. Johnson, 38 Ga. 409. In some jurisdictions the mere failure to stop, look, and listen by one who is about to cross a railroad track is negligence per se; and this is true notwithstanding that at the place where the person was about to cross there is imposed upon the railroad company, by statute or otherwise, the duty of giving signals as to the approach of trains to such places. In other jurisdictions it is held that the mere failure to stop, look, and listen will not amount to negligence per se, but the question whether it is such negligence as will defeat a recovery is one of fact, to be determined by a jury, after taking into consideration all of the circumstances of the case. 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 429 et seq. Even in the jurisdictions last referred to—among them being our own state—the rule is settled that one about to cross a railroad track must use his senses in the way that an ordinarily prudent person would under similar circumstances use them, in order to determine whether it would be safe to cross at that time and place; and this is true notwithstanding the company may be by law required to give signals, slacken speed, or do such other acts as would, if faithfully performed, render improbable, if not impossible, injury to anyone crossing the track. At common law, if the negligence of the plaintiff contributed to the injury, he could not recover. This doctrine referred to usually as that of "contributory negligence" is not the law of this state; but the doctrine referred to often as that of "comparative negligence" is the rule of force here. This rule authorizes a recovery by the plaintiff, although he was at fault, provided he was injured under circumstances where, by the exercise of ordinary care on his part, he could not have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. See Civil Code, §§ 2322, 3830. If the plaintiff knows of the defendant's negligence, and fails to exercise that degree of care and caution which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise under similar circumstances to prevent an injury which will result from such negligence, it is well settled that he cannot recover. See Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Neely, 50 Ga. 544; Central R. Co. v. Harris, 76 Ga. 508; Americus, P. & L. R. Co. v. Luckie, 87 Ga. 6, 13 S. E. 105; Briscoe v. Southern R. Co. 103 Ga. 224, 227, 28 S. E. 638; Central R. Co. v. Dorsey, 106 Ga. 826, 828, 32 S. E. 873; Hopkins v. Southern R. Co. 110 Ga. 85, 88, 35 S. E. 307.

If the negligence of the defendant was existing at the time that plaintiff was hurt, and he, in the exercise of that degree of care and caution which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise under similar circumstances, could have discovered the defendant's negligence, and when discovered could, by the exercise of a like degree of care, have avoided the same, then he cannot recover. See Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Loftin, 86 Ga. 43, 45, 12 S. E. 186; Americus, P. & L. R. Co. v. Luckie, 87 Ga. 6, 13 S. E. 105; Brunswick & W. R. Co. v. Gibson, 97 Ga. 489, 497, 25 S. E. 485; Cain v. Macon Consol. Street R. Co. 97 Ga. 298, 22 S. E. 918; Western & A. R. Co. v. Bradford, 113 Ga. 276, 38 S. E. 823. If at the time of the injury an ordinarily prudent person, in the exercise of that degree of care and caution which such a person generally uses, would have reasonably apprehended that the defendant might be negligent at the time when and place where the injury occurred, and, so apprehending the probability of the existence of such negligence, could have taken steps to have prevented the injury, then the person injured cannot recover, if he failed to exercise that degree of care and caution usually exercised by an ordinarily prudent person to ascertain whether the negligence which might have been reasonably apprehended really existed. See Western & A. R. Co. v. Bloomingdale, 74 Ga. 604, 611; Smith v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 82 Ga. 801, 10 S. E. 111; Jenkins v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 89 Ga. 756, 15 S. E. 655; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Attaque, 90 Ga. 657, 661, 16 S. E. 956; Macon & I. S. Street R. Co. v. Holmes, 103 Ga. 655, 30 S. E. 563; Lloyd v. City & Suburban R. Co. 110 Ga. 167, 35 S. E. 170. If there is anything present at the time and place of the injury which would cause an ordinarily prudent person to reasonably apprehend the probability, even if not the possibility, of danger to him in doing an act which he is about to perform, then he must take such steps as an ordinarily prudent person would take to ascertain whether such danger exists, as well as to avoid the consequences of the same after its existence is ascertained; and if he fails to do this, and is injured, he will not be allowed to recover, if by taking proper precautions he could have avoided the consequences of the negligence of the person inflicting the injury. A railroad track is a place of danger, and one who goes thereon is bound to know that he is going into a place where he is subject to the dangers incident to the operation of trains upon that track. See, in this connection, Comer v. Shaw, 98 Ga. 545, 25 S. E. 733; Lloyd v. City & Suburban R. Co. 110 Ga. 167, 35 S. E. 170. This is true without regard to the place where the track is,—whether in the country, where pedestrians are not expected to be, or at a public road crossing, or at a street crossing, or at the stations and depots of railroad companies, where persons are expected and invited to be present. No matter where the track is located, any person who goes upon the same is bound to know that he is going upon a place where his presence would be attended with more or less danger. What would or would not amount to negligence in the manner in which a person entered upon a railroad track would depend to a large extent upon the peculiar location of the place at which he went upon the track. An ordinarily prudent person in the possession of all his faculties would not attempt to cross a railroad track at any place without using at least his sense of sight, if not that of hearing, to determine whether at the time and place he was about to cross the same there were present any of those dangers which a person of ordinary intelligence would reasonably apprehend. In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 78 Ga. 700, 3 S. E. 399, it was, in effect, held that one is not bound to anticipate negligence when the law commands diligence for his protection at the hands of another, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, in the opinion in that case, saying: "If he [the plaintiff] had been on the crossing, or at any place he was by right entitled to be, he would have been warranted in assuming that the whole world would be diligent in respect to him and his safety." We do not understand this rule to mean that it is an act of ordinary prudence for a person to go blindly into a place which may or may not be dangerous, simply because the law has commanded those in charge of such place to do certain things, which, if faithfully performed, would render improbable, if not impossible, injury to anyone at that place. Ordinary care would itself require the use of the senses to ascertain whether there was at the particular time any danger in going into the place. An ordinarily prudent person would necessarily apprehend the possibility of danger, and would always act on such apprehension, and use his senses to determine whether or not it was safe to go into the place at the time that he was seeking to enter the same.

Applying the principles above referred to to the facts of the present case, we find that the plaintiff was about to cross a railroad track at a place where he was entitled to cross; that he knew that it was near the time for a train to approach; that he looked up the track in the direction from which the train was expected, and saw no train approaching; that he could see such a distance along the track that it would be impossible for a train, if running within the limit of speed prescribed by the ordinance of the city in which the track was located, to reach the place at which the plaintiff intended to cross the track before the plaintiff reached that point; that, acting upon the assumption that the train would approach in the manner prescribed by the ordinance, he walked a very short distance, being occupied only a few moments in doing so, and, without looking again to see if the train was approaching, stepped upon the track, and was struck by a train running at a high rate of speed. While there was a conflict in the evidence on some points, there was evidence from which the jury could find the facts to be as above stated, and we must deal with the case in its most favorable light for the plaintiff. It was the duty of the plaintiff, before he attempted to cross the railroad track, to at least use his senses to determine whether there was any danger in such act. He complied with this duty, and his circumstances were such that if the employees in charge of the train had operated it as they should have done, in conformity to the city ordinance, injury to him at the time and place that he stepped upon the track was an impossibility. After having looked up the track, and being able to see the distance that he said he could see, the plaintiff (there being no evidence showing that he had any reason to anticipate the contrary) had a right to assume that the persons in charge of the train would not violate the city ordinance regulating the rate of speed; and, in acting upon this assumption, it would seem that he was not guilty of negligence when he stepped upon the track. But, even if it cannot be said that he was entirely free from fault, neither can it be said that he failed entirely to exercise the care and prudence which an ordinarily prudent person would exercise for his own protection under similar circumstances.

There was no error of law complained of, and the verdict in the plaintiff's favor has met with the approval of the trial judge, and we cannot say that it is entirely unsupported by evidence. For this reason, we will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial.

GUARDS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

City of ATLANTA.

(113 Ga. 883.)

*1. Public property within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution

*Headnotes by COBB, J.

NOTE.—As to what is public property within the meaning of an exemption from taxation, see, in this series, People ex rel. New York v. Brooklyn (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 148, and note; Auditor General v. University of Michigan 54 L. R. A.

which authorizes the general assembly to exempt from taxation "all public property" embraces only such property as is owned by the state or some political division thereof, and title to which is vested directly in the state or one of its subordinate political divisions, or in some person holding exclusively for the benefit of the state or a subordinate public corporation.

2. It follows from the ruling stated in the preceding note that that portion of the act of the general assembly approved October 18, 1885, and now embodied in Pol. Code, § 1156, which declares that each armory "owned" and occupied by any command of the volunteer military forces of the state "shall be, to all intents and purposes, public property, . . . and as such public property . . . shall be exempt from any taxation, state, county, or municipal," is in violation of the Constitution, and therefore null and void.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the assessment of taxes against property owned by plaintiff in alleged violation of a statutory exemption. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James F. O'Neill for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. James L. Mayson and W. P. Hill, for defendant in error:

Taxation is the rule, and exemption from taxation the exception.

Exemption, being the exception to the general rule, is not favored; but every exception to be valid must be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, and when found to exist the enactment by which it is given will not be enlarged by construction, but, on the contrary, will be strictly construed.

Cooley, Taxn. 204, 205; Atlanta Street R. Co. v. Atlanta, 66 Ga. 104.

Under the Constitution of this state, no property, except that specifically mentioned therein, can be exempted from taxation.

The act declaring armories public property and exempting them from taxation was clearly unconstitutional.

The legislature cannot declare that public property which is not public property.

Cobb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 13, 1885, an act was approved which declared: "Each armory owned and occupied by any command of said volunteer forces shall be, to all intents and purposes, public property—that is to say, the state shall have the right to use the same for public purposes of a military character, to quarter troops therein in times of emergency, to be judged of by the commander-in-chief, and to otherwise use the same for military purposes, such use, however, to be consistent with the occupation of the same by said command holding the legal title thereto, and so as not to oust the said command therefrom, and as such public property, each said armory, and the land upon which it is situated while it is used and occupied as such, shall be exempt from any taxation, state, county, or municipal. The adjutant and inspector general shall see that all such armories are kept in serviceable condition, and shall report on the same to the commander-in-chief in his annual report. All rents or income of any portions of such armories shall be the property of the command owning the same. The state shall not appropriate any money for the repair of such buildings, but all repairs and other expenses incident to preserving and repairing such buildings shall be paid by the command owning the same." Acts 1884-85, p. 84, § 15 (Pol. Code, § 1156). Under the Constitution "the general assembly may, by law, exempt from taxation all public property." Civil Code, § 5884. The general assembly, under the authority thus granted, has declared that "all public property" shall be exempt from taxation. Pol. Code, § 762. In Mundy v. Van Hoose, 104 Ga. 299, 30 S. E. 783, Mr. Justice Little says: "Public property, in the sense as used in the provision for rendering property exempt, means property belonging to the state, or the political divisions thereof, such as counties, cities, towns, and the like." Taxation is the rule, and exemption the exception. Athens City Waterworks Co. v. Athens, 74 Ga. 413. The general assembly has no authority whatever to exempt from taxation any species of property except those specifically mentioned in the Constitution. Anyone claiming an exemption from taxation must show an act of the general assembly, passed in pursuance of the Constitution, authorizing the exemption; and in construing such an act every doubt is to be resolved in favor of taxation and against exemption. In the present case an effort is made to enforce an attempt by the general assembly to exempt from taxation the property of a private corporation known as the "Board of Trustees of the Gate City Guards." The exemption from taxation is claimed under that part of the act above referred to which declares that an armory owned and occupied by the volunteer military forces of the state shall be public property to all intents and purposes. It is not pretended that the building in which the armory of the Gate City Guards is located is owned by the state, or any political division thereof, or that the corporation which holds the title to the building holds it exclusively for the benefit of the state, or a subordinate public corporation. It is claimed, however, that a portion of the building is used entirely for purposes which are of a public nature; and that, while the corporation derives an income from the remaining portion of the building, this income, after paying the debts of the corporation incurred in the erection and maintenance of the property, is used exclusively for public purposes in maintaining the military company known as the "Gate City Guards," which is a part of the regular volunteer military forces of the state. That private property is used exclusively for public purposes does not change the nature of the property, or the title thereto, so as to convert it into public property. It is not necessary in the present case to determine who would be the owners of this property in the event it should ever cease to be used for the purposes for which the military company was organized and the property acquired, but it is sufficient to determine, as it can be without difficulty decided, under the facts of the present case, that neither the legal nor equitable title to the property is in the state, or any political division thereof. It is therefore not public property, within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution which declares that the general assembly shall have authority to exempt public property from taxation. Private property cannot be converted into public property by the simple declaration of the general assembly; and especially is this true when the purpose of the declaration is to relieve private property from a burden which the Constitution says in unmistakable terms shall be borne by it for the benefit of the public. The act of 1885 above referred to, which attempted to exempt from taxation armories owned by military companies, is unconstitutional and void, and the court did not err in so treating it, and in holding that the armory owned by the Board of Trustees of the Gate City Guards was subject to taxation at the instance of the authorities of the city of Atlanta.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Lincoln County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover possession of two mules. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John I. West and Charles A. Ploquet for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Colley & Sims for defendants in error.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An action of bail trover was instituted against Burch in the superior court of Lincoln county to recover possession of two mules. The plaintiffs were Pedigo & Lyons, suing for the use of B. H. Willis, and it appears from an admission of the parties that Burch gave to Pedigo & Lyons a promissory note for the purchase price of the mules, which note contained a reservation of title in Pedigo & Lyons as security for the purchase money of the mules; said reservation being to Pedigo & Lyons or order, until said note was paid. Defendant, by his plea, set up that Willis was not a bona fide holder of the note for value before it became due, but that he held the same for the payee, and took the same after due with full notice, and that the note was given as a balance due on two mules, but that the payees had previously sold to the defendant a horse which failed to come up to a warranty which was made as to her soundness; hence there was a failure of consideration in the purchase of said horse of $165; that the payees had agreed to refund him that sum, but had never done so, and he pleaded it as a set-off to this action. The note which was given for the mules was dated February 17, 1897, and due March 15, 1897. The transfer to Willis was written on the note in the following language: "For value received, we hereby transfer to B. H. Willis or order all our right and title to the within note, without any recourse on us. This, the 14th day of March, 1899;" and signed, "Pedigo & Lyons." It was admitted by the defendant that he was in possession of the property sued for. With this admission the plaintiff, having introduced the note referred to, closed. The defendant testified, in substance and in detail, to the facts set up in his plea, which evidence was, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, ruled out as irrelevant. There was no further evidence in the case except that Willis, who is described as the usee, testified that the note did not belong to Pedigo & Lyons, the payees, but was his property, and was transferred to him for value received, without any understanding in relation thereto. He also testified that he knew nothing of any differences between the parties to the note in having a settlement, and that it was not put in his name for the purpose of bringing the suit, and that he knew nothing of the defendant having a claim against the payees until after he had bought the note, and that the mules were worth $150. It was also shown that the note was duly recorded. Under the evidence the presiding judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff, as follows: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff the sum of $161, same being the face of the note, and interest thereon from maturity, and — dollars, cost of suit." A judgment was rendered for the sums named against the defendant and the surety on his bail bond. The defendant made a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence. That the trial judge erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff, and in excluding from the jury the evidence of the defendant, and in refusing to permit defendant's attorney to prove by the usee in the action what amount he paid for the note which was in evidence. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

It must be borne in mind that the action instituted was that of trover. We think that it is somewhat inconsistent, under the rules governing actions of this character, that one man should sue for the use of another, inasmuch as no one can recover as plaintiff unless he shows three things,—right of possession of the property in himself, wrongful conversion by the defendant, and the value. This court ruled in the case of Mitchell v. Georgia & A. R. Co. 111 Ga. 760, 51 L. R. A. 622, 36 S. E. 971, that, "while . . . 'mere possession of a chattel . . . will give a right of action for any interference therewith,' such possession must be in the plaintiff's own right, and not as agent of another;" and in the same case that "a petition brought in the name of a person who had not such a possession, to recover personal property taken from him, cannot be so amended as to proceed in the name of the plaintiff for the use of the real owner." In delivering the opinion in that case, in which very many of the principles applicable to the action of trover are contained, Mr. Justice Cobb said: "When, therefore, it appears that the legal right of action is not in the plaintiff, he has no right of action at all, either in his own name or in that of another." However, as no exception was taken to the form of the action by demurrer or otherwise, we will interpose none. Furthermore, it may be remarked, before passing to the main question which we think controls the case, that defendant pleaded a set-off. That such a plea cannot be interposed in an action of trover, see Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 38 S. E. 100. Again, the trial judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the note given for the balance of the purchase money of the mules. This, we think, was clearly error. Indeed, we do not understand how the note had anything to do with the issues arising in this case, except, perhaps, for the purpose of showing that title to the mules was reserved to the seller. An action of trover is one to recover possession of an article which has been wrongfully taken from the possession of the plaintiff. The verdict ordinarily to be rendered thereon is either for the plaintiff or for the defendant. If a verdict is rendered for the plaintiff, its legal effect is that he shall have the property sued for; but by § 5335 of the Civil Code it is declared that the plaintiff shall have an option of saying whether he will demand a verdict for damages or for the property and its hire, and it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury to render a verdict as he should thus elect (if he should be entitled to recover). While a money verdict may be found for the plaintiff in an action of trover, it but represents the damages he has sustained, and by another rule the amount of such damages may be the highest proved value of the property. In this case it does not appear that any election was made by the plaintiff at the trial. Considering the verdict alone, it was error on the part of the trial judge to instruct the jury to find a given sum of money in favor of the plaintiff.

But the controlling issue which compels a reversal in this case is that neither the plaintiff in the case nor his usee showed title to the property to recover which the suit was instituted to be in either, and this is easily determined from certain undisputed facts which appear in the record. These were: Pedigo & Lyons were the payees of the note given for the balance of the purchase money of the mules. In that note title to the mules was reserved to Pedigo & Lyons or order, until said note was paid. Pedigo & Lyons, for value received, transferred all their right and title to the note, without recourse on them, to Willis or order. The effect of the reservation was, of course, to keep the title in Pedigo & Lyons until the purchase money was paid. But it must be noted that there is no evidence that they gave to Willis any title to the property. The transfer written on the back cannot have this effect, for the matter transferred is the note; and while the transfer of a note reserving title may, if the transfer is unconditional, carry to the transferee title to the property, which by the terms of the note is reserved to the payee, yet, when that transfer is made by the payee, subject to the condition that the transferee shall have no recourse on the transferrer in the event of nonpayment, then an entirely different rule prevails. Pedigo & Lyons, by virtue of this contract, which it was agreed was in the form of a negotiable instrument, held title to the mules until the note was paid. Such a title is sufficient to sustain an action of trover. It was in their power to transfer alone the debt represented by the note to another. It was also in their power to transfer, not only the debt, but also the title to secure the debt, which they had reserved. But when Pedigo & Lyons sold the note, and received value for it, their debt was paid; and if they sold or transferred the note, without at the time conveying to the purchaser the title to the property which they held as security for its payment, then the purchaser took the debt, the debt of Pedigo & Lyons was paid, and the title which they held as security for that debt, not having been conveyed, vested at once in the maker of the note, because of the fact that Pedigo & Lyons could have no further interest in the property. Their debt, to secure the payment of which only was title in them reserved, having been paid, title was divested. It did not vest in the purchaser of the note because it was not transferred with the note. It therefore vested at once in the maker of the note. In the case of Farrar v. Brackett, 86 Ga. 463, 12 S. E. 686, the facts were that Farrar sued Brackett in bail trover for a steam engine and two sawmills. It also appeared that Farrar had purchased from Hill the notes given for one of the mills, but did not receive from Hill a conveyance of the mill, title to which had been reserved as security for the purchase money, but that Hill transferred simply the purchase-money notes to Farrar, without recourse. This court denied Farrar's right to recover in trover, and said: The transfer without recourse of notes given for part of the price of a mill did not place the title to the mill in the person taking the notes, because when the person transferring them received the money thereon he was paid, and the title to the mill passed into the maker of the notes, of whom the purchaser of them was but an ordinary creditor. This ruling clearly denies both to Pedigo & Lyons and to Willis the right of recovery in an action of trover, under the evidence in this case; for the debt to Pedigo & Lyons was paid by the sale of the note to Willis, and the title to the mules, which the former had retained to secure their debt, was extinguished by the payment of their debt. Hence, no further liability on the note could attach to Pedigo & Lyons, because they transferred the note without recourse, and Willis could not recover because he had no title to the mules, inasmuch as the title which Pedigo & Lyons held had never been transferred to him.

Therefore it must be ruled that when Pedigo & Lyons transferred the purchase-money note which contained the reservation of title without recourse, to Willis, not only was the title of Pedigo & Lyons extinguished, but, the debt having been paid, this title vested in the maker of the note.

The verdict was therefore contrary to law, and the judgment overruling the motion for new trial is reversed.

FLORIDA CENTRAL & PENINSULAR RAILROAD COMPANY.

(118 Ga. 1105.)

*A railroad company is not liable for damages resulting from an assault and battery inflicted by its station agent and another upon a third person, when it appears that the difficulty which gave rise to the beating arose out of a personal quarrel, and that the agent, so far as related to his participation therein, was acting upon his individual responsibility, and not within the scope of the business of his agency as an employee of the company.

(July 23, 1901.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Effingham County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for an assault alleged to have been committed on plaintiff by defendant's agent. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. D. H. Clark for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Denmark, Adams, & Freeman, for defendant in error:

This case is covered and controlled by the principles laid down in—

Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 495, 25 S. E. 565; City Electric R. Co. v. Shropshire, 101 Ga. 33, 28 S. E. 508; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Hopkins, 108 Ga. 324, 33 S. E. 965.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It cannot be denied that the plaintiff was very imprudent in his actions towards the agent of defendant, in refusing to obey his instructions in reference to driving into the cut with his loaded wagon, and it is apparent from the evidence that he drew the difficulty in which he was injured upon himself. The station agent presumably represented the railroad company in an attempt to enforce against the plaintiff certain regulations in relation to the loading of cars, which the agent claimed existed. It was, as will be seen from the report of the evidence, a reprehensible act on the part of the plaintiff, not only to refuse to conform to such regulations, but also in denying the right of the agent to enforce them. It was not becoming in him to question the authority of the agent to enforce the regulations which the latter said existed. He should have submitted, and made his complaint to the proper and superior authority, and obtained redress in that way.

Two other things are also apparent from the evidence. The first is that the injuries from which the plaintiff really suffered were not by the younger Simmons, who was the company's agent, but by his father, and, also, at the time he received the beating, he had not approached the agent on the business of the company, but to settle a personal grievance. Surely, no one can entertain such a distorted view of the law as to claim that the railroad company was responsible to the plaintiff for a battery inflicted upon him by the elder Simmons, who, so far as the evidence shows, was not connected with the railroad company in any capacity. Nor can it be successfully claimed that if the plaintiff sought the younger Simmons, even on the premises of the railroad company, for the purpose of adjusting a private grievance, although the one so sought was at the time its agent, the company would be held liable for personal injuries inflicted on the plaintiff by such agent, as the result of an unsuccessful effort to adjust their personal differences. The rules of law which control the question of the liability of a master to respond in damages for a tort of this character, committed by its agent on a third person, have been repeatedly considered by this court. In the case of Christian v. Columbus & R. R. Co. 79 Ga. 460, 7 S. E. 216, it was ruled that a railroad company was liable in damages for the wrongful homicide of its customer committed by its depot agent in its office while the customer was lawfully there for the transaction of business with such agent pertaining to his agency. When the same case was for the third time before this court, as reported in Columbus & R. R. Co. v. Christian, 97 Ga. 56, 25 S. E. 411, the proposition of law announced in the first decision of the case was more fully explained, and this court ruled that "for the wrongful act of an employee of a railroad company resulting in injury to another, committed while engaged in the performance of the company's business in the line of his duty, the company is liable. But if, while so engaged, upon account of some private feud previously existing or suddenly arising, wholly disconnected with his duties as such employee, and not pertaining to the business then in process of transaction (the company then not owing to the other person the duty of personal protection), he commit injury upon the person of another, the company would not be liable." In delivering the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Atkinson, further elaborating the proposition of law then in question, said: "If, while the employee is engaged about the business of the master, upon some matter or some provocation wholly disconnected with the performance of his duties as a servant, upon some private feud, in an altercation with a third person, he should commit an injury upon such third person, such injury would not fall within the class for which the master is liable, unless it be a case in which, by reason of the relation existing between the person thus injured and the railroad company, the latter owed to the former the special duty of personal protection," etc. Again, in the case of Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 495, 25 S. E. 565, where the facts brought into consideration the principle of law we are now considering, this court ruled that if the real purpose of the person assaulted, in returning to the station, was not to look after or arrange for checking baggage, or to attend to other legitimate business with the agent, but merely to upbraid him for a real or supposed breach of duty occurring at an earlier hour of the day, and the difficulty thereupon ensued, the two met as ordinary citizens, and the railroad company had no concern in what passed between them. In delivering the opinion in that case Mr. Justice Lumpkin, stated the proposition that if the injured person went to the station to attend to business connected with the railroad company, and conducted himself properly, he was entitled to respectful treatment from the agent, "and if the latter, under these circumstances, unlawfully assaulted and beat him, it was his right to hold the company responsible in damages." And he also there said: "It may, in this connection, be proper to add, however, that, even if Richmond went to the station for the lawful purpose of attending to the business above mentioned, it was nevertheless incumbent upon him to treat the agent with the same respect due him by the agent. Therefore, if, instead of so doing, he without provocation used insulting or opprobrious language to the agent, which naturally enough resulted in a difficulty, the company should not be held responsible." Mr. Justice Lumpkin also said in the case of City Electric R. Co. v. Shropshire, 101 Ga. 37, 28 S. E. 508, that "one who voluntarily, and by his own misconduct, places it beyond the power of a master to protect him, surely cannot complain of an omission so to do. Especially is this true where he practically invites the master's servant to disregard and abandon his official duties, and enter into a personal encounter on his own account and upon his individual responsibility." See also, Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Hopkins, 108 54 L. R. A.

Ga. 324, 33 S. E. 965. According to the testimony of the plaintiff himself, he repeatedly persisted in driving his wagon within the cut next the side track, which the agent insisted that he must not do, as it was in violation of a rule established by the company. Paying no heed to the repeated remonstrances of the agent, he sought advice from another employee of the railroad company, not shown to have had any connection whatever with the care of the station and ground, and then apparently defied the authority of the agent to compel him to desist from doing what he had been forbidden. Not only so, but he also subsequently left the car in which he was placing his wood, and sought the father of the agent, who was engaged in the same work some hundred yards down the track, for the purpose, as he states, of getting the father to tell his son not to go down there any more to disturb him, telling the father of the treatment which the son had given him. Then, at the request of the father, they both walked up to the warehouse, and the agent was asked by his father whether he had insulted the plaintiff, and, receiving a reply that he had not, the father and the plaintiff became engaged in an altercation in which the agent participated. So that it is evident that plaintiff did not go to the warehouse, at the time, because of any business he had with the plaintiff as agent of the company, but for the purpose of adjusting a personal grievance, and, if it was not adjusted in a manner entirely agreeable to him, he should not attribute the fault to the railroad company. It was purely a personal matter between the three, and, if the plaintiff has any cause to complain, it is against the individuals who inflicted the injuries upon him, and not against the railroad company, who at that time owed him no duty of protection. There was no error in the judgment awarding a nonsuit.

*An action by a father to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter is barred by the statute of limitations, unless brought within two years from the time the right of action accrued.

recover damages for the seduction of plaintiff's daughter. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George M. Warren for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Alfred Herrington for defendant in error.

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit brought by a father to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter, who, according to the petition, was unmarried and living with him at the time the cause of action arose. At the trial, "after the plaintiff had closed his evidence, the defendant swore a number of witnesses, and then moved orally to dismiss plaintiff's case upon the ground that the declaration showed upon its face that the case was barred by the statute of limitations. The plaintiff then introduced in evidence the suit as originally brought between the parties for the same subject-matter, filed October 1, 1895, . . . and the order withdrawing the same at October adjourned term, 1896, prior to the filing of the present suit [on the] 22d day of January, 1897 Defendant then renewed his motion to dismiss plaintiff's suit." The court sustained the motion, and the plaintiff excepted.

It is contended here by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the motion to dismiss, being predicated upon a ground that would not have been good in arrest of judgment, should have been made at the appearance term, and could not have been lawfully entertained by the court during the trial of the case. So far as appears from the bill of exceptions or the record, this is the first time that this point has been raised. It does not appear that any objection was made to the court's entertaining and passing upon the motion to dismiss. This court can only determine questions which were raised in the court below. As no objection appears to have been made to the motion to dismiss, the plaintiff will be presumed to have waived any valid objection, if such there were, which might have been made thereto. The only ruling which appears to have been made by the trial court was upon the merits of the motion. Consequently the only question properly before this court for decision is whether or not the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations when the original suit was brought. The defendant in error contends that, under § 3900 of the Civil Code, it was then barred, as more than two years had elapsed after the right of action accrued. The section cited reads as follows: "Actions for injuries done to the person shall be brought within two years after the right of action accrues, except for injuries to the reputation, which shall be brought within one year." Is a suit brought by a father for the seduction of his daughter, within the meaning of this section of the Civil Code, a suit "for injuries done to the person?" A similar question arose in Johnson v. Bradstreet Co. 87 Ga. 79, 13 S. E. 250, and the decision therein rendered is decidedly in point. There the statute under consideration amended § 2967 of the Code of 1882, which provided that no action for a tort should "abate by the death of either party where the wrongdoer received any benefit from the tort complained of," by providing that no action "for homicide, injury to the person, or injury to property shall abate by death," and the question which invoked a construction of the amending statute was whether an action for libel was abated by the death of the plaintiff. The decision was that the action did not abate in consequence of the death of the plaintiff, it being held that the words "injury to the person" were not restricted to mere bodily or physical injuries, but extended "to all injuries to the person." Mr. Justice Lumpkin, who delivered the opinion, said: "Some light is thrown upon the question at issue by reference to the position which the amended section occupies in the Code. Title 8 of part 2 of the Code treats of 'torts, or injuries to persons or property.' Chapter 2 of that article deals with 'injuries to the person.' This chapter is divided into three articles. The first treats of 'physical injuries,' the second of 'injuries to reputation,' and the third of 'other injuries to the person.' According to this classification, it will be seen that injuries to reputation are included in the chapter dealing generally with injuries to the person. The article relating to physical injuries treats only of injuries to the body; that relating to the reputation includes and defines libel and slander; and the remaining article of that chapter deals with still other personal injuries, such as false imprisonment, malicious arrest, and injuries to health. All of the foregoing injuries, as has been shown, are classed under the general subdivision covering injuries to the person. It is more than probable that the legislature, in making this new law a part of the Code, intended that it should harmonize with its surroundings; and in amending this section it was doubtless their deliberate purpose that the words used in the amending act should be construed and understood with reference to the existing arrangement and classification of the law of torts, in which this new law found its place." Now, if we look further into the classification of the law of torts than it was necessary for the learned justice to do in the case which the court then had under consideration, we find that § 4 of art. 3, the title of which article is, "Other Torts to the Person," treats of "indirect injuries to the person," and that under this designation are grouped the section of the Code giving a husband "a right of action against another for abducting or harboring his wife;" the section giving a husband a right of action "for adultery, or criminal conversation with" his wife; the section giving a father, "or to the mother, if the father be dead, or absent permanently, or refuses to sue, a right of action for the seduction of a daughter, unmarried and living with her parent;" and the sections giving "a father, or if the father be dead a mother," a right of action "against any person who sells or furnishes spirituous liquors to his or her son, under age, for his own use, and without his or her permission," and "a like right of action against any person who shall play and bet at any games of chance with a minor son for money or other thing of value." In our present Civil Code these same sections are found under the subtitle "Indirect Injuries to the Person," and all that appears above in reference to the classification of the law of torts in the Code of 1882 applies to the Civil Code. It is, we think, therefore evident that the meaning of the expression "injuries to the person," as understood by the codifiers, and within the scheme of classification adopted in the Code, was not confined to mere physical or bodily injuries, but embraced all actionable injuries to the individual himself, as distinguished from injuries to his property, and equally evident that in the opinion of the codifiers the seduction of an unmarried daughter, living with her parent, was, relatively to that parent, an indirect injury to the person. In reference to actions for torts our statute of limitations provides: "All actions for trespass upon or damages to realty shall be brought within four years after the right of action accrues." "Actions for injuries to personalty shall be brought within four years after the right of action accrues." "Actions for injuries done to the person shall be brought within two years after the right of action accrues, except for injuries to the reputation, which shall be brought within one year." Civil Code, §§ 3898-3900. Here we find that torts to property are divided into torts to realty and torts to personalty, though the time within which suit may be brought is four years in each instance. We find only one section, and, indeed, only one sentence, devoted to the limitation of actions for torts which do not invade property rights. That section fixes the limitation for actions for "injuries done to the person," and provides that suits for such injuries must be brought within two years after the right of action accrues, except in the case of injuries to the reputation, where the limitation on the right to sue is one year. So, if the expression or classification "injuries done to the person" includes only injuries inflicted upon the physical man or bodily organization, then, except as to injuries to the reputation, there seems to be no limitation provided in the Code for suits based upon any of the other torts which do not infringe upon or affect property rights, but each of which, under express provisions of the Code, affords a cause of action to the injured party. It is not reasonable to suppose that our lawmakers intended that there should be no limitation for suits for adultery or criminal conversation with a wife, for actions for abducting or harboring a wife, for suits for selling liquors to a minor son without the consent of his parent, for actions for gambling with a minor son, and for actions for the seduction of a daughter. Unless the actions for injuries which may be brought in these respective cases come within the meaning of the expression or classification "injuries done to the person," we have been unable to find any limitation in the Code upon the right to sue for such injuries, or any one of them. Surely the failure to provide a special limitation for each of these actions, or to specifically include them all under one general statutory limitation, was not the result of oversight on the part of our legislators and codifiers. Is it not more reasonable to believe that this failure was due to the fact that the makers of our laws believed that actions in these cases were limited by the section which deals with actions "for injuries done to the person," and that they intended that they should be? We think, however, that § 3900 of the Civil Code itself shows that the expression "injuries done to the person," as therein used, includes not only injuries to the physical body, but every other injury, for which an action may be brought, done to the individual, and not to his property. This is shown by the fact that "injuries to the reputation" are specially excepted from the operation of the limitation provided for actions "for injuries done to the person." Why this exception, if "injuries done to the person" include only injuries to the bodily organization? Section 5 of the statute of limitations of March 6, 1856, provided: "All suits for injuries done to the person shall be brought within two years after the right of action accrues, and not after." Section 6 of that act provided: "All suits for injuries done to the character or reputation shall be brought within one year from the time the right of action accrues and not after." It is significant that, when the laws of this state were first codified, these two separate sections of the statute of limitations were merged into, not only one section, but into one sentence, and so merged that the conclusion is irresistible that in the opinion of the codifiers, and of the general assembly which adopted that Code as a body of laws for the state, the expression or classification "injuries done to the person," as used in the statute of limitations, included personal injuries other than injuries to the body, and that it was their intention that it should. Section 3900 of the Civil Code is in the exact language of § 2992 of our first Code, and the same language has been employed in each of the intervening Codes. So, the codifiers of the original Code and the codifiers of each subsequent Code have included "injuries to the reputation" under the general classification "injuries done to the person," and then, by express exception, have provided that the limitation of two years applied generally to all actions "for injuries done to the person" shall not apply to suits for "injuries to the reputation," but that actions for such injuries shall be brought within one year after the right of action accrues. Both the classification and the exception have twice received the sanction and approval of the general assembly, as the Code of 1863 and the Code of 1895 were each adopted by legislative enactment. An injury to the reputation is an injury of an intangible character, of which there is no evidence in or on the bodily organization, and which can only affect the physical man indirectly, through the subtle influence of the mind over the bodily processes and the physical health. That such an injury as this was classed by our lawmakers among "injuries done to the person," we think, clearly shows that they intended by "injuries done to the person," all injuries for which an action would lie, done to the individual, as distinguished from injuries done to his property.

Our statute giving a right of action for the seduction of an unmarried daughter living with her parent sweeps away the flimsy fiction of the common law that a suit by a father for the seduction of his daughter can only be based on the relation of master and servant between the two, and must therefore be for the loss of the daughter's services, although when the plaintiff has thus brought his suit he can recover for the real wrong and injury inflicted upon him. In this state "the seduction is the gist of the action," and "no loss of service need be alleged or proved." Civil Code, § 3870. Section 3899 of the Civil Code, which provides the limitation within which suits for injuries to personalty may be brought, cannot, therefore, apply to such an action; for "the gist of the action" is what must be looked to in determining whether it is an action for injuries to personalty, or one "for injuries done to the person." The real gravamen of the action is the shame, mortification, humiliation, and sense of family dishonor and disgrace from which the plaintiff suffers. "The gist of the action" being, not any property right of the parent in the services of his daughter, but the seduction itself, for which, "in well-defined cases, the damages should be exemplary," it is clear that within the intent and meaning of our Code, and under the decision in Johnson v. Bradstreet Co. 87 Ga. 79, 13 S. E. 250, the expression "injuries done to the person," as used in our statute of limitations, includes the injuries inflicted upon a father by the seduction of his daughter.

Irrespective of the considerations above presented, there is excellent outside authority for holding that the expression "injuries done to the person," used in a statute, includes the injuries inflicted upon a father by the seduction of his daughter. This will be seen by reference to the elaborate and able opinion in Johnson v. Bradstreet Co. 87 Ga. 79, 13 S. E. 250, where Mr. Justice Lumpkin discusses the meaning of the words "injury to person" in the light of the common law, and subsequently cites the following authorities, which are very much in point in the present case: On page 84, 87 Ga., and page 252, 13 S. E., he says: "Aside from this, the following authorities seem to sustain our judgment in the case before us: In the case of Oregin v. Brooklyn Crosstown R. Co. 75 N. Y. 192, 31 Am. Rep. 459, construing the meaning of the words 'actions on the case for injuries to the person of the plaintiff,' found in a New York statute, the court held that these words included actions for slander, libel, assault and battery, and false imprisonment, and that cases of this kind were to be treated as actions for injuries done to the person of the plaintiff. Under § 2157 of the Code of Alabama, actions for injuries to the person or reputation are abated by the death of a party. Construing this section in the case of Garrison v. Burden, 40 Ala. 513, it was held that an action to recover damages for the seduction of the plaintiff's wife was an action for injuries to the person, and therefore, under the section cited, abated by the death of the defendant. Judge, J., says: 'Is adultery or criminal conversation with the wife, in legal contemplation, an injury to the person of the husband? Blackstone and Chitty both declare that it is, . . . and upon this point we are not aware there is any conflict of authority.' This case, in effect, rules that injuries to the person are not confined to physical injuries. In the case of Delamater v. Russell, 4 How. Pr. 234, it was held that an action for criminal conversation with the plaintiff's wife was an action for injury to the person of the plaintiff. Parker, J., says 'Rights of persons are divided into absolute and relative. Criminal conversation is classed under actions for injuries to the latter. This classification is related by all our elementary writers.'

As it clearly appeared that the original action in the case under consideration was brought more than two years after the right of action accrued, there was no error in sustaining the motion to dismiss the case.

or relative of her father, as those words are used in a statute designating the persons who may be beneficiaries in certificates of mutual benefit associations.

2. No relation of dependency exists between an illegitimate child of a married woman and her putative father, so as to entitle her to become a beneficiary in a benefit certificate issued to him, under a statutory provision as to "persons dependent" on him, where he merely boards with her mother, paying his board when able, and is under no legal obligation to support the child.

(February 27, 1901.)

APPEAL by claimant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Bristol County denying her claim to the proceeds of a benefit fund owing by the defendant society because of the death of Alexander Lavigne, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. Elmer Wood, for appellant:

The designation of Miralda Chasse, the illegitimate daughter of Alexander Lavigne, is a valid designation in form and manner.

Anthony v. Massachusetts Ben. Asso. 158 Mass. 322, 33 N. E. 577.

The claimant, in order to recover, must be either a relative of Alexander Lavigne or a person dependent upon him.

Acts 1894, chap. 367, § 8.

The word "relative" in this connection is construed liberally in every jurisdiction, and not strictly as in statutes relating to succession or inheritance, and in the construction of wills.

Alexander Lavigne boarded with claimant's mother and paid his board while he was able, and that payment formed part of the support of claimant. She was therefore, to that extent, dependent upon him,—quite as much as though he had contributed the same sum of money directly for the living expenses of the house, himself living there.

Mr. Hugo A. Dubuque, for appellee:

Inasmuch as the by-laws of the defendant society give the mortuary benefits to the "legal beneficiary of a deceased member," we must look to the statutes in force at the time of the designation, to wit, November 2, 1896, to find who the "legal beneficiary" is.

Brierly v. Equitable Aid Union, 170 Mass. 220, 48 N. E. 1090.

If that is so, then the legal beneficiaries in this case must be the "husband, wife, affianced husband, affianced wife, relatives of, or persons dependent upon, such members." Stat. 1894, chap. 367, § 8.

If the claimant is entitled to the benefits in this case, she must come under the term of a "relative" or a "person dependent" upon the deceased.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time of his death the plaintiff's testator was a member in good standing of the defendant corporation, which is a beneficiary association. The association admits that it has in its hands $680 as mortuary benefits of the deceased, and is ready to pay it to the plaintiff or the claimant, as the court may decide. There are no other claimants. Marilda Chasse, the claimant, is the illegitimate child of the testator. The plaintiff is the testator's sister, and is executrix of his will, which has been duly proved and allowed. By this will he left to his sister the benefits coming to him from the association. He also made her residuary legatee. Afterwards, by an instrument in writing, he designated said Marilda Chasse as the beneficiary entitled to all mortuary or other benefits coming to him or his beneficiary from the association; describing her in the instrument as his natural child, and alleging that the designation was made in recognition of his moral duty to support her. He never contributed to her support, except in the sense in which he did so by paying his board, when able, to her mother, with whom he boarded. The mother kept other boarders and took in washing. The plaintiff paid his dues to the defendant society, and advanced him money for his board, medical care, and attendance. Without such assistance on her part, his membership in the society during the last year of his life would have lapsed, and he would have lost the sick benefits which he received, and the mortuary benefits at his death, for which this action has been brought. The question is whether the said Marilda Chasse was or could be legally designated as the beneficiary, in accordance with article 28 of the by-laws of the association, that the "widow or other legal beneficiary of the deceased member shall be entitled," etc., and the statutes applicable to such associations.

This association was organized under Stat. 1888, chap. 429. By that statute the beneficiary was limited to "the husband, wife, children, relatives of or persons dependent on such member." The statute has since been extended so as to include affianced husband and affianced wife (Stat. 1890, chap. 341, § 1; Stat. 1894, chap. 367, § 8), and child by legal adoption and parent by legal adoption (Stat. 1898, chap. 474, § 11; Stat. 1899, chap. 442, § 11), but the other beneficiaries remain the same. No one outside of the classes thus named can be a beneficiary. Brierly v. Equitable Aid Union, 170 Mass. 218, 48 N. E. 1090; Supreme Council A. L. of H. v. Perry, 140 Mass. 580, 5 N. E. 634. Is the claimant a child of, or a relative of, or a person dependent upon, the deceased member, within the meaning of the statute? By "children," as that word is used in the statute, is meant, we think, legitimate children. Kent v. Barker, 2 Gray, 535; 2 Jarman, Wills, 6th Am. ed. 1076. The word "relatives" is of broader scope, but manifestly cannot be held to include an illegitimate child. Esty v. Clark, 101 Mass. 36, 3 Am. Rep. 320; Kimball v. Story, 108 Mass. 382; Elliot v. Fessenden, 83 Me. 197, 13 L. R. A. 37, 22 Atl. 115. The attempted designation of the claimant as a beneficiary must be regarded, therefore, as invalid. Neither do we think that, within any fair construction of the words, she can be considered a dependent upon him. He contributed no more to her support than any one of the other boarders whom her mother took, and, as matters stood, he was under no legal obligation to support her. In no just sense can there be said to have been, directly or indirectly, a relation of dependency between the child and its putative father. See McCarthy v. Supreme Lodge N. E. O. of P. 153 Mass. 314, 11 L. R. A. 144, 26 N. E. 866; Elsev v. Odd Fellows' Mut. Relief Asso. 142 Mass. 224, 7 N. E. 844. The association admits that either the plaintiff or the claimant is entitled to the fund. For reasons which have been given, we think that the claimant is not entitled to it. It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to it.

Judgment affirmed.

That the fund reached by a general creditors' bill against an insolvent building and loan association is all absorbed by prior claims not secured by mortgage or other fixed lien, so that the one who instigated it will receive nothing, will not prevent the allowance of a reasonable fee to his solicitors out of the fund, since their work was done for the benefit of all the distributees.

VII. Conclusion.

I. In general.

The attorneys for a creditor who brings a suit in behalf of himself and other creditors will ordinarily be allowed compensation out of the fund realized for creditors generally, if his services prove beneficial to them.

Thus, in Swedish-American Nat. Bank v. Davis, 71 Minn. 509, 74 N. W. 287, an allowance of counsel fees was granted to creditors who successfully opposed a fraudulent claim made against an insolvent estate, as a result of which the funds available for creditors generally was largely increased.

And where general creditors file a bill to have a mortgage for the exclusive security of the mortgagees declared a general assignment for the benefit of all the creditors, and a decree is rendered declaring it such, after which the mortgagee is allowed to share with the other creditors in the distribution of the fund, the attorney for the complainants will be allowed compensation out of the entire fund, instead of that remaining after deducting the debt of the mortgagee. Anniston Loan & T. Co. v. Ward, 108 Ala. 85, 18 So. 937.

And where a conveyance is intended as a deed of trust for creditors, in which three classes of creditors are preferred, and creditors of the third class bring a suit for themselves and other creditors similarly situated to have the convey-

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Chancery Appeals reversing a decree of the Chancery Court for Davidson County disallowing a petition for the payment of fees out of a fund belonging to the defendant society, which had been reached by a creditors' bill filed by petitioners' client. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court of Chancery Appeals, which was delivered by BARTON, J., and was as follows:

The question involved in this case is as to the right of John Ruhm & Son, solicitors and counsel for the original complainant, to have their fees paid out of a fund impounded in the case. The original bill was filed on November 12, 1897, by Ruhm & Son, who are lawyers and practicing solicitors, and declared a general assignment for creditors, in which they are successful, the fee of plaintiff's attorney will be allowed out of the fund in the hands of the trustee for creditors of the third class, but not out of that part of the fund for the first and second classes, as the suit is not for their interests. Lochte v. Bium, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 385, 30 S. W. 925. See also Fechheimer v. Baum, 43 Fed. 719, infra, IV. a.

And where unsecured creditors of a railroad company instituted proceedings on behalf of themselves and all other creditors of the same class who should come in and contribute to the expenses, to establish a lien on the property of the company in the hands of railroad companies which have purchased and are in possession of the same, in which they were successful, the court allowing all unsecured creditors to prove their claims, after which the defendant railroad companies purchased the claims of the plaintiffs and other unsecured creditors, the attorneys for plaintiffs, who had agreed to conduct the suit for plaintiffs for a specified compensation with the understanding that they might be allowed additional compensation out of the fund, will be allowed such extra compensation as to the demands of unsecured creditors who had made no special contract with them, and will be given a lien upon the property to secure the same, where such lien is authorized by the law of the state by which the rights of the parties are governed. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Pettus, 113 U. S. 116, 28 L. ed. 915, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387.

And where a creditor of an insolvent corporation, who has made an assignment for creditors, files a bill asking the court to assume jurisdiction of the assignment and require the trustee therein to give bond and to administer and settle the trust created by the assignment, and the trustee admits the necessity of the suit, and submits to the jurisdiction of the court, and executes a bond under its order, and refrains from bringing suit himself for that purpose, the attorney for such creditor is entitled to be allowed fees out of the fund for preparing and filing the bill and taking the necessary and proper orders to accomplish the purposes of the suit, although there was no apparent, immediate, or threatened danger of waste or destruction at the time the bill was filed; but he will not be allowed fees for contesting claims of persons against the estate, as that was primarily the duty of the assignees. Strong v. Taylor, 82 Ala. 213, 2 So. 760.

But no allowance for counsel fees will be for and in the name of James D. Campbell, against the defendant Provident Savings & Loan Society, as a general creditors' bill to wind up the defendant corporation as an insolvent corporation. The bill alleged that the complainant had been a member and stockholder in the defendant association; that, under the rules and regulations of the association, he had given notice to its officers to withdraw, and that under this notice he was entitled to withdraw the value of his stock, the amount of which he set out, and that by reason of the notice he had become a creditor, but that the officers of the association had failed and refused to pay him the amount claimed and due to him, and had failed and refused to take any steps; that he had also applied to the treasurer of the state, and had been informed that the corporation was an insolvent and non-going corporation. The bill also charged that the corporation was insolvent, had ceased to do business, and its officers and agents neglected and refused to pay its debts. By amendments it was shown that there were certain assets belonging to the corporation, and that certain foreclosure suits had been brought in its behalf against parties who had borrowed from it. It was charged that the bill was filed on behalf of complainant and all other creditors and stockholders of the corporation to wind up the defendant corporation as an insolvent corporation, and it was asked that the bill be allowed to be filed as a general creditors' bill; that all other suits against the corporation be enjoined; that a receiver be appointed to collect all of its assets; and that all of its assets be collected by the receiver to be appointed, and distributed among its proceeds in favor of a creditor who institutes proceedings under Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 4249, which result in an order directing that creditors be permitted to share in the distribution of the funds of an insolvent estate without filing releases, where nothing was added to the trust fund thereby, either directly or indirectly, and the estate was in no manner benefited by such action. Merrick v. Bonness, 66 Minn. 185, 68 N. W. 850; Swedish-American Nat. Bank v. Davis, 71 Minn. 509, 74 N. W. 287.

And where certain creditors of an assignor for creditors bring an action solely in their own behalf to secure priority in the distribution of the estate, their attorneys will not be allowed a fee out of the assigned estate, although the court retains the action to settle the rights and equities as between the defendants. Jaffray v. Steedman, 38 S. C. 557, 17 S. E. 38.

And where certain creditors intervene in an action in which a receiver has been appointed for a railroad, their attorney will not be allowed a fee either out of the general fund or a fund realized from the property remaining in the receiver's hands at the time of their intervention, where the receiver had obtained possession of all the property before such intervention, and the intervening creditors merely hastened the proceeding that they might realize out of it at an earlier date than they possibly would otherwise have done, and the attorney performed only such duties as diligent counsel would have performed on behalf of their own clients. Ober & Sons Co. v. Macon Constr. Co. 100 Ga. 635, 28 S. E. 388.

II. Suit to have conveyance set aside.

a. In general.

Where a creditors' suit is brought to have a conveyance set aside as fraudulent, the fees of plaintiff's counsel will be first paid out of the fund realized, where no rights except those of creditors are involved, and there are no priorities between them.

Thus, in Rains v. Rainey, 11 Humph. 261, the court said that of course the creditor collecting a fund by means of a creditors' bill would be entitled to an allowance for all expenses and costs necessarily incurred in doing so.

And in Bloomington v. Stein, 42 Ohio St. 168, which was an action by a creditor to have a note and warrant of attorney and judgment rendered thereon declared fraudulent as to creditors and for the appointment of a trustee and the subjection to the payment of debts of the proceeds of a levy made under the judgment, costs, including counsel fees, were ordered to be first paid out of the fund.

And where a creditor files a bill to set aside as fraudulent a conveyance by a trustee under a will, and to have creditors in whose favor the trustee had confessed judgments declared to have no preference, and to have an assignment for creditors executed by the trustee declared void, in all of which he is successful, his attorney will be allowed a fee out of the funds thus realized. Weed's Estate, 163 Pa. 600, 30 Atl. 278.

And where certain creditors of one who had made a cession of his property instituted a suit for the benefit of all the creditors to have the cession annulled as fraudulent, and succeeded in finding property which had been fraudulently omitted from the cession, and they sell all the property for the benefit of the creditors generally, their attorneys will be allowed a fee out of the fund, as the mass of creditors, received the benefit of what was done. Andrus v. His Creditors, 45 La. Ann. 1067, 13 So. 635; McGraw v. Andrus, 45 La. Ann. 1073, 13 So. 630.

And where a bill is filed in behalf of the complainant and all other creditors of a certain person to impeach a settlement by him and his wife and daughter, in which the complainant is successful, he will be allowed his costs as between solicitor and client as well as between party and party out of the fund realized and made available for the creditors by the diligence and at the risk of the complainant. Goldsmith v. Russell, 5 De G. M. & G. 547, 25 L. J. Ch. N. S. 232, 1 Jur. N. S. 985.

And a railroad bondholder, who, in behalf of himself and other bondholders, brings an action to have fraudulent conveyances by the trustee of a trust fund to secure payment of the bonds set aside and the trustee enjoined from selling any more land, and for the appointment of a receiver, by whose efforts a large amount of the trust fund is secured and saved, is entitled to have his counsel fees paid out of the fund. Internal Improv. Fund Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 26 L. ed. 1157.

And where a trustee in insolvency refuses to institute proceedings to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by the insolvent, and one of the creditors brings a suit for that purpose which is successful, the fee of his counsel will be allowed out of the estate. Re Leiman, 32 Md. 225, 3 Am. Rep. 132.

And where, on the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent firm, attorneys are employed by the general and unsecured creditors to contest the validity of chattel mortgages given by the creditors and stockholders according to law. This application was resisted. But the chancellor, by a decree, directed the bill to be filed, and it was sustained as a general creditors' bill. All other suits against the corporation were enjoined, and a receiver was appointed under this bill, and directed to collect all of its assets, and the receiver so appointed did proceed to collect the assets belonging to the corporation; and it is shown by an agreement filed to this record that the receiver had collected some $2,482.13, which had been disbursed under orders and decrees of the court in this cause. The court proceeded to wind up the defendant corporation as an insolvent corporation in this case, and to disburse the funds collected. An application was made by Ruhm & Son, counsel for the complainant, to be allowed fees out of the funds brought into the case, as counsel for the general creditors. A reference was had to the master, who reported that a reasonable fee to Ruhm & Son would be the sum of $200. No exception was made as to the amount. But the receiver in the case objected to the fee being allowed to Ruhm & Son on the ground that Campbell, the complainant, in whose name they had filed the bill, was a general creditor, and that the funds collected in the case had all been consumed by creditors who had prior claims. The chancellor sustained the position of the receiver, and disallowed the fees claimed. From this decree Ruhm & Son have appealed and assigned errors.

Besides the facts above stated, the only material facts necessary to be found are that we find that all of the funds which have been brought into this case were brought in under the original bill, and col-firm before the appointment of the receiver, who did nothing to defeat such mortgages, and the attorneys are successful in their efforts, the fees will be first paid from the sum realized through their efforts. Ohio Valley Nat. Bank v. Cummings, 21 Ohio C. C. 782.

And in a creditor's suit to set aside a chattel mortgage as preferential, in which the judgment declares that the mortgage is void as against plaintiff and such other creditors as may contribute to the expenses of the suit, and an appeal is taken on which the judgment is affirmed, the plaintiff is entitled to have the other creditors contribute to the costs of both the trial and the appeal as between solicitor and client as well as between party and party before coming in to share in the fund, and to avoid circuitry such costs will be directed to be paid out of the fund. Macdonald v. McCall, 12 Can. Pr. Rep. 9.

But Morton v. New Orleans & S. R. Co. & I. Asso. 79 Ala. 624, holds that the attorneys for a judgment creditor of an insolvent railroad company who seek to set aside a deed of trust for the benefit of certain bondholders will not be allowed a fee out of the fund where such deed is held valid and the principal efforts of the attorneys were solely for the benefit of their own clients and detrimental to the bondholders.

In Strike v. McDonald, 2 Harr. & G. 191, affirming 1 Bland, Ch. 57, the plaintiffs in a creditors' suit agreed to pay a specified per cent of the amount recovered to their attorneys, and after other creditors appeared the attorneys made a petition to the court showing the amount recovered, and the court awarded them their fees accordingly out of the fund. Subsequently the plaintiffs filed a petition in the case showing that one of the attorneys died after such award and before anything further was done by him, and that another attorney had been employed in his place, and asking that the same percentage be allowed to the latter which would have been given to the former if he had not died. The court, however, refused to consider the matter, stating that no objection to the allowance of the former attorney had previously been made, and that contracts between solicitors and their clients must be left to be decided in the same manner as all other contracts, and cannot be introduced into and blended with any pending suit.

In fixing the amount of fees to be allowed out of the fund to an attorney for general creditors who succeed in having chattel mortgages executed by the debtor declared invalid after the appointment of a receiver who did nothing in regard to the matter, the fact that the general creditors whom he represented were also liable to him for fees in the matter, the amount of the funds in the receiver's hands for distribution, the amount of the mortgages declared invalid, the compensation allowed the receiver and his attorney, and the value of the services rendered, should all be considered. Ohio Valley Nat. Bank v. Cummings, 21 Ohio C. C. 782.

b. From what part of fund allowance made.

The attorneys for the plaintiff will be allowed their fees out of the part of the fund going to creditors in the same class as the plaintiff, but no part of the fee will be allowed from funds going to prior creditors who are not benefited by the suit, or from that part of the fund which would go to persons other than creditors.

Thus, in a suit by creditors to set aside a fraudulent assignment in which other creditors intervene, the complainant's attorney will be allowed a fee out of the fund which is found to be payable to complainant and such intervening creditors. Adams v. Kehlor Milling Co. 88 Fed. 281.

And counsel fees allowed for setting aside a conveyance in fraud of creditors are not to be taken from the claims of specific lien holders who are not benefited, but from those of the general creditors for whom the property was secured. Richter v. Schoenfeldt, 1 Ohio L. J. 133.

And an attorney representing absent creditors in a suit to have a cession annulled as fraudulent will not be allowed a fee out of the general fund, but only out of the fund for such creditors. Andrus v. His Creditors, 46 La. Ann. 1351, 16 So. 215.

And where a judgment creditor of an insolvent railroad company seeks to set aside a deed of trust for the benefit of certain bondholders the attorneys of creditors holding a second lien, who filed a cross bill for the foreclosure of the trust deed, which was held to be valid, will be permitted to ask for reasonable fees from any surplus which may be left for the payment of holders of such second lien. Morton v. New Orleans & S. R. Co. & I. Asso. 79 Ala. 624.

The attorneys for plaintiff in a creditors' bill to vacate deeds for fraud are entitled to a fee out of the proceeds of a sale of the land to the extent that they may be applied to the creditors who may come in and share in the result of the suit; but if the land sells for more than enough to pay creditors, the balance should not be diminished by any portion of the fee, or, in other words, the fee should be deducted from the amount of proceeds applied to creditors' claims. Wagner v. Mara, 27 S. C. 97, 2 S. E. 844.

lected by the receiver under his appointment made under the original bill. It appears to have been decreed in the court below (upon what authority or what ground we are not informed, though there is no appeal) that the complainant, Campbell, in whose name the original bill was filed, was what was known as a "free shareholder," and that for this reason his claim was postponed until other creditors and shareholders were paid in full, the result of which was that there was nothing left to pay on the debt of Campbell, in whose name the bill was originally filed. It does not appear that the funds which were realized were under any mortgage or lien, but we simply infer from what we see in the record (and it is an agreed record and very meager) that the funds were paid out upon other series of stock or claims, which, under the arrangement, appear to have been preferred. So that the result reached was that, although all the funds were collected by the receivership established under this bill in process of distribution, they were all used up before the complainant's claim could be reached. But at the same time, so far as we can see from this record, all of these funds were collected by the receiver, and all were brought into court under this bill. But for the filing of the bill, so far as it appears from this record, they might not have been realized upon, and they certainly all were brought into court, as we say, under this bill. Upon this state of facts, we are of the opinion that the solicitors for the complainant (the appellants, Ruhm & Son) were entitled to be paid their reasonable fees, which it is agreed should be fixed at the sum of $200 out of the funds collected by the receiver, and should be a charge upon such general funds, notwithstanding, under the decree of the chancellor, nothing was realized to pay the original complainant. This case does not belong to that class of cases of which Kelly v. Mountain City Club, 101 Tenn. 286, 485, a suit was brought by creditors to have a deed by the debtor to his wife declared fraudulent, in which they were successful, and the court held that their attorney was not entitled to fees out of the gross proceeds of a sale of the land, as that would be to make the debtor's wife pay the attorney's fee out of the residue coming to her, and there is no provision under the California statute for recovering an attorneys' fee from an adverse party in such an action. The court said in this case that where one beneficiary brought an action for the benefit of himself and all the other beneficiaries the plaintiff might have a reasonable counsel fee out of the fund, but that such rule applied only where all the parties had a common interest. The opinion does not show whether the fee was allowed out of that part of the fund available for the payment of debts, but such allowance would probably have been made if there had been a request therefor.

And Lippincott v. Shaw Carriage Co. 34 Fed. 570, holds that a solicitor's fee will not be allowed out of the fund to complainant in a creditors' suit to have certain mortgages executed by an insolvent corporation set aside and the mortgages declared trustees for creditors as to the proceeds of mortgaged property sold in which the mortgages are held invalid on the sole ground that some of the directors of the corporation were liable as indorsers on the notes secured by the mortgages, as the allowance of such fee from the fund would be to make the mortgages pay more than their pro rata share of the fee, as it would come out of the surplus which would otherwise come to them. The court said, however, that an allowance of such fees, if asked, might properly be made against interveners who had accepted the invitation of the bill.

But where a litigation is instituted by general or unsecured creditors of an insolvent trust estate to set aside a conveyance made and judgments confessed by the trustee for the purpose of giving a preference to certain other creditors by which a large amount of property is restored to the estate for the benefit of all the creditors, the fees of plaintiff's attorneys should be paid out of the whole fund, including that going to the creditors who had been preferred by the trustee. Weed's Estate, 163 Pa. 595, 30 Atl. 272. See also Annlston Loan & T. Co. v. Ward, 108 Ala. 85, 18 So. 937; Lochte v. Blum, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 885, 30 S. W. 925, supra, I.; Stanton v. Hatfield, 1 Keen, 358, infra, III. b. 54 L. R. A.

III. Suit for administration of decedent's estate.

a. In general.

A very common action in England and Ireland, but one which is quite infrequent in this country, is that by a creditor for the administration of a decedent's estate. Where the action is brought by the creditor in behalf of himself and all other creditors, and there are no creditors prior to complainant, his attorney will be allowed fees out of the fund realized if there is not a sufficient amount to pay the debts in full; but if there is more than enough for that purpose such fees will not be allowed out of the entire fund, as that would be allowing the fees out of the fund going to the legatees, heirs, or next of kin.

Thus, in such a suit the plaintiff will be allowed costs as between solicitor and client where the fund realized is insufficient to pay debts in full. Re Flynn, Ir. L. R. 17 Eq. 457; Hood v. Wilson, 2 Russ. & M. 687; Tootal v. Spicer, 4 Sim. 510.

And where the assets are sufficient to pay the debts, but not sufficient to pay in addition the costs taxed as between party and party, the plaintiff's extra costs as between solicitor and client will be paid out of the fund. Sutton v. Doggett, 8 Beav. 9, 9 L. J. Ch. N. S. 335, 4 Jur. 959.

And in Brodie v. Bolton, 3 Myl. & K. 168, a fund remained after the satisfaction of all debts, and the master of the rolls held that the insufficiency of the fund to pay the debts was the only case in which the plaintiff in a creditor's suit was entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client.

And in Blackett v. Blackett, 5 L. J. Ch. N. S. 213, the master of the rolls held that costs as between solicitor and client could not be given, even with the consent of all the parties, unless it clearly appeared that the estate was insufficient to pay the debts, as otherwise it would be giving extra costs out of a fund belonging to the legatees or next of kin.

And where creditors bring suit against the devisees for the administration of the testator's estate, there being no personality, the costs of both plaintiffs and defendants as between party and party will be first paid out of the fund realized, and then the costs of the plaintiff as between solicitor and client if the fund is insufficient to pay debts, after which the debts

47 S. W. 426, is an example. That case and the other cases there cited in the opinion of the court are cases where a fund has been appropriated by a mortgage or fixed lien, and is so secured that no action on behalf of the beneficiaries is needed, and where general creditors come in seeking a sale of the property belonging to the corporation, and a foreclosure of the mortgage. In such cases it is evident that the complainant in a general creditors' bill confers no benefit upon the beneficiaries under the mortgage. He secures nothing for them, and it would be an obvious injustice to allow such a creditor or his counsel to reduce the fund already secured by contract by costs and charges which are of no benefit. And in these cases, too, it appears that the beneficiaries under the first mortgage came in themselves, asking active relief and seeking an enforcement of their security, and did not accept and did not receive any real benefit under the general creditors' bill. Such cases, in our opinion, in no sense resemble the case at bar. Here all the assets that were administered upon in this case were brought in by reason of and under the general creditors' bill, and it does not appear that there was any mortgage or other fixed lien upon the assets. As we say, the record is meager, and we are not accurately informed why it was that the original complainant was unable to realize anything out of the assets. He claims in his bill to have been a creditor, and in one sense he was; but, under our decisions, the association having become insolvent, he would be placed upon a par with other stockholders, and treated as such. There is an intimation in the record, or a recitation, from which we will be paid; but if the funds are more than sufficient to pay debts the latter costs will not be allowed. Henderson v. Dodds, L. R. 2 Eq. 582, 14 L. T. N. S. 752, 14 Week. Rep. 908, 33 Beav. 286.

And in Ferguson v. Gibson, L. R. 14 Eq. 379, 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 640, the vice chancellor said that he would deal with the costs according to the preceding case of Henderson v. Dodds, L. R. 2 Eq. 582, 14 L. T. N. S. 752, 14 Week. Rep. 908, 33 Beav. 286, which laid down a very just and simple rule.

And where an action is commenced by the administratrix against the next of kin, and the administratrix does not go on with the suit, but the conduct of it is given to certain creditors who carry it on in behalf of all the creditors and succeed in recovering a fund which is insufficient to pay the debts in full, such creditors will be entitled to costs out of the fund as between solicitor and client as though the action had been commenced by them. Re Richardson, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 611, 49 L. J. Ch. N. S. 612, 43 L. T. N. S. 279, 28 Week. Rep. 942.

And a creditor to whom the conduct of such a suit is given will be allowed costs as between solicitor and client. Joseph v. Goode, 23 Week. Rep. 225.

In Horne v. Horne, 14 Week. Rep. 957, which was an administration action by legatees, the vice chancellor said that the reason for taxing costs as between solicitor and client in a creditor's suit was that a creditor as a party suing for the benefit of others is entitled to something more than ordinary creditors, but that the mere fact that one of the plaintiffs was a creditor did not make such rule applicable where he sued as a legatee.

Where a petition for the sale of real estate is filed by an encumbrancer, and a fund is produced for the payment of several encumbrances of the same priority as plaintiff's, the latter's costs will first be allowed out of the fund. Watson v. Fitzpatrick, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 213.

Where a separate creditor of a testator who was a member of a firm of traders brings an action for the general administration of the estate, and enough is realized through his efforts to pay the separate creditors in full and to partly pay the firm creditors, he will be entitled to costs as between solicitor and client out of the fund, as otherwise he would be in a worse condition than the other separate creditors. Re McRea, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 613, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 708, 54 L. T. N. S. 728.

In Shortley v. Selby, 5 Madd. 447, the vice chancellor held that the plaintiff's solicitor in a creditors' suit had waived the right to deduct a fee from the claims of other creditors by the plaintiff's failure to pursue the decree and call for contribution.

A suit by a creditor in behalf of himself and other creditors to subject the real estate of a deceased debtor, which had descended to his heirs, to the payment of his debts, is practically a creditors' bill in which the plaintiff is entitled to have his counsel fee paid out of the common funds which have been brought into court by his action, even though, after the commencement of the action, controversies arose as to the relative priorities of creditors, and the heirs are the same persons in fact, though not in law, as the beneficiaries under a judgment which is given priority over plaintiff's judgment. Lawton v. Perry, 45 S. C. 319, 28 S. E. 53.

And where a bill for the administration of the insolvent estate of a decedent and the sale of the real estate is properly filed by a creditor in behalf of himself and other creditors in accordance with Shannon's (Tenn.) Code, §§ 4102-4108, by which the estate is brought under the jurisdiction of the court, the solicitors for plaintiff are entitled to a fee out of the proceeds of a sale of the real estate, although the administrator expected to file such a bill himself, as his solicitor would probably have claimed an equal amount, and a bill by a creditor is specially authorized by the statute. Bank of Blount County v. Smith (Tenn. Ch. App.) 48 S. W. 286.

But where the sole object of a creditor's suit to administer a decedent's estate is to secure the payment of the debt due the creditor bringing the suit, and the only other creditor is represented by attorney, and no advantage accrues to him from the services of plaintiff's attorney, such attorney will not be allowed a fee out of the fund, under Ky. Stat. § 489, authorizing the making of reasonable compensation in such a suit if it appears that one or more of the parties to the suit have prosecuted it for the benefit of others, and have been at trouble and expense in conducting the same. Dougherty v. Cummings, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1948, 50 S. W. 551.

And attorneys for certain creditors of an insolvent decedent's estate, who begin proceedings to surcharge the accounts of the administratrix, the object of which is to increase the assets of the estate, and who succeed in largely augmenting the funds for distribution, cannot have the funds in the hands of the administratrix charged with a solicitor's fee in their favor, where their efforts are in the main directed to securing all the benefits flowing from their services to their own clients to the exclusion of all others. Rives v. Patty, 74 Miss. 381, 20 So. 862. The court says in this case infer that the assets which were brought in were paid to creditors and to preferred stockholders. We know of no law in this state authorizing preferred stock in building and loan associations, but we do not regard it as making any material difference, as the question now stands before us, as to why the complainant did not receive anything. It appears that, under decrees which have not been appealed from, such is his status. But, whether he was a stockholder or a creditor, it appears that the result of the filing of his bill was to bring into court for the benefit of all a considerable fund; that on this fund no liens were fixed, but that, as being funds of an insolvent corporation, certain priorities were adjudicated; and that by this adjudication the funds were all appropriated before complainant's claim was reached. But he and his counsel brought the funds into court for the benefit of all, and as it does not appear, as we say, that the funds had been covered by any mortgage or fixed lien, his bill was not an interference with fixed rights, but was an attempt to save the assets for all the creditors and stockholders of the corporation, to be properly administered and distributed according to their several rights. It appears that the work was done for the benefit of all, and it is clearly proper and right that this work should be paid for out of the general fund brought into court. The result is, therefore, that the decree of the chancellor is reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the chancery court to be further proceeded with, with directions to pay Ruhm & Son a fee of $200 out of the funds in court impounded under this bill. The costs of this proceeding will also be paid out of such funds, and a decree will accordingly be so entered. All concur.

Mr. John Ruhm for appellees.

The above decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court without further opinion on January 15, 1901.

that it would be a dangerous precedent to hold that counsel might intervene to protect the interests of persons who had not signified any desire for their services, and obtain attorney's fees if their efforts were successful, and that it would be almost as dangerous to compel litigants in a common cause to bear the expense of counsel fees incurred by their fellow litigants without their procurement or consent because of incidental benefits resulting from the services of the fighting litigants.

b. From what part of fund allowance made.

Where a fund is realized in a creditors' suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by the executor through the diligence of plaintiff, and the assets are more than sufficient to pay the debts and legacies, leaving a surplus for the residuary legatees, the costs of the plaintiff as between party and party will be paid out of the general fund, and his extra costs as between solicitor and client will be paid out of a fund equal to the amount of the debts, so that each creditor will pay a proportionate part of such costs. Stanton v. Hatfield, 1 Keen, 358.

Where a simple contract creditor brings a creditors' suit and procures the sale of real estate, the proceeds of which are more than sufficient to pay the debts, the plaintiff is not entitled to make judgment creditors contribute in proportion to their demands to his costs as between solicitor and client, as the parties should be paid their costs out of the proceeds of real estate according to the priorities of their demands, and the judgment creditors have priority over simple contract creditors. Newby v. Drew, 10 Ir. Eq. Rep. 58.

c. Where plaintiff's debt not reached.

The cases in England, while conflicting to some extent, seem to be to the effect that plaintiff's attorneys' fees will be allowed if the suit is brought in good faith, although the fund is exhausted before plaintiff's debt is reached. In Ireland no costs of any kind are ordinarily allowed in such a case,—at least where the plaintiff knew that his debt would not be reached,—except for services in making out the title to land and bringing the fund into court, the benefit of which accrues to prior creditors. In several cases the question of costs is considered generally, and it is impossible to tell from the 54 L. R. A.

opinion whether the matter of attorneys' fees was before the court in any way whatever. In such case the decisions are not taken unless there is something in them which would seem to be helpful on the question of such fees.

Thus, where a creditors' suit is instituted by a simple contract creditor in behalf of himself and all other creditors, the plaintiff will be allowed his costs as between solicitor and client out of the estate, although the assets realized are insufficient to satisfy the specialty debts. Jenkins v. Robertson, 22 L. J. Ch. N. S. 874, 1 Week. Rep. 298. In this case the vice chancellor said that it was hard that when the specialty creditors did not have enough to pay them, their money should be taken to pay the extra costs of a creditor of a lower degree, but that he did not know of a case in which such costs had been refused.

But Lechmere v. Brazier, 1 Russ. Ch. 72, 4 L. J. Ch. 95, holds that where simple-contract creditors bring a suit against the personal representative of a decedent for an administration of his estate and the sale of his real estate, and the assets prove insufficient to pay specialty debts, the costs of the plaintiff as between party and party, but not as between solicitor and client, will be allowed out of the estate, where the specialty creditors could have satisfied their demands without the aid of a court of equity if such suit had not been brought. In this case the plaintiff's solicitor stated that he could find no instance in which any costs beyond those taxed as between party and party had been allowed in such a case.

In Larkins v. Paxton, 2 Myl. & K. 320, and Barker v. Wardell, 2 Myl. & K. 818, the master of the rolls held that where a simple contract creditor instituted a suit for the administration of a testator's estate, and the assets proved insufficient to pay the specialty creditors, the plaintiff should still be permitted his costs out of the fund, nothing being said as to costs between solicitor and client.

But in Sullivan v. Bevan, 20 Beav. 399, costs were refused on the ground that the plaintiff was informed before prosecuting the order that the assets were insufficient to pay the specialty creditors.

Where a simple contract creditor files a bill for the administration of the estate, and the assets are insufficient to pay the only specialty creditor whose suit at law had been enjoined at the instance of the executor, the master of the rolls expressed the opinion that the assets ought not to be diminished by the payment of the plaintiff's costs; but, as there was a probability that further assets would be realized, the case was referred back to the master to continue the accounts. Young v. Everest, 1 Russ. & M. 426.

And in Rowlands v. Tucker, 1 Russ. & M. 635, the master of the rolls refused to allow costs in a case by a simple contract creditor where the assets were insufficient to pay specialty debts.

Ordinarily no costs of any kind will be allowed the plaintiff in a creditors' suit where the assets are insufficient to pay creditors who have a lien prior to that of plaintiff. Gray v. Crawford, 1 Ir. Eq. Rep. 274, Jones & C. 174.

In Smyth v. Murphy, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 42, the master of the rolls says that in suits by encumbrancers of real estate the rule in Ireland is that the plaintiff gets his costs in the same priority as his demand, the rule being different in England, the plaintiff there being paid his costs in the first instance.

No costs were given a simple contract creditor who brought a suit for the administration of a decedent's estate out of assets which proved insufficient to pay judgment and specialty creditors, where she knew before filing the bill that there were judgment debts far exceeding the amount of the assets, and instituted the suit merely to try their nature. Fisher v. King, 11 Ir. Eq. Rep. 460. The Lord Chancellor said that in suits to raise charges on real property the rule had long been settled that plaintiff gets his costs in the priority of his demands, and will not be allowed them out of a fund insufficient to pay prior creditors unless funds were thereby realized which might otherwise have been lost.

In Drake v. Forde, 3 Ir. Eq. Rep. 56, a simple contract creditor who instituted a suit for the administration of personal assets was not allowed his costs as against judgment and specialty creditors, for the payment of which debts the assets proved insufficient, where it did not appear that the suit was necessary for the due administration of the assets, and it does not seem to have been brought in good faith.

And in Watson v. Fitzpatrick, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 213, in which plaintiff was first allowed his costs out of a fund produced for the payment of several encumbrancers of the same priority as plaintiffs, the master of the rolls said that the rule established in Peyton v. McDermott, 1 Dru. & Wal. 234, and Nelson v. Brady, 2 Dru. & Wal. 143, 1 Connor & L. 239, 4 Ir. Eq. Rep. 359, was adopted to prevent junior creditors from bringing suit for the sole purpose of realizing costs when they knew that the funds could not reach them.

And where a junior creditor instituted a suit which he might have known was desperate he will not be allowed his costs, but if the debt was a hopeful one and instituted in good faith, his costs will be first paid, although the fund is exhausted before his demand is reached. Egan v. Baldwin, 1 Molloy, 539.

But Bennett v. Goling, 1 Molloy, 529, holds that a creditor filing a creditors' suit is entitled to his costs out of the fund, in case it is deficient, the first thing after payment of the costs as executor, although there are not enough assets to reach his claim.

And where a suit for the administration of the assets of an intestate by some person is necessary, and a simple contract creditor brings the same and conducts it properly, he will be allowed the costs therein out of the funds in preference to the demand of any specialty or judgment creditor. Jameson v. Farrer, 3 Ir. Eq. Rep. 346.

costs of bringing the fund into court were allowed to plaintiff, although his demand was not reached, because the fund had been reached by his diligence, and he had no notice of the prior demand until it had been realized. In this case the master of the rolls states that he has the authority of the Lord Chancellor, who rendered the decision in Taylor v. Gorman, 1 Dru. & Wal. 235, note, which gave the rule as between several judgment creditors as to the costs of prosecuting the suit prior to the decree, that such rule was not intended to apply to the costs subsequent to the decree for making out the title to land and bringing the fund into court.

And in Nelson v. Brady, 2 Dru. & Wal. 143, 4 Ir. Eq. Rep. 359, 1 Connor & L. 239, a judgment creditor who brought a creditors' suit, the funds from which were insufficient to pay prior debts, was not allowed, out of the fund as against prior creditors, the cost of carrying on the same, but was allowed the cost of preparing the land sold to realize the fund and of procuring counsel's opinion upon it, of preparing conditions of sale and of proceeding upon the order to settle them before the master, as the prior creditors derived all the benefit of such proceedings.

And in Smyth v. Murphy, 10 Ir. Ch. Rep. 42; Maguire v. Dundass, 1 Ir. Eq. Rep. 25; and Kelly v. Kelly, 1 Ir. Eq. Rep. 317,—the costs of making out the title to land were also allowed on the ground that they had been incurred for the benefit of all parties.

IV. Suit for appointment of receiver and to wind up insolvent corporation.

a. In general.

Where a creditor of an insolvent corporation brings an action for the appointment of a receiver and to wind up its affairs the fees of his attorney for services rendered before the appointment of the receiver will be allowed out of the fund in the latter's hands if such services prove beneficial to other creditors.

Thus, where the complainant in a general creditors' bill to wind up the affairs of an insolvent corporation succeeds in securing a large fund for the bondholders generally, his counsel will be entitled to receive a reasonable compensation from the fund for their services. Bristol-Goodson Electric Light & P. Co. v. Bristol Gas, Electric Light & P. Co. 99 Tenn. 371, 49 S. W. 19.

And where a creditor of a corporation institutes proceedings for the appointment of a receiver for it on the ground of the fraud and mismanagement of its officers, as a result of which a large amount of money is saved for certificate holders and other creditors, he will be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee out of the fund in the receiver's hands. Davis v. Bay State League, 158 Mass. 434, 33 N. E. 591.

And where a creditors' bill to have the court take charge of the assets of an insolvent and dissolved corporation and distribute them ratably among its creditors is brought by certain creditors in behalf of themselves and other creditors, the fee of plaintiff's attorney should be paid out of the fund before any distribution between the creditors is ordered. White v. University Land Co. 49 Mo. App. 450.

And a railroad bondholder, who, in behalf of himself and other bondholders, brings an action to have fraudulent conveyances by the trustees of a trust fund to secure payment of the bonds set aside and for the appointment of a receiver by whose efforts a large amount of the trust fund is secured and saved, is entitled to have his counsel fees paid out of the fund. Internal Improv. Fund Trustees v. Greenough, 105 U. S. 527, 26 L. ed. 1157.

And the attorneys for plaintiff in an action to wind up the affairs of an insolvent banking corporation will be allowed out of the funds compensation for prosecuting the bill and for valuable services rendered in the general litigation. Moses v. Ocoee Bank, 1 Lea, 398.

And where creditors bring an action for the appointment of a receiver on the ground that the debtor is insolvent, and a large amount is realized for general creditors through having certain mortgages and assignments given by him held to constitute a general assignment for creditors, the attorneys of complainants will be allowed compensation out of the fund thereby created. Fechheimer v. Baum, 43 Fed. 719. See also Anniston Loan & T. Co. v. Ward, 108 Ala. 85, 18 So. 937; Lochte v. Blum, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 885, 30 S. W. 925, supra, 1.

And where a bill to foreclose a mortgage on a railroad is filed, and the holder of a lien on the railroad files a creditors' bill bringing in all the lien holders, which bill is consolidated with the bill for foreclosure, the one filing the creditors' bill is entitled to have the fees of his counsel paid out of the fund realized from a sale of the road, it being indispensable to a successful sale that the property should be cleared of the liens, and the action of the one filing such creditors' bill being beneficial to all concerned. Central Trust Co. v. Condon, 14 C. C. A. 814, 31 U. S. App. 387, 67 Fed. 84.

And where the holders of second mortgage bonds brought suit for the appointment of a receiver, and the trustees and holders of the first mortgage bonds recognized the necessity of a receiver and acquiesced in the appointment of one, and the trustees of the second mortgage bonds made no objection except to the complainant's right to sue, all parties interested agreeing that the course pursued by complainant was for the good of all parties concerned, the fees of his attorneys will be allowed out of the fund. Bound v. South Carolina R. Co. 43 Fed. 404.

And where a bill is brought for the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent corporation by a creditor in behalf of himself and all other creditors, and the attorneys for complainant continue to conduct the litigation after the appointment of the receiver, contesting all unfounded claims and performing services very beneficial to all the creditors, they will be allowed compensation out of the fund for the services performed after as well as before the appointment of the receiver. Burden Central Sugar-Ref. Co. v. Ferris Sugar-Mfg. Co. 31 C. C. A. 233, 58 U. S. App. 166, 87 Fed. 810.

Where a corporation brought a general creditors' bill on behalf of itself and all other creditors against an insolvent corporation for the appointment of a receiver and the distribution of its assets, in which it failed because of an illegal combination with such corporation in restraint of trade, its solicitors will be allowed out of the corporate assets for services which were for the benefit of all creditors generally, but not for services in behalf of complainant alone from which the other creditors received no benefit. American Handle Co. v. Standard Handle Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 59 S. W. 709.

And where creditors of an insolvent corporation consent to the business being carried on for several years by the assignee for the benefit of creditors, who pays dividends to the creditors for several years, after which a majority of the creditors enter into a scheme of a new corporation to buy the corporate properties, whereupon a creditor who has received dividends on his debts brings a creditors' bill to have the affairs of the corporation wound up, in which nothing is brought into existence for the benefit of creditors, no complications removed from the properties, and none of the properties in existence protected or preserved, a fee will not be allowed to his attorneys out of the corporate assets arising from a sale of the properties. Parkhurst & W. Co. v. Etna Coal Co. (Tenn. Ch. App.) 54 S. W. 58.

And where a creditor and stockholder of an insolvent corporation files a petition in behalf of himself and other creditors and stockholders for the appointment of a receiver and the winding up of its affairs, the fees of his attorneys will not be ordered paid out of the assets in the hands of the receiver on the ground that his action was a benefit to the creditors generally, where he was liable as a stockholder to an extent greatly exceeding the debt due to him, and it was to his interest as a stockholder to see that the debts were paid out of the corporate assets. Kandiah v. Chicago Co-Op. Brewing Assn. 35 Ill. App. 411.

b. From what part of fund allowance made.

Where a bill in the nature of a creditors' bill is brought against a railroad company to require the payment of certain unfunded coupons of 6 per cent bonds by a holder of such coupons in behalf of himself and all others standing in the same condition, and afterwards certain holders of 7 per cent bonds intervene and summon a particular holder of the 6 per cent bonds to represent such bondholders, and the bondholder so summoned employs counsel, and all creditors of the company are called in, and a contest then arises between the holders of the 6 per cent and 7 per cent bonds as to the priority of their lien, in which the 6 per cent bondholders are successful, the entire amount realized from a sale of the railroad being insufficient to satisfy the prior lien, counsel fees out of the common fund will be allowed only to the attorney for the one thus representing the 6 per cent bondholders, although counsel for other bondholders of that class render valuable assistance to such class without being specially employed by them as a class. Hand v. Savannah & C. R. Co. 21 S. C. 162. The court also says that the attorneys for the plaintiff as representing the holders of unfunded coupons of the 6 per cent bonds might be entitled on the same principle to a fee out of so much of the common fund as the holders of such coupons might be entitled to. On a former hearing in 17 S. C. 219, the court had said that the fees of all the attorneys properly chargeable for successful services should be paid out of the common fund so as to make the successful litigants pay their proper proportions.

Where nearly all the members of a railroad relief association assign their interests to the railroad company in trust for a new relief association to be organized, and soon after the dissolution of the old association two nonassigning members file a bill against the railroad company alleging that the assignments were void and asking for the appointment of receivers for the old association, and receivers are appointed but the order therefor is reversed on appeal, whereupon the railroad company files a bill asking the court to assume jurisdiction over the distribution of the assets of the old association, and the whole fund is brought into court for such distribution, the attorneys for the two members bringing such suit will not be allowed a counsel fee out of the entire fund, but only out of the part belonging to the non-assigning members, as their action was hostile to the railroad company and the assigning members and in no way beneficial to them. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Brown, 79 Md. 451, 29 Atl. 527.

The fees of counsel for plaintiff in a proceeding for the appointment of a receiver of an insolvent partnership on the ground of collusion between the firm and an attaching creditor will be allowed only against that portion of the partnership property not covered by the attachment, where such attachment is held to be a lien on the property prior to that of the one applying for the appointment of the receiver. Byrne v. First Nat. Bank, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 194, 49 S. W. 710.

c. Where plaintiff's debt not reached.

Although the fund realized from the suit is exhausted before the plaintiff's debt is reached, the fees of his attorneys will be allowed out of the fund if the services performed by them were necessary to enable the prior creditors to recover, and proved beneficial to them; but if such services were unnecessary and of no benefit no fee will be allowed.

Thus, CAMPBELL v. PROVIDENT SAV. & L. SOC. holds that where a general creditors' bill is brought against an insolvent building and loan association, by means of which considerable funds are collected, all of which are absorbed in the payment of claims prior to that of the one bringing the bill, a reasonable fee for his solicitor will nevertheless be allowed out of the fund where there is no mortgage or other fixed lien on the assets by means of which they would have been available for payment of such prior claims without the assistance rendered by means of the creditors' bill.

And D. A. Tompkins Co. v. Chester Mills, 90 Fed. 37, holds that an unsecured creditor of an insolvent corporation which had ceased doing business, who commenced a creditor's suit for the conservation and distribution of the corporate assets according to priority and the appointment of a receiver at a time when the bondholders could not act because nothing was due them at the time and no one but an unsecured creditor could act, will be allowed a contribution from the fund created toward his expenses as between solicitor and client, although the fund is insufficient to pay the corporate bonds which constituted a claim prior to his, all the parties having acquiesced in the suit and received the benefits.

And Lowry Banking Co. v. Abbott, 87 Ga. 134, 13 S. E. 204, holds that where a petition in the nature of a creditors' bill is filed asking for a receiver of the debtor's assets, and a mortgagee of such debtor is made a party on its own application, thus recognizing the necessity of the petition and ratifying the filing of it, the attorneys for the plaintiff will be entitled to a fee out of the fund, even though the mortgages were sufficient to consume the entire assets, rendering the appointment of the receiver unnecessary. The court said, however, that if the mortgagee had not joined in the proceeding the attorney's fee could not have been allowed out of the fund.

But Lewis v. Edwards, 92 Ga. 533, 17 S. E. 920, holds that where a creditors' petition was filed for the appointment of a receiver for an insolvent trader and the sale of his property, all of which was covered by a chattel mortgage for an amount sufficient to exhaust all its proceeds, and the mortgage was foreclosed and placed in the hands of the sheriff for the purpose of claiming the fund, before the receiver's sale took place, the mortgagees not having been made parties, the fees of the attorney for the complainant will not be allowed out of the fund, as there was no necessity for the filing of the petition so far as the mortgagees were concerned, and they derived no benefit therefrom.

And in Hooper v. Clegg, 99 Ga. 167, 25 S. E. 96, the court said that the case was controlled by the preceding case of Lewis v. Edwards, 92 Ga. 533, 17 S. E. 920, and that the attorneys' fee asked for had been properly refused.

And Kelly v. Mountain City Club, 101 Tenn. 286, 47 S. W. 426, holds that the attorneys for complainant in an action by a second mortgage bondholder and general unsecured creditor to wind up the affairs of an insolvent corporation are not entitled, as against the first mortgage bondholders, to have their fees paid out of the proceeds of a sale of the real estate mortgaged, where such first mortgage bondholders were not interested in having the proceeds paid into court, but could have foreclosed their mortgage outside of court, even though the complainant's action was treated as a general creditors' bill on the petition of a first mortgage bondholder, who was also a second mortgage bondholder and general creditor and joined in the bill, the real estate selling for much less than the amount of the first mortgage.

V. Suit to enforce stockholder's liability.

A fee will be allowed to the attorneys for a creditor who brings a suit to enforce the liability of stockholders in an insolvent corporation for such services as were for the common benefit of all the creditors.

Thus, where a creditor of an insolvent corporation brings a suit to enforce the statutory liability of stockholders, the purpose of which is to bring into court a fund for distribution among creditors, the attorney for plaintiffs should be paid a reasonable fee out of the sum realized from the collection of judgments against stockholders before distribution among creditors. Mason v. Alexander, 44 Ohio St. 318, 7 N. E. 435.

And the attorney for plaintiff in an action to enforce the statutory liability of a stockholder brought in behalf of all creditors should be allowed out of the fund a fee for such services as were for the common benefit of all creditors on the equity rule that where one of many parties having a common interest in a trust fund takes proceedings at his own expense for the collection of the fund for the benefit of all interested, he is entitled to reasonable reimbursement out of the fund before its division; but where one of the principal creditors was also a principal stockholder, and part of the attorney's services consisted in opposing his claim, no allowance should be made for the latter services. Helm v. Smith-Fee Co. 79 Minn. 297, 82 N. W. 639.

Where counsel for certain creditors file a bill on behalf of all creditors to hold the stockholders of an insolvent bank individually liable for any deficiency in assets and incidentally for an accounting and disbursement of the trust assets, and are unsuccessful on the main issue, their fees will not be allowed out of the trust fund. Hume v. Commercial Bank, 13 Lea, 496.

And where a creditor intervenes in sequestration proceedings against an insolvent corporation in which a receiver has been appointed in order to have the personal liability of stockholders for corporate debts enforced, and, pending the proceeding, a syndicate of stockholders buys up all outstanding claims with funds contributed by them, whereupon the proceedings against the stockholders are dropped without anything having been realized thereon, the attorney for such intervening creditor is not entitled to a fee out of the corporate assets in the receiver's hands. Dwinnell v. Badger, 74 Minn. 406, 77 N. W. 219. The court, said, however, that if a fund had been realized through the efforts of such intervener and his attorney, which had been paid over to creditors, they were not prepared to say that the attorney should not be reimbursed out of the corporate assets.

VI. Proceedings in bankruptcy cases.

a. In general.

Attorneys' fees were allowed to petitioning creditors in involuntary bankruptcy for procuring an adjudication of bankruptcy under the act of 1867, although no express provision therefor was made in such act, on the ground that the assets of the bankrupt were secured and saved by their diligence, and that if they were required to pay their own expenses, including their attorneys' fee, out of the share coming to them, they would be in a worse position than other creditors who did nothing towards the preservation of the fund.

Thus, a reasonable attorneys' fee will be allowed to the petitioning creditors out of the general fund in cases in involuntary bankruptcy proceedings before distribution to creditors, although no provision in regard thereto is contained in the bankruptcy act. Re King, 4 Bias. 319, Fed. Cas. No. 7,780; Re New York Mall S. S. Co. 7 Blatchf. 178, Fed. Cas. No. 10,208; Re Mitteldorfer, Chase Dec. 288, Fed. Cas. No. 9,675; Re O'Hara, 8 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 113, Fed. Cas. No. 10,465; Re Williams, 2 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 88, Fed. Cas. No. 17,704.

And such fee will be allowed although the Federal statute as to fees makes no provision therefor, as such statute was intended to reach only taxable costs, leaving power in a court of equity to tax counsel fees in those peculiar cases where a fund is in court upon which different parties have distinct rights or claims. Re parie Jaffray, 1 Low, Dec. 321, Fed. Cas. No. 7,170.

And in Re Schwab, 3 Ben. 231, Fed. Cas. No. 12,498, the district judge held that the expenses of the petitioning creditors, among which counsel fees were probably included, were allowable under § 1 of the bankruptcy act of 1867 providing for due distribution of the assets of the bankrupt, as otherwise the petitioning creditor would not share equally with other creditors.

And under the bankruptcy act of 1898, § 64b, subd. 3, permitting the allowance of one reasonable attorneys' fee for the professional services actually rendered to the petitioning creditors in involuntary cases, the attorney is entitled to the allowance of such reasonable fee as a matter of right, and its allowance or disallowance is not a matter of discretion. Re Curtis, 41 C. C. A. 59, 100 Fed. 784.

b. Amount of fee.

Under the bankruptcy act of 1867, the tendency was to allow excessive amounts for counsel fees, so that at times almost nothing was left for creditors, but under the present act the courts have endeavored to keep the fee down to a reasonable amount, and to consider the assets of the bankrupt as a fund to be distributed mainly among the creditors, instead of among the attorneys.

A reasonable attorneys' fee should be allowed to attorneys for the petitioning creditor for filing the petition, but not for services performed after the adjudication, where they consisted principally in an unsuccessful attempt to exclude the other creditors from participating in the choice of an assignee and from sharing in the assets. Re Mead, 8 Phila. 174, Fed. Cas. No. 9,364.

And in Re Sanger, 5 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 54, Fed. Cas. No. 12,318, a counsel fee of $1,000 to the attorneys for the petitioning creditors was held to be too extravagant where the assets of the estate amounted to only $15,000, and the court refused to allow the same unless the assignee, the bankrupts, and all the creditors who had proved their claims assented thereto.

And in Re Jones, 9 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 491, Fed. Cas. No. 7,451, the court states that the attorneys' fee allowed for the petitioning creditors would be limited to what the court considered as a bare compensation where the bankrupt estate was a small one.

And under general order No. 30 in bankruptcy as amended April 12, 1873, providing that no allowance shall be made for fees of counsel except when necessarily employed by the assignee, and general order No. 31, providing that in case of involuntary bankruptcy, where the debtor resists the application and the court shall adjudge the debtor a bankrupt the petitioning creditor shall recover, to be paid out of the fund, the same costs that are allowed to a party recovering in a suit in equity, the only counsel fees allowable to the petitioning creditor is the docket fee of $20 taxable to the prevailing party in a suit in equity. Re Lloyd, 7 Fed. 459; Re Bignall, 3 McCrary, 440, 9 Fed. 385.

But Re Mead, 8 Phila. 174, Fed. Cas. No. 9,364, holds that the attorneys will not be entitled to a docket fee, where no denial was filed and no contest made on the petition.

Re Sheehan, 8 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 353, Fed. Cas. No. 12,738, holds that an attorneys' fee in excess of what is allowed in a suit in equity will not be granted to the attorneys for the petitioning creditor where there are no other creditors and the petition is dismissed on the payment of the petitioner's debt.

The petitioning creditors will not be allowed a retainer paid to their attorneys, nor for any services rendered by the attorneys after the adjudication of bankruptcy. Re Comstock, 9 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 88, Fed. Cas. No. 3,075.

The amount to be allowed as attorneys' fees under the act of 1898, § 64b, subd. 3, permitting the allowance of one reasonable attorneys' fee for the professional services actually rendered to the petitioning creditor in involuntary cases, rests in legal knowledge and judicial discretion, and not in unrestrained discretion, and such discretion is subject to review, and the amount allowed must, in every case, be reasonable. Re Curtis, 41 C. C. A. 59, 100 Fed. 784.

In Re Silverman, 97 Fed. 325, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 227, a fee of $75 to the attorneys for the petitioning creditors was held to be sufficient where the adjudication was not contested and no special services in the collection of assets was shown, and, as their special duties to the petitioning creditors ended with the choosing of a trustee, no allowance for subsequent services was made.

In Re J. W. Harrison Mercantile Co. 95 Fed. 123, the court, while stating that under § 64 of the present act and general rule No. 13 the fee of the attorneys of the petitioning creditors for preparing the petition and schedules when paid out of the funds could not exceed $50 and that no other fee was payable where there was no contest or trial as to the adjudication, nevertheless allowed a fee of $100 for drawing the petition, as it was drawn before the passage of such rule. A fee of $25 was also allowed for a petition to restrain the trustees under a mortgage given by the bankrupt from disposing of the property pendente lite, but they were not allowed any compensation for sending out notices of the first meeting of creditors, as that was the duty of the referee. The court, however, stated that they would be allowed for money advanced to the referee for the expense of sending such notices. And they were not allowed compensation for their services in attending meetings of creditors and there resisting the allowance of other claims, nor for their services in influencing bidders to attend the sale of the bankrupt's property.

A deposit fee of $25 paid by the attorneys for petitioning creditors to the clerk will be refunded to them. Re J. W. Harrison Mercantile Co. 95 Fed. 123; Re Silverman, 97 Fed. 325, 3 Am. Bankr. Rep. 227.

Where the only contest on a petition for adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy is as to whether the petitioning creditors have not estopped themselves to maintain the petition by participating in proceedings in the state court under an assignment for the benefit of creditors by the bankrupts, and the time consumed by counsel in conducting and preparing the case did not exceed one month, and the assets available for payment of debts will probably not exceed $100,000, a fee of $12,500 for the attorneys of the petitioning creditors for their services is excessive and should be reduced to $2,000. Re Curtis, 41 C. C. A. 59, 100 Fed. 784.

VII. Conclusion.

The fees of attorneys for creditors who bring suit in behalf of themselves and other creditors will always be allowed out of the fund going to creditors in the same class with the plaintiffs if the suit is beneficial to them, on the ground that otherwise the one incurring the risk and conferring the benefit will be in a worse condition than those who do nothing towards realizing the fund, although the mere fact that a suit proves beneficial to other creditors will not justify the allowance of such fees out of the fund if the plaintiff brought the suit solely in his own behalf.

Where there are different classes of creditors, and the fund is exhausted before the plaintiff's debt is reached, the fee of his attorney will nevertheless be allowed out of the fund if the services performed were necessary to enable the prior creditors to recover, and proved beneficial to them, and the suit was brought in good faith under the belief that the plaintiff's debt would be reached before the fund was exhausted; but if the suit was commenced in bad faith, or if no benefit resulted to prior creditors therefrom, no fees will be allowed.

No fee will be allowed to plaintiff's attorneys out of any part of the fund which would go to some person other than a creditor, such as the surplus going to a fraudulent grantee in a suit to set aside the conveyance, or the surplus going to legatees, devisees, or distributees in a suit for the administration of a decedent's estate.

A fee has been allowed to the attorneys for the petitioning creditors in involuntary bankruptcy proceedings on the ground that by their efforts a fund had been secured or saved for creditors generally, the expense of which ought to be borne by the fund or by all the creditors benefited, instead of by the creditors by whose diligence the fund was realized. The present act provides expressly for the payment of such fees. Under the former act the amount allowed was often excessive, but under the present act the tendency is to allow only moderate fees to attorneys, and distribute the bulk of the fund among the creditors. ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO & EASTERN ILLINOIS RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

George F. JENNINGS, Admr., etc., of George M. Jennings, Deceased.

(190 Ill. 478.)

1. What facts will create the contract relation of carrier and passenger is a question of law.
2. The duty of a railroad company to one as a passenger has not arisen when, with a passage ticket in his pocket, he is crossing its tracks on a public highway for the purpose of boarding a train standing on the track farthest from him, and when he has not yet reached the platform provided for passengers.
3. Under a declaration seeking to recover from a carrier for the negligent killing of a passenger no recovery can be had unless the relation of carrier and passenger is shown, although the facts are such as to warrant a recovery in the absence of such relation.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. S. A. Lynde and W. H. Lyford for appellant.

Messrs. Edward J. Dahms and Wing & Chadbourne, for appellee:

The matter of Jennings' care was a question for the jury, and under the evidence, which is somewhat conflicting, reasonable and fairminded persons might, acting reasonably, have reached different conclusions, and, this being so, the case was properly submitted to the consideration of the jury.

The questions whether the plaintiff was using due care and caution at the time of the injury, and whether the defendant was guilty of negligence, are questions of fact which are conclusively settled by the judgments of the trial and appellate courts.

The train that struck and killed the deceased was running in violation of the ordinance of the city, and that fact alone, in conjunction with the fact of the injury, by force of the statute, created a prima facie liability.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Fell, 79 Ill. App. 376.

At the time the deceased was struck and killed he had been received by the appellant on its premises as a passenger.

The responsibility of a carrier begins when the passenger presents himself for transportation; and this he may be said to do when he approaches the place of reception for the purpose.

Cooley, Torts, 770.

Neither the purchase of a ticket nor the entry into the car is essential to create the relation of carrier and passenger.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee brought this suit as administrator of the estate of George M. Jennings, who was killed by one of appellant's trains while crossing its tracks at Seventy-Sixth street, in the city of Chicago, to recover damages from appellant for his death. The declaration contains five counts, in each of which it is averred that the defendant received said George M. Jennings upon its premises as a passenger at or upon the intersection and crossing of its railroad and Seventy-Sixth street, and near to its Seventy-Sixth street depot, to be safely carried from thence to its Dearborn street station, in the city of Chicago, upon a train about to arrive at and stop and wait at said Seventy-Sixth street station or depot to receive said George M. Jennings and other passengers, to convey, and carry them to their several destinations. Each of said counts also alleges, in substance, that it thereupon became the duty of defendant to have permitted the said George M. Jennings to safely cross over its railroad tracks while going to said depot, and to have allowed and permitted him to safely take and mount said train of cars which was about to arrive and stop at said station, and to have carefully conveyed and carried him to his said destination, but that while he was, with all due care and diligence, walking upon and across said Seventy-Sixth street at said crossing of the same and defendant's railroad, to reach and mount defendant's train, the defendant, by its servants, disregarding said duty, ran another train in a southerly direction upon and over the said crossing, and struck the said George M. Jennings, and killed him. While the counts are substantially alike in making the foregoing allegations, they differ in respect to the character of the negligence charged as a breach of said duty. In the first there is a general charge that the train which struck Jennings was carelessly, negligently, and improperly driven, managed, and run. The second count charges that said train was carelessly and negligently driven and run at an unlawful rate of speed, in violation of an ordinance of the city of Chicago, set out in that count. The third alleges that the defendant ran the train without maintaining a flagman upon the street crossing to warn said George M. Jennings of trains. The fourth charged defendant with not ringing the bell or blowing a whistle on the engine 80 rods from the crossing, and until the crossing was reached, as was required by the statute. The fifth alleges that defendant failed to ring a bell in its tower or tower house near the crossing, to warn said George M. Jennings of the approach of the train. Each count was based upon the existence of the contract relation of passenger and carrier, and alleged duties, arising out of that relation, and charged as breaches of that duty the several acts above stated. There was no count alleging any relation or duty except as carrier and passenger, nor any negligent act except as a breach of such duty, and there was no count of which the averment of that relation was not a necessary element. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and there was a trial, resulting in a verdict for $4,800, and a judgment thereon, which has been affirmed by the appellate court.

The following facts were proved by the plaintiff, and not disputed by the defendant, but are conceded: The defendant owns and operates a railroad in the city of Chicago, with a station at the corner of Polk and Dearborn streets. It also has a station at Seventy-Sixth street. That street runs east and west, and the tracks run north and south, crossing it at right angles. At that place there are four tracks, and the depot is on the east side of them, and north of the street. The two easterly tracks nearest the depot are used for passenger trains. The first track to the east is No. 1, and the trains running on that track are north-bound passenger trains. The second track from the east is No. 2, on which south-bound passenger trains run. The two tracks to the west of these are for north and south bound freight trains. There is a sidewalk running east and west on the north side of Seventy-Sixth street, and east of all the tracks there is a wooden platform running north from the sidewalk, about 100 feet. At the north end the platform is 10 feet wide, and at the south end it runs over to the depot, and is probably 18 feet wide. Between the passenger tracks Nos. 1 and 2 there is another platform 8 feet wide, running north from the sidewalk 100 feet. These platforms are level and even with the top of the rails, and are for the use of passengers. The street crossing is planked in the usual manner entirely across the tracks. In 1894 there was a train which went north from this station at 7:37 in the morning, and George M. Jennings was in the habit of taking that train, and other passengers were in the habit of taking trains at that station for down town every morning. On the morning of April 16, 1894, Mr. Jennings walked across lots from his home west of the railroad to take this train. He came to the Seventy-Sixth street crossing, and walked along the sidewalk over the freight-car tracks. The train going north which he intended to take was on the further track, just drawing up to the station, and was entirely stopped, or was in the act of stopping. He was looking to the east or southeast towards that train, and away from a passenger train, which was approaching from the north on track No. 2. As he reached track No. 2, on which the south-bound passenger train was coming, and had stepped one foot over the west rail, he was struck by that train, and killed. He had not reached any platform provided for passengers, or a point where such platform connected with the sidewalk that he was on, or any place where passengers were accustomed to get upon the train. He had a commutation ticket in his pocket, which was still good for one ride.

The charges of negligence and the allegation of due care on the part of Jennings were in controversy at the trial, but the bill of exceptions shows that the principal dispute was as to whether Jennings had become a passenger on defendant's railroad. On that question the defendant asked the court to give to the jury five instructions as to what facts were necessary to prove the averment that Jennings was a passenger, and four of them required proof of that averment to authorize a recovery under the declaration. The general purport of these instructions was that Jennings would not become a passenger, or be received by the defendant as a passenger, until he should have reached the station or platform for the purpose of taking such train, or the point where passengers were in the habit of getting on such train; and the fifth was as follows: "The plaintiff in this case has alleged in his declaration that Jennings was received by the defendant as a passenger, and in order to recover under this declaration the plaintiff must prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between Jennings and the defendant when he was struck by the defendant's engine. As a matter of law, the court instructs the jury that a person does not become a passenger until he has in some way placed himself under the care and control of the carrier, and has been expressly or impliedly received as a passenger by the carrier, and that the fact, if it be a fact, that Jennings was on his way to defendant's station, for the purpose and with the intention of taking the defendant's train into the city, is not sufficient to make him a passenger and create the relation of passenger towards the defendant, and that relation would not commence, and he would not be received as a passenger, until he should reach the defendant's station or platform or point where he intended to take his train." The court refused to give any of these instructions, and did not give any which covered the same ground, or give the jury any information as to what proof was required to sustain the averment that Jennings had become a passenger. The jury were left without any guide as to the law on that subject.

What facts will create the contract relation of carrier and passenger is a question of law, and, when the existence of such relation is in controversy, it is the duty of the court to give a proper instruction, presented by a party, informing the jury what facts will be sufficient evidence of the contract. Peculiar duties and liabilities on the part of the carrier arise out of, and are based on, the existence of such contract. There is a wide difference between the liability of a railroad company to persons on street crossings or on its premises who are not passengers and its liability to its passengers. A railroad company owes to its passenger the highest practicable degree of care in transporting him and in the management and operation of its trains, and slight negligence is such a breach of that duty as will render it liable. If Jennings was a passenger the defendant owed to him the highest degree of care and prudence to carry him to his destination, to protect him from injuries from its servants and trains, and to afford him a reasonable opportunity to leave the train with safety. Pennsylvania Co. v. McCaffrey, 173 Ill. 169, 50 N. E. 713. The responsibility for this degree of care, and the liability for a failure to exercise it, begin when the contract relation begins. It is not necessary, to create the relation, that the passenger should have entered a train; but if he is at the place provided for passengers, such as the waiting room or platform at the station, with the intention of taking passage, and has a ticket, he is entitled to all the rights and privileges of a passenger. A railroad company owes a general duty to receive and carry those who present themselves at the time and place provided for passengers requiring transportation. In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Wilson, 63 Ill. 167, 54 L. R. A.

Wilson, after purchasing a ticket for a train, was standing on a platform constructed by the railroad company for the convenience of passengers between the main track and a switch track. He was waiting for the passengers to alight from the train upon which he expected to take passage, when he was struck and injured by another train. The court regarded him as a passenger, and held the company liable for the character of the platform. In North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 275, 29 N. E. 672, it was held that the contract constituting the relation of carrier and passenger might be implied from the attempt of Williams to enter, in a proper manner, a street car as a passenger, with the intention of being transported thereon.

When the passenger has presented himself at the proper place to be transported, his right to care and protection begins. Cooley, Torts, 653. But it is uniformly held that the passenger must have placed himself under the care of the railroad company, so that the circumstances will warrant an understanding on the part of the company that he is a passenger and under its care as such. Although it is not necessary that fare should have been paid or an express contract made, it is necessary that a person should be under the control of a carrier in order to be entitled to its care as a passenger. 2 Wood, Railroads, 1037. He must be at some place under the control of the carrier and provided for passengers, so that it may exercise the high degree of care exacted from it, and the mere fact that an intending passenger has a ticket and intends to take a train does not create the relation of carrier and passenger. In 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 488, the time when that relation begins is stated as follows: "The relation of carrier and passenger begins when one puts himself in the care of the carrier, or directly within its control, with the bona fide intention of becoming a passenger, and is accepted as such by the carrier. Seldom, however, is there any formal act of delivery of the passenger's person into the care of the carrier, or of acceptance by the carrier of one who presents himself for transportation; hence the existence of the relation is commonly to be implied from the circumstances attendant. The rule is that these circumstances must be such as will warrant an implication that one has offered himself to be carried, and that the offer has been accepted by the carrier." In Elliott, Railroads, § 1579, it is said: "A person may become a passenger before he has entered the train or vehicle of the carrier. We think it safe to say that a person becomes a passenger when, intending to take passage, he enters a place provided for the reception of passengers, as a depot, waiting room, or the like, at a time when such a place is open for the reception of persons intending to take passage on the trains of the company." In § 1581 the author says: "The relation cannot exist unless the person claiming to be a passenger has been impliedly or expressly received as such by the carrier."

In June v. Boston & A. R. Co. 153 Mass. 79, 26 N. E. 238, a person was walking towards the station on a plank walk, on the premises of the railroad company, intending to take a train, and was struck by another train. The court held that he was not a passenger, and said that argument was not necessary to show that a man walking towards a railroad station, with the intention of buying a ticket and taking a train after he got there, was not a passenger, even if he might be in the same place if he had begun his journey. If the relation has never been entered into, the question is not the same as where a passenger may rightfully be without ceasing to be a passenger after the relation has been assumed.

In Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 298, 24 L. R. A. 521, 37 N. E. 166, plaintiff alleged that her intestate was a passenger on defendant's railroad. The evidence was that he had in his pocket a 10-trip ticket between Boston and the station where the accident happened. He was running from the street across the company's tracks on its premises to catch a train about to start, when he was struck and killed by another train. The court held that he had not become a passenger, and said: "One becomes a passenger on a railroad when he puts himself into the care of the railroad company, to be transported under a contract, and is received and accepted as a passenger by the company. There is hardly ever any formal act of delivery of one's person into the care of the carrier, or of acceptance by the carrier of one who presents himself for transportation, and so the existence of the relation of passenger and carrier is commonly to be implied from circumstances. These circumstances must be such as to warrant an implication that the one has offered himself to be carried on a trip about to be made, and that the other has accepted his offer, and has received him to be properly cared for until the trip is begun, and then to be carried over the railroad."

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Keefe, 168 Ill. 115, 39 L. R. A. 148, 48 N. E. 294, plaintiff's intestate got upon the train after it had left the station and platform, and at a place not provided for passengers. We held, in accordance with the authorities, that a passenger must put himself in the care of the railroad company, and there must be something from which it may fairly be implied that the company had accepted him as a passenger.

Since a railroad company owes the duty of protection to its passengers, it seems plain that the circumstances must be such that the company will understand that such a person is a passenger in its care and entitled to its protection. The company certainly has a right to know that the relation and duty exist, and the passenger must be at some place provided by the company for passengers, or some place occupied or used by them in waiting for or getting on or off trains. Whenever a person goes into such a place with the intention of taking passage, he may fairly expect that the company will understand that he is a passenger and protect him. If he could be a passenger before reaching such a place, there would be no limit or place where it could be said that he became a passenger. The intention of taking a train would only prove a purpose to enter into the contract relation, but would not create it. Any person walking towards a train on a public sidewalk might have no intention whatever of taking the train, but might have an intention to keep on along the street. So long as a person merely intends to be carried, but has not reached any place provided for passengers or used for their accommodation, he is not a passenger. Counsel for appellee have not found any authority holding differently from those above cited, and all the authorities seem to be in accord on the question.

Appellee, however, insists that, even if the relation of passenger and carrier alleged in the declaration was not proved, it was not so material as to require absolute proof; that the evidence justified a finding that defendant was guilty of negligence in failing to observe its common-law duty of ordinary care not to injure a person on a street crossing; that it failed to exercise such ordinary care as it would owe to Jennings if he was not a passenger; and that it could not have been harmed by the refusal of the instructions. Even if it were true that a recovery might be had, under the declaration, by proof of a different relation and duty from those alleged in the declaration, it would not justify the refusal of the court to inform the jury what would create the relation of carrier and passenger, and impose upon the defendant the highest degree of care and diligence for the safety of Jennings. The third instruction refused was of that character. If that were the case, the rights and duties of the parties would be presented to the jury in two aspects, with different duties and liabilities. If Jennings was not a passenger, and his rights grew out of the fact that he was crossing a street at an intersection of defendant's railroad, the defendant would be bound to exercise towards him ordinary care, while if he was a passenger it would owe him the highest degree of care. The jury would be called upon to determine the liability of the defendant upon entirely different grounds, and might conclude that the defendant exercised ordinary care, but not the highest degree of care. The rule, however, is fundamental that a plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the case made by his declaration (Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Driscoll, 176 Ill. 330, 52 N. E. 921); and under the declaration the allegation in question was a material one. There was no count upon the common-law duty of a railroad company arising out of its relations to a person crossing a street over its tracks or resting on a relation of that kind. Every count was based on the contract relation, and plaintiff was bound to prove it. The defendant did not, in any manner, waive its rights in that respect or fail to opportunely object to a variance. The objection was continually made in the course of the trial, as appears from the bill of exceptions. Evidence as to the use of the platform between the two tracks and the possession of the commutation ticket by Jennings was objected to as an attempt to make a different case, and because the evidence already showed that he was not a passenger. The defendant also moved to direct a verdict for it because there was no proof that Jennings was a passenger or had been received as such, and that the proof was at variance with the declaration. The objection of variance was never waived, but was insisted upon throughout the trial and by asking the instructions in question. The court need not have given all of the five instructions, as they were mainly repetitions of the same rule, but it was harmful error to refuse to give any of them.

The judgments of the Circuit Court and Appellate Court are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court.

Magruder, J., dissenting:

I do not concur in much that is said in this opinion, nor do I agree to the conclusion reached by it. In my judgment the appellate court was right in affirming the judgment of the trial court, and gave good reasons for doing so in the following opinion:

"On behalf of appellant it is claimed that there was error—First, in not directing a verdict for appellant; second, in the admission of evidence; and, third, in the refusal of instructions asked by appellant, and also in the modification of certain instructions requested by it.

"Under the first point, it is argued that Jennings failed to use the slightest care and caution for his own safety. We think the matter of Jennings' care was a question for the jury, and under the evidence, which is somewhat conflicting, reasonable and fair-minded persons might, acting reasonably, have reached different conclusions; and, this being so, the case was properly submitted to the consideration of the jury. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kelly, 80 Ill. App. 675, Affirmed in 182 Ill. 267, 54 N. E. 979, and cases there cited; Offutt v. World's Columbian Exposition, 175 Ill. 472, 51 N. E. 651; Pennsylvania Co. v. McCaffrey, 173 Ill. 169, 50 N. E. 713. The evidence shows that Jennings, at the time of his death, was sixty-five years of age, and had been in the habit of taking the appellant's suburban trains at its Seventy-Sixth street station almost daily for a period of nearly five years, at or about 7:37 A. M., to go to his work, which was that of a glass bender, at Fifty-Ninth street and Union avenue, nearer the heart of the city than Seventy-Sixth street. In his pocket-book, in the pocket of a suit which he was wearing at the time of the accident, there was found a commutation 10-ride ticket from Auburn Junction to Fifty-Ninth street, with one ride unused. This ticket was the one ordinarily used on appellant's railway between Seventy-Sixth and Fifty-Ninth streets. At Seventy-Sixth street appellant's depot is upon the east side of its tracks, which consist of four main tracks, a spur, and two cut-offs, the two easterly tracks being used for passenger trains; the most easterly being for north-bound trains, and known as 'Track No. 1,' the next to the west being for south-bound trains, and known as 'No. 2,' and the two tracks still to the west being for freight trains. Directly east of track No. 1, extending from that track to the depot on the east, is a platform made of 2-inch planks on a level with the top of the rails, extending north from the sidewalk crossing about 100 feet, at the north end being about 10 feet wide, and at the south end being about 17 or 18 feet wide. To the west of the north-bound track, on the same level, and extending from the north-bound to the south-bound track, from the Seventy-Sixth street sidewalk, about 100 feet north, is a similar platform. Substantially the whole crossing of Seventy-Sixth street is covered by similar planking on the same level with the platforms, extending across all of appellant's tracks, and reaching to the north sidewalk of the crossing, and making a continuous platform or planking between tracks Nos. 1 and 2 from a point about 100 feet north of Seventy-Sixth street to the south line of said street, and a similar continuous platform and planking, on the same level, east of and immediately contiguous to track No. 1, from a point 100 feet north of Seventy-Sixth street to the south line of the street, with the exception of a narrow space between the south sidewalk and the planking of the street crossing proper between the rails of track No. 1, and also to the east of the east rail of track No. 1. The north sidewalk of Seventy-Sixth street joins the east rail of track No. 2, and there is a small space between this sidewalk and the planking of the street crossing extending from the east rail of track No. 2 towards the west. All this planking between tracks Nos. 1 and 2, including the sidewalks on both sides of Seventy-Sixth street was commonly used by persons in the habit of taking or leaving appellant's suburban trains at this point, and Jennings, during all the time he had taken these trains at this station, was in the habit of approaching this platform between the tracks Nos. 1 and 2 from the west on the north sidewalk of Seventy-Sixth street, his home being at a point northwesterly from the intersection of Seventy-Sixth street and appellant's railroad tracks. He usually and ordinarily took appellant's north-bound suburban train leaving the Seventy-Sixth street station at 7:37 A. M., and at the time he was killed was on his way to take this train, going along the north sidewalk, and was struck by appellant's south-bound train, either as he stood very near the west rail of the south-bound track, or just as he was in the act of stepping across this track on the sidewalk connecting with the platform beyond it to the east. The north-bound train was about on time, but the south-bound train which struck

Jennings, as we think a preponderance of the evidence clearly establishes, was several minutes behind time. These trains usually and ordinarily passed each other, when on time, at or about Eighty-First street, which is five blocks to the south of Seventy-Sixth street, and several of the witnesses testify that they never knew, although they were familiar with the running of the trains at this point, of this south-bound train passing Seventy-Sixth street at the time the north-bound train was stopping there or about to stop there. The north-bound train was scheduled to stop at this station at or about the time that it did actually stop on the morning of the accident, but the south-bound train was not scheduled to stop at this station. Appellant's engineer was an experienced man, had for some years been running this particular south-bound train, and must be presumed to have been familiar with the fact that the north-bound train was scheduled to stop at this station for the receipt and discharge of passengers, and, in any event, the evidence shows that he saw the north-bound train as he approached the station from the north, and could easily have seen, if he did not see, that the north-bound train was either stopped at the station or was in the act of stopping. He testified that this north-bound train was not a stranger to him, and he had seen it leaving there as his train would be coming up, sometimes; that he knew perfectly well that this was not the place he commonly passed it; that it stopped at this station for passengers at about 7:37 A. M., as far as he recollected. There were also offered in evidence two rules of the appellant company which were in force at the time, as follows: 'Rule 114. Great care must be exercised by trainmen of a train approaching a station where any train is receiving or discharging passengers. Rule 114a. On double track, opposing trains must not pass while passengers are being received or discharged.'

"The engineer of the south-bound train was no doubt familiar with these rules, though he testifies that he did not remember of being told by one Friedlander that there was a rule prohibiting him from passing a train at a station. He should have been familiar with them. While it does not appear that Jennings was, in fact, familiar with these rules, from the fact that for five years preceding he had been in the habit of riding upon appellant's suburban trains almost daily, it is reasonable to presume that he knew of such a rule, and, if he did, he had the right to rely upon its observance by appellant's servants. Moreover, because of his long daily habit of taking this particular north-bound train at this time, it must be presumed that he knew of the fact that the two trains usually and ordinarily passed each other at or about Eighty-First street, which was about half a mile to the south, and it is but reasonable that he should have expected that the south-bound train had already passed at the time he reached the vicinity of the station. It also appears from the evidence that as he approached the station from the west, and as he walked along the sidewalk, across the spur, cut-offs, and freight tracks, the north-bound train was coming into the station, and at the time that he approached track No. 2, and as he stood very near it, there was considerable noise from the movement of the train and escaping steam, and that he was looking towards this train; some of the witnesses saying in an easterly, but most of them in a southeasterly, direction. The preponderance of the evidence is that, when the north-bound train came to a stop, the rear cars of it, the train being composed of some seven or eight coaches, extended partly across, if not entirely across, Seventy-Sixth street. The engine of the south-bound train, as the evidence tends to show, struck Jennings either just as the north-bound train was stopped or about to stop, and we think the clear preponderance of the evidence is that at the time he was struck the engine of the north-bound train and several of the cars had already passed the north sidewalk of Seventy-Sixth street. The preponderance of the evidence shows, we think, that the whistle of the south-bound engine was sounded, some of the witnesses saying that it gave several shrill whistles near or north of Seventy-Fifth street, in order to warn a colored man who was walking upon the tracks at a point near and south of Seventy-Fifth street; and there is also evidence that a shrill blast of the whistle was given—the engineer says three or four short whistles and then a long one—as it approached Seventy-Sixth street; also that he first blew the whistle as a warning to Jennings when the train was 40 feet or more north of the crossing. All of the witnesses who testified as to the circumstances attending the accident say that they heard the whistle of the south-bound train either north of Seventy-Fifth street or as it was near Seventy-Sixth street. Most of these witnesses stood either at points on the platform or crossing east of track No. 1, or near the crossing on the west.

"Other circumstances testified to by the various witnesses, bearing upon the question of Jennings' care, appear from the evidence, all of which we have carefully considered, and we cannot say that a finding by the jury, considering all the evidence, that Jennings exercised such care as an ordinarily prudent person would have done under the circumstances shown, can be said to be manifestly against the evidence. Whether he should have looked to the north, under all the circumstances shown, was a question of fact for the jury, as has been repeatedly held by this and the supreme court. Partlow v. Illinois C. R. Co. 150 Ill. 321, 37 N. E. 663; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hansen, 166 Ill. 623, 46 N. E. 1071; Pennsylvania Co. v. Frana, 112 Ill. 398; North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Nelson, 79 Ill. App. 229; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Smith, 180 Ill. 453, 54 N. E. 325; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Batson, 81 Ill. App. 143. In the Partlow Case, 150 Ill. 321, 37 N. E. 663, while the court says that it has been said, in discussing a question of fact, it was the duty of a person approaching a railroad crossing to look and listen before attempting to cross, and that a failure so to do was negligence, it also says: 'The court cannot say, as a matter of law, that the failure to look and listen is negligence. These facts are proper for the consideration of the jury in determining whether a person has been negligent, but it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that a failure to observe such acts is negligence,'—citing cases. The same doctrine is reaffirmed in the Hansen Case, 166 Ill. 623, 46 N. E. 1071, and the court says: 'It seems to us impossible that there should be a rule of law as to what particular thing a person is bound to do for his protection in the diversity of cases that constantly arise, and the question what a reasonably prudent person would do for his own safety, under like circumstances, must be left to the jury as one of fact.'

"On the matter of the speed of the south-bound train at and immediately preceding the time of the accident there is a conflict in the evidence, the various witnesses placing the speed at from 20 to 40 miles per hour. The engineer says he was running between 20 and 25 miles per hour. A brakeman on the same train said that it was running about 20 miles an hour. One of plaintiff's witnesses, who was engaged in the coal business at Seventy-Sixth street for six years and entirely familiar with the running of trains, says that it was going about 35 miles per hour. Another, Johnson, who lived close by the tracks, and was walking upon the south-bound track about half way between Seventy-Fifth and Seventy-Sixth streets, to warn whom the first shrill whistles were given, said the train was going at 35 or 40 miles an hour,—'she was flying.' Another witness, an advertising agent, familiar with the running of railway trains, says that it was running 35 or 40 miles an hour; that before it struck Jennings it seemed to be going a little slower, but it was coming very fast. The ordinance which was put in evidence limited the speed of passenger trains at this point to 30 miles per hour.

"From a full consideration of the evidence, we cannot say that a finding by the jury that the speed of the train between Seventy-Fifth and Seventy-Sixth streets exceeded 30 miles an hour can be said to be manifestly against the evidence. But if it be conceded that the speed of the train was less than 30 miles per hour, and therefore not in violation of the ordinance, we are of opinion that under the first count of the declaration, which charges that the train was carelessly, negligently, and improperly driven, managed, and run, the claim of negligence, generally, is established by the evidence. The running of the train at all past the station was a violation of the rule of the company which required that it should not pass the north-bound train while passengers were being received or discharged. There is evidence that the north-bound train had stopped for the purpose of receiving and discharging passengers, and that there were numerous passengers upon the platform and at the crossing waiting to take the train. Also, taking the evidence of the engineer that he was running at the rate of 20 to 25 miles per hour, that was a negligent rate of speed, considering all the circumstances shown, and was in direct violation of the rule of the company, which required that 'great care must be exercised by trainmen of a train approaching a station when any train is receiving or discharging passengers.' In the Kelly Case, 80 Ill. App. 675, Affirmed in 182 Ill. 267, 54 N. E. 979, it was said, Mr. Justice Wright delivering the opinion of the court, and which was adopted by the supreme court, that 'the running of a freight train at a high rate of speed past a station where a passenger train is receiving and discharging passengers is so plainly negligent as not to require comment. It is equally negligent to so run a freight train just as the passenger train is pulling into the station, and more especially when the track on which the freight train is moving is between the depot and the track on which the passenger train is moving.' So we are of opinion in this case that the jury were justified in finding that the appellant was negligent, not only because the train was run at a speed in violation of the city ordinance, but in violation of its own rules, and also in running past the north-bound train at the rate of 20 or 25 miles per hour, even if it had not stopped, but was upon the point of stopping, at the station for the purpose of receiving and discharging passengers.

"It is claimed by appellant's counsel that as it is alleged in each count of the declaration that Jennings was received by the appellant as a passenger, and because there was no evidence tending to prove this allegation of the declaration, there could be no recovery. We think the contention is not tenable, for two reasons: First, because the evidence tends to show that Jennings was received as a passenger, and from it the jury were justified in finding that he was so received; and, second, the proof of the allegation was not necessary to a recovery in this case.

"From the evidence, partly hereinabove stated, while it appears that Jennings was not actually upon the platform between tracks Nos. 1 and 2, he was within a few feet of it, approaching it upon the sidewalk built of the same kind of material as the platform by the appellant, which platform was immediately adjoining the sidewalk, between the tracks, upon the same level therewith, and the sidewalk was immediately adjoining and connected with the planking which formed the street crossing, all of which crossing, including the said sidewalk, was habitually and commonly used by persons and passengers who were received and discharged from appellant's suburban trains. This, with the further fact that Jennings had for several years prior thereto been almost daily in the habit of approaching appellant's trains, as well as leaving them, by this platform crossing and sidewalk, and that he had upon his person a commutation ticket which was good for passage upon appellant's railway trains, was sufficient proof to support the allegation that he was received as a passenger by the appellant. We think that under these facts it may be said that he was upon the premises of the carrier,—at least, premises which it had appropriated and used for the purpose of receiving and discharging its passengers, and for their convenience.

"In 2 Wood, Railway Law, 1037, it is said: 'It is not always easy to determine when the relation of passenger begins, but it would seem from the cases that it is not necessary that a contract for passage should have been actually made, or the fare actually paid, in order to create the relation, but it is necessary that a person should be under the control of the carrier in order to be entitled to its care as such. Therefore a person cannot be regarded as a passenger who is not upon the premises of the carrier.' In Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Keefe, 168 Ill. 115, 39 L. R. A. 148, 48 N. E. 294, the court, in considering the question as to when the relation of passenger and carrier exists, says: 'One does not become a passenger until he has put himself in charge of the carrier, and has been expressly or impliedly received as such by the carrier.' In Cooley, Torts, 770, the author says: 'The responsibility of the carrier begins when the passenger presents himself for transportation, and this he may be said to do when he approaches the place of reception for the purpose.' The following authorities hold, in substance, that this relation commences when a person goes upon the premises of the carrier for the purpose of taking a train, and its premises are considered as any place where it has been allowed a custom to receive passengers, even where there is no platform provided, and that it is necessary only, in order to create the relation, that the person should be upon the premises of the carrier for present transportation and waiting to take the train. *Lent v. "As we have seen by the several counts of the declaration, besides the allegation that Jennings was received as a passenger, it is averred that it was the duty of appellant to have allowed Jennings to safely cross the railroad track to safely take and mount the train, and not to have negligently driven its engine and train of cars up to and over the crossing when Jennings was standing or walking over the crossing, with all due care and diligence on his part, for the purpose of reaching and mounting the north-bound train. We think the proof of this allegation was entirely sufficient, so far as concerns the question of care on Jennings' part and the negligence of the appellant, to justify a recovery without any proof that he was received as a passenger. It is elementary that in this class of cases the proof of one charge of negligence is sufficient to justify a recovery, so far as negligence is concerned, without proving other charges of negligence made by the declaration. If Jennings was received as a passenger, appellant's duty to him was that of the highest care; but, if he was not, it still owed him the duty of exercising ordinary care, at least, to avoid injuring him.

"On behalf of appellant it is also claimed that there was error in permitting evidence as to the use made, prior to the accident, of the planking between the north and south bound tracks in alighting from, and taking suburban trains at, the Seventy-Sixth street station, and also as to the extent of such use. No authority is cited in support of the contention, and we think what has already been said shows that this evidence was entirely proper and admissible.

"The learned trial judge refused thirteen instructions asked for appellant, and modified two others, each of which rulings is claimed to have been erroneous. Five of these instructions, numbered 1 to 5, inclusive, are based upon the theory that it was necessary for appellee to prove, before there could be a recovery, that Jennings had been received as a passenger by appellant. What has been said sufficiently disposes of the claim that it was error to refuse these instructions.

"Two others of these instructions, Nos. 6 and 7, are based upon the theory that it was the duty of Jennings to have looked in each direction for the approach of trains, and in substance tell the jury that there could be no recovery unless he did so look. What has been said we think disposes of this contention, and shows that it was not error for the court to refuse the instructions.

"The ninth refused instruction is, in substance, covered by the tenth. Instruction No. 11, refused, is, in our opinion, properly refused, because it singles out and calls to the attention of the jury a particular part of the evidence. We think the twelfth and thirteenth refused instructions were properly refused; the twelfth because there was evidence that the north-bound train had stopped at the station for the purpose of receiving and discharging passengers, and that it was a violation of the appellant's rule for the south-bound train to pass it under such circumstances. The thirteenth instruction ignores the rule of the company, and was therefore properly refused. The fourteenth instruction was properly refused, because, among other things, it tells the jury there was no proof as to whether or not the bell on the engine of the south-bound train or the tower bell was ringing as the south-bound train approached the crossing. The first of appellee's witnesses testified that 'aside from the shrill whistling that occurred before the accident I didn't hear, notice, or remember anything else.' From this evidence we think the jury were justified in finding that neither of these bells was rung.

The fifteenth instruction was properly refused because it is argumentative, and, besides, it in substance tells the jury that certain facts constitute negligence. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Griffin, 184 Ill. 10, 6 N. E. 337. Instructions numbered 10½ and 11 were properly modified. Instruction 10½, as asked, had the same defect, as to Jennings' duty to look up and down the tracks, as in instructions 6 and 7, refused. As modified, this objection was cured. The eleventh instruction was as favorable to appellant as it was modified. Being of opinion that the jury was sufficiently instructed as to the issues involved, and that there is no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed."

James W. GIBSON.

(191 Ill. 865.)

1. A provision in a certificate of membership in a benefit society, that the holder shall comply with the constitution and by-laws of the association, a copy of which is attached to the certificate, refers to such laws as they then exist, and will not bind him to submit to a change subsequently made depriving him of the right to dispose of the benefit by will, although the constitution provides for amendment.
2. Action of the appellate court not assigned as error is not subject to review in the supreme court.

Mr. George G. Bellows for appellee.

Beggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Leander E. Nelson (now deceased) at the time of his death was a member in good standing in the Scandinavian Mutual Aid Association. He was admitted to membership on the 8th day of November, 1886, and on that day received a mortuary benefit certificate issued by the said association, in the sum of $3,000, to be paid to Eva Nelson, his mother, and appellant's (Peterson's) intestate, she having died during the pendency of this proceeding. The said Leander E. Nelson departed this life March 12, 1897, leaving a last will and testament, which was duly admitted to probate. The will appointed appellee, Gibson, executor, and provided that the provision in the benefit certificate making said Eva Nelson sole beneficiary of the mortuary fund should be revoked, and that such fund should be bequeathed and made payable as follows: $1,000 to his mother, said Eva Nelson; $1 each to Minnie Peterson, Hannah Cederstrom, John Nelson, and Gustav Nelson; and the remainder to the appellee, James W. Gibson. Said Eva Nelson, who was then living, asserted a claim to the entire amount of said mortuary fund, and said appellee, Gibson, as legatee under the will of said Leander E. Nelson and as executor thereof, claimed the right to receive all of such mortuary fund above the sum of $1,000, in accordance with the will of the deceased assured. Under a bill of interpleader filed by the association these rival claimants were brought into court, and required to submit their contentions to the court for determination. The association deposited in court the mortuary fund, less $13 allowed it for costs in that behalf, and was dismissed from the proceeding. Upon a hearing the chancellor sustained the right of the assured to dispose of the mortuary fund by will, and the decree was affirmed in the appellate court for the first district on appeal. This is a further appeal from the judgment of the appellate court.

Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1885, p. 1348), under which the Scandinavian Mutual Aid Association was incorporated, authorized the association to furnish life indemnity, or pecuniary benefits to certain relatives by consanguinity or affinity, and to the "devises or legatees" of deceased members. This section was in full force, and in no wise modified or changed, when said Leander E. Nelson received his beneficiary certificate, on the 8th day of November, 1886. Nor had the association, by by-law or otherwise, attempted to place any restriction on the right of any member to appoint by his last will a beneficiary other than the person named in the certificate to receive the mortuary fund. In such associations the beneficiaries do not, as a general rule, acquire a vested right to the mortuary fund, but during the lifetime of the member have a mere expectancy only, subject to be defeated by the exercise of the power of appointment which is vested in the member. Martin v. Stubbings, 126 Ill. 387, 18 N. E. 657; Moore v. Chicago Guaranty Fund Life Soc. 178 Ill. 202, 52 N. E. 882; Bloomington Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Blue, 120 Ill. 121, 60 Am. Rep. 558, 11 N. E. 331; Voigt v. Kersten, 164 Ill. 314, 45 N. E. 543. The power of appointment thus vested in the assured member may be divested by future changes in the constitution of the association or the organic law under which it was organized, if it was made a part of the contract admitting the assured to membership that his right in this respect should be subject to such future changes in the law governing the association but otherwise the power of appointment is a vested right, and cannot be taken away by any subsequent enactment or change in the laws of the association. Voigt v. Kersten, 164 Ill. 314, 45 N. E. 543; Baldwin v. Begley, 185 Ill. 180, 56 N. E. 1065.

The contention of the appellant is that the said assured, as a part of the contract admitting him to membership in the association, agreed that he would comply with and be bound by, the constitution and by-laws of the association, as such constitution and by-laws might or should be amended or changed in the future; and appellant further contends that the constitution and by-laws of the association were subsequently so legally amended and changed as to divest the said member of the right to change the beneficiary by his last will. The insistence that it was part of the contract that the association reserved to itself power to change and amend the constitution and by-laws, and that the said Leander E. Nelson agreed that power should be so reserved, and that he would be bound by the constitution and by-laws as they might be thereafter amended, is based alone upon a clause or provision found in the certificate of membership issued to the said Nelson. The provision in the certificate is as follows: "This certificate is issued upon the condition that the said Leander E. Nelson shall comply with the constitution and by-laws of the association, and that the statements made in the application for this certificate are true." A copy of the constitution and of the by-laws of the association was attached to the certificate of membership, and made a part thereof. Section 7 of article 9 of said constitution, as it stood at the time said certificate was issued to Nelson, was as follows: "The constitution can be amended and changed at the annual meeting of the association by a majority of two thirds of all the members present." It should here be noted that that which is referred to as the constitution of this association is in no sense the charter of the association. What is here referred to as the constitution is but a code of laws adopted by the association. It was correctly said in Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Knight, 117 Ind. 489, 3 L. R. A. 409, 20 N. E. 479: "A constitution of a voluntary association or a corporation is nothing more than a by-law under an appropriate name."

The clause in the certificate does not purport to bind the member to the observance of constitutional provisions or by-laws other than such as then existed, and a copy of the so-called "constitution and by-laws" then in force was attached to the certificate as a part thereof. It was the constitution and the by-laws so made a part of the certificate to which the certificate had reference and which the member consented to obey. It is only when a member, in express terms, agrees to be bound by such constitutional amendments or by-laws as may thereafter be enacted that he is bound by future amendments or by-laws which impair the obligations of his contract of membership injuriously. Covenant Mut. Life Assn. v. Kentner, 188 Ill. 431, 58 N. E. 966; Baldwin v. Begley, 185 Ill. 180, 56 N. E. 1065. In the absence of such an express agreement the contract of membership cannot be impaired by subsequent changes effected by the association. The constitutional provision contained in said § 7 of article 9 of the constitution of the association at the time of the admission of said Nelson to membership in the association, to the effect that the constitution could be amended and changed at an annual meeting of the association by a majority of two thirds of all the members present, cannot be construed to authorize an amendment or change in the constitution which should act retrospectively, and impair the obligation of the contract entered into between the association and said Nelson prior to such amendment of the constitution.

As before remarked, that which is called the constitution of the association is but a code of by-laws adopted by the association. The association had inherent power to enact by-laws consistent with the provisions of the enactment under which it was organized, and not repugnant to the constitution of the state of Illinois, and to alter and amend such by-laws. The by-law incorporated in the code called the constitution, relative to amendments and changes in such code, did not confer upon the association the right or power to make such amendments or changes. The association possessed that power as an attribute of its corporate life. The said § 7 of article 9 of the code of by-laws had no other effect than to declare the mode or manner of exercising the power of amendment possessed by the association, viz., by a majority of two thirds of all the members present at the annual meeting. If the section had been wholly omitted from the constitution or by-laws, the association would have had ample power to pass any lawful amendment of the constitution or by-laws. Niblack, Ben. Soc. p. 105, § 28; 1 Bacon, Ben. Soc. 2d ed. § 9. The assent of the assured, therefore, did not confer any power on the association which without such assent it had not, nor did it bind the assured to submit to any amendment to which he could not be compelled to submit in the absence of said § 7. His assent was that the association, at any annual meeting, might make any change or amendment lawful to be made, by a majority of two thirds of all the members present, and cannot be construed as an assent to the adoption of a by-law divesting him of a vested right, and impairing the obligation of his contract of membership. Section 14 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1870 inhibited the general assembly from adopting any statute impairing the obligation of such contract of membership. Subsequent enactments of the legislature or future amended by-laws of the association could not operate retrospectively, and thus divest the vested rights of a member or destroy existing contract obligations. In revoking the direction of the certificate as to the person to receive the mortuary benefit, and in appointing others as beneficiaries to receive such fund, said Leander E. Nelson but exercised a legal right of which he was possessed.

A portion of the brief in behalf of appellee is devoted to the criticism of the action of the chancellor in relieving the appellant from the payment of any portion of the cost of the proceeding. The appellate court affirmed the action of the chancellor in respect of the order as to costs. The action of the appellate court in that respect is not assigned as for error in this court, and for that reason is not subject to review in this court.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

ERROR to the Criminal Court for Cook County to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating a statute prohibiting lodging-house keepers from permitting more than a specified number of persons to occupy the same room during a night. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. J. Scofield and Charles J. Scofield, for plaintiff in error:

The words "lodging house" as used in the amendatory act do not include an inn or a hotel, and probably do not include a boarding house. The law is therefore aimed at one class, the keepers of lodging houses.

Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Smith, 73 Ill. 360, 24 Am. Rep. 258; Bullock v. Adair, 63 Ill. App. 30.

The right to receive lodgers in a lodging house, to contract with them as to compensation, to agree with them as to the number who shall occupy the same room at the same time for sleeping purposes, is a liberty and also a property right. Any abridgment of this right deprives the individual of liberty and property, and, if such abridgment be without due process of law, the act is unconstitutional.

"Due process of law" does not mean a statute passed for the purpose of working the wrong. These words are held to be synonymous with the words, "law of the land," and this means general public law, binding upon all the members of the community under all circumstances, and not partial or private laws, affecting the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals.

Boggs, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The act of the general assembly entitled "An Act to Create and Establish a Board of Health in the State of Illinois," approved May 28, 1877, in force July 1, 1877 (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1899, p. 1604), was amended by the addition of four sections thereto by an enactment approved April 21, 1899, entitled "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act to Create and Establish a Board of Health in the State of Illinois'" (Id. p. 1606). Section 15 of the amendatory act provides the state board of health shall have supervision of "all lodging houses in cities of 100,000 inhabitants or more." Section 16 of the amendatory act is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for more than six persons to occupy the same room for sleeping purposes at the same time in any such lodging house, and no room in such lodging house shall be occupied for sleeping purposes which does not contain 400 cubic feet or more of space for each person sleeping therein at the same time." A complaint was filed before a justice of the peace alleging that the plaintiff in error was the landlord of a "lodging house" at No. 39 Custom House place, in the city of Chicago, and that on the 26th day of November, 1899, he wilfully and knowingly permitted more than six persons to occupy the same room for sleeping purposes at the same time in said lodging house, in violation of the provisions of said § 16, hereinbefore set out. The plaintiff in error was arrested on a complaint filed with a justice of the peace, tried, and convicted of the offense purported to be set forth in the complaint, and a fine of $25 assessed against him. He prosecuted an appeal to the criminal court of Cook county, where, upon a hearing, he was again adjudged guilty, and condemned to pay a fine in the sum of $100 and the costs in the cause. He prosecutes this writ of error to reverse such judgment of said criminal court.

The evidence established, without dispute, that the plaintiff in error kept a lodging house at No. 39 Custom House place, in Chicago, and on November 26, 1899, permitted 19 persons to sleep in one room of the said lodging house, the dimensions of said room being 70 feet in length, 62 feet in width, and 13 feet and 3 inches in height; that there were 64 beds in the room, of which 19 were occupied on the occasion in question. The only defense presented in the lower court was that said § 16 was in contravention of the rights guaranteed to the plaintiff in error by the Constitution of the state, and therefore void. Propositions of law to that effect were presented to the trial court, but were refused. The action of the court in passing upon the propositions of law is the sole error assigned in this court.

The guaranty of § 2 of article 2 of the Constitution of 1870 is that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law. The term "property" includes every interest anyone may have in any and every thing that is the subject of ownership by man, together with the right to freely possess, use, enjoy, and dispose of the same. Frorer v. People use of School Fund, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492, 31 N. E. 395; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, 35 N. E. 62; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, 40 N. E. 454; Gillespie v. People, 188 Ill. 176, 52 L. R. A. 283, 58 N. E. 1007; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 284, 285; Booth v. People, 186 Ill. 43, 50 L. R. A. 762, 57 N. E. 798. The privilege of contracting to receive gains and profits for the right to use property granted to another is both a liberty and property right. Frorer v. People use of School Fund, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492, 31 N. E. 395. The right to make a reasonable contract with reference to the use of a thing is an attribute of property and a property right. Booth v. People, 186 Ill. 43, 50

L. R. A. 762, 57 N. E. 798. The right to entertain lodgers in a lodging house, and to fix, by contract, with them, the price to be paid for such accommodation, to the number who shall occupy the same room at the same time for sleeping purposes, is a liberty and also a property right. Any restriction upon or abridgment of this right deprives the citizen of both liberty and property. The attorney general insists that § 16 of the enactment in question, though it infringes the property right of the plaintiff in error, may be upheld as a proper exercise of the police power. In Booth v. People, 186 Ill. 43, 50 L. R. A. 762, 57 N. E. 798, we said (p. 48, 186 Ill., p. 763, 50 L. R. A., and p. 799, 57 N. E.): "The state inherently possesses, and the general assembly may lawfully exercise, such power of restraint upon private rights as may be found to be necessary and appropriate to promote the health, comfort, safety, and welfare of society. This power is known as the police power of the state. In the exercise of this power the general assembly may, by valid enactments,—i. e., 'due process of law'—prohibit all things hurtful to the comfort, safety, and welfare of society, even though the prohibition invade the right of liberty or property of an individual." "Due process of law" means a general public law, legally enacted, binding upon all members of the community under all circumstances, and not partial or private laws affecting only the rights of private individuals or classes of individuals. An enactment which deprives one class of persons of the right to acquire and enjoy property, or to contract with relation thereto, in the same manner as others under like conditions and circumstances are permitted to acquire and enjoy property or contract with relation to it, is not comprehended within the true meaning of the words "due process of law," and is prohibited by the provisions of § 22 of article 4 of the Constitution of 1870. The penalties of the section under consideration are leveled against one class,—the keepers of lodging houses. The keeper of a lodging house is not, in a legal sense, an inn keeper, a hotel keeper, or a boarding-house keeper. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Smith, 73 Ill. 360, 24 Am. Rep. 258; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 510. Hotel, inn, and boarding-house keepers are given a lien upon the baggage of their guests by paragraph 42 of chapter 82 (Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1896, p. 2581), and keepers of inns or hotels and keepers of boarding houses are by the common law answerable under a different rule of liability for the loss of the effects of their guests (16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 530-532). Our statute in respect of the liability for the safe custody of the property of guests applies only to landlords and keepers of public inns and hotels, and the keepers of the various places of public entertainment may so conduct their business as that they may bear the relation of an inn or hotel keeper to some of their guests, and that of a boarding-house keeper or lodging-house keeper to others; but, nevertheless, lodging-house keepers constitute a class distinguishable from the keepers of other houses of public entertainment, such as hotels, inns, taverns, or boarding houses. This legislation is directed only against lodging-house keepers. Keepers of boarding-houses, inns, hotels, and taverns do not fall within the purview of its prohibition. If the enactment is a valid one, inn or hotel keepers and the keepers of boarding houses may lodge seven or any greater number of guests or patrons in the same room, at the same time, for sleeping purposes, as may suit their convenience, subject only to the consent of their patrons or guests, without incurring the penalties which, under the provisions of this enactment, would be visited upon a lodging-house keeper should he allow more than six persons to occupy the same sleeping apartment at the same time. This is to discriminate against the lodging-house keepers as a class, and to deprive them of liberty and a property right which other persons engaged in business of the same general character and similarly conducted may freely exercise without let or hindrance. As we said in Frerer v. People use of School Fund, 141 Ill. 181, 16 L. R. A. 495, 31 N. E. 397: "If A is denied the right to contract and acquire property in a manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law, and which B, C, and D, are still allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract."

In Millett v. People, 117 Ill. 294, 57 Am. Rep. 809, 7 N. E. 631, an enactment which prohibited the owners and operators of coal mines from making contracts which other owners of property and employers of labor might lawfully make was held unconstitutional, and could not be maintained as a lawful exercise of the police power. The same doctrine was reiterated in Frerer v. People use of School Fund, 141 Ill. 181, 16 L. R. A. 495, 31 N. E. 397. In Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, 40 N. E. 454, an enactment which prohibited contracts for the employment of females to work for more than eight hours in any one day in any factory or workshop where clothing, wearing apparel, or articles of a similar nature were manufactured was held to be partial and discriminatory in character, and void, as contravening constitutional guaranties, for the reason that other manufacturers and their employees, though engaged in other branches of industry, were not forbidden to so contract. In Harding v. People, 160 Ill. 459, 32 L. R. A. 445, 43 N. E. 624, an act which made "that an offense, if committed by a person engaged in one branch of mining, which, if done by persons in another branch of the same business, is lawful, without any reason for distinction between the two, we must regard . . . as unconstitutional. In Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 296, 32 L. R. A. 659, 43 N. E. 1108, we held a statute which made it unlawful for a barber to follow his ordinary pursuit on Sunday, and which did not place the like restriction on any other class of business, deprived persons following that avocation of property, and unjustly discriminated against them, and could not be sustained as a valid enactment under the police power of the state, because of the unequal operation of the law. The doctrine of Chicago v. Netcher, 183 Ill. 104, 48 L. R. A. 261, 55 N. E. 707, is an attempt to deny a property right to a particular class in a community, where all other members of the community are left to enjoy it, is an unwarrantable interference with constitutional rights, whether such denial is contained in a statute or in an ordinance passed under a statute. The principle which may be deduced from the declarations of this court on the subject is that an act which arbitrarily discriminates against one class in the transaction of a business or a lawful occupation, and leaves unaffected by such discriminatory enactment other persons or classes of persons engaged in acquiring property in a manner not distinguishable in character from that in which the class discriminated against is employed, is in contravention of the constitutional guaranties under consideration.

The attorney general concedes that the term "lodging house" and the words "inn," "hotel," or "boarding house" are none of them convertible terms or words, and that a distinction exists between these several institutions and a lodging house; but he insists that the act, though it has no penalties against the inn or hotel keeper or boarding-house keeper, may be legally enforced against the keepers of lodging houses as a sanitary measure, under the police power. Some lodging houses, it is urged, may be, and doubtless are, the recognized abiding places of unclean, diseased, and vermin-infected guests or patrons, who, together with the owners or keepers of the lodging houses, are wholly indifferent to sanitary conditions, rendering such houses sources of contagious and infectious diseases. But it cannot be asserted that all lodging houses are of this character; neither can it be said boarding houses, inns, and hotels are not to be found which shelter the same class of patrons, and whose keepers are likewise indifferent to sanitary conditions. The public health is less endangered by a cleanly and well-conducted lodging house than by a filthy, ill-managed, disease-breeding hotel or boarding house. The lodging of more than six persons in any one room in a cleanly lodging house cannot be condemned, from a sanitary point of view, any more than the lodging of a like number of guests in one room in a hotel or boarding house. If intended as a measure to protect health, the act should have been directed against the evil which threatens to introduce sickness or disease, whether found in a lodging house, boarding house, or hotel, and, as its penalties are not so leveled, it can but be regarded as partial and discriminatory legislation. In Frerer v. People use of School Fund, 141 Ill. 181, 16 L. R. A. 495, 31 N. E. 397, we said (p. 186, 141 Ill., p. 497, 16 L. R. A., and p. 399, 31 N. E.): "The police power is limited to enactments having reference to the comfort, the safety, or the welfare of society, and under guise of it a person cannot be deprived of a constitutional right. It is impossible that, under that power, what is lawful if done by A, if done by B, can be a misdemeanor, the circumstances and conditions being the same."

If the enactment is not referable to the police power, as being for the preservation of the public health, we would feel constrained to declare it unconstitutional because violative § 13 of article 4 of the Constitution of 1870 viz: "No act hereafter passed shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." The title of the amendatory act is, "An Act to Amend an Act Entitled 'An Act to Create and Establish a Board of Health in the State of Illinois,' Approved May 28, 1877, in Force July 1, 1877, by Adding Thereto Four New Sections, to be Numbered Fifteen (15), Sixteen (16), Seventeen (17), and Eighteen (18)." There could be no valid provision in the amendatory act not germane or pertinent to the general subject of the original act, which is the health and lives of the citizens of the state. If the act was passed for the purpose of the purification of elections, it should be declared unconstitutional on the ground that the subject and object of the legislation were not expressed in the title of the act. Moreover, the rights of property will not be permitted to be invaded under the guise of a police regulation for the preservation of health, when such is clearly not the object and purpose of the regulation. We are constrained to declare the section of the enactment in question is in contravention of constitutional guaranties and provisions, and therefore inoperative and void.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause will not be remanded.

NORTON BROTHERS, Appt.,
v.

Emil NADEBOK.

(190 Ill. 595.)

One operating a body maker in a cannery manufactory, having authority to direct the actions of the machine tender, and therefore representing the master in directing the tender to remove a can body which has caught in the machine, does not, by reason of the fact that it is his duty to start the machinery with his own hand, become the fellow servant of the tender in so doing, so as to relieve the master from liability for injuries to the tender caused by his starting the machinery before the tender has withdrawn his hand from within it.

NOTE.—On the question of vice principalship determined with reference to the character of the act which caused the injury, see Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (C. C. App. 7th C.) 64 L. R. A. 33, and extensive note thereto.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. S. Thompson and C. L. Jenks, Jr., for appellant.

Messrs. James M. Sheehan and J. W. Kaste for appellee.

Hand, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case brought by the appellee in the superior court of Cook county against the appellant to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by him while in the employ of the appellant. The declaration consists of three counts. The first alleges that the defendant, which was engaged in the business of manufacturing tin cans, directed plaintiff to take cans from a machine known as a "body maker," which shaped the form of the can, to another machine, for completion; that the body maker was defective, in that cans would sometimes catch or stick therein, making it necessary for plaintiff to insert his hand in the machine and pull out the can so caught, and thus incur the risk of injury, all of which the defendant had knowledge of, and the plaintiff had not; that the defendant gave him no information as to the dangers incident to the use of the machine; that, a can becoming caught, plaintiff was ordered by his superior in charge of the machine, who was not his fellow servant, to take out the "catch;" that he attempted to do so, using due care, etc.; and that the machine descended without warning upon his hand, cutting off the little finger and otherwise injuring the hand. The second count alleges that at the time of the injury one Banning was in charge of the operation of the machine, and had the direction and control of the plaintiff, and was not his fellow servant; that, a can becoming caught in the machine, the plaintiff, pursuant to Banning's direction, and while in the line of his duty, inserted his hand into said machine for the purpose of removing the can which was caught, using due care, etc.; that, while plaintiff's hand was in the machine, Banning then and there negligently set the machine in motion, causing it to descend upon plaintiff's hand and injure the same, etc. The third count avers that, in the operation of the machine, cans frequently caught therein, making it necessary for the operator or his assistant to insert his hand into the machine to loosen or remove the can; that, because of there being sharp blades in the machine, near which the hand would have to be inserted, the duties of the persons so engaged were fraught with unusual danger; that it was the duty of the defendant, upon assigning an inexperienced person to such work, to fully instruct him, etc.; that the defendant wrongfully and neg-ligently employed plaintiff, a minor of seventeen years, upon said work; that the plaintiff was without experience, and incapable, because of his years, of appreciating the danger of such employment; that the defendant failed to instruct him, etc., whereby plaintiff, in attempting to perform his said duties, and to take out a can which had become stuck, using the care and caution commensurate with his knowledge and appreciation of the danger, etc., had his right hand caught, and the finger cut off, etc. The defendant pleaded the general issue, and upon a trial before a jury there was a verdict and judgment for $1,000 in favor of the appellee, which has been affirmed by the appellate court for the first district. 92 Ill. App. 541.

At the close of the evidence for the plaintiff, and again at the close of all the evidence, the defendant made a motion to take the case from the jury, which motion was overruled by the court, and which action of the court is assigned as error. In this court as in the appellate court, appellant seeks a reversal without remanding, and also, as in that court, makes but one point in argument, which, as summarized at the conclusion of its argument, is that Banning, in obeying whose orders appellee was injured, was the fellow servant of appellee, and that, in consequence of such relationship, appellant is not liable to appellee for Banning's negligence.

The appellant was engaged in manufacturing tin cans at its factory located in Maywood, Illinois. One of its employees, by the name of Banning, was engaged in operating a machine known as a "body maker." He had charge thereof, starting and stopping it by means of a lever attached to a friction clutch connected with overhead shafting. He fed into the machine oblong pieces of tin, called "blanks," which were by the machine bent around a "horn," the sides hooked together, and thus formed into cylinders constituting the body of tin cans; hence the name of the machine, "body maker." The horn was at the back part of the machine, and Banning, when engaged in feeding in the blanks, stood or sat in front of the machine. The cylinder-shaped product of the body maker fell from the horn into a chute, and from the chute into a bin. The appellee was engaged in carrying these bodies in a basket to another machine, which soldered the side seams. One of the pieces of tin which Banning had fed into the body maker becoming caught in some way at or near the horn, Banning stopped the machine by means of the lever, and directed the appellee, who was at the rear of the machine, putting bodies into a basket, to take out the "catch," as pieces of tin which chanced to be caught in the machine were called. Thereupon appellee, while the machine was at rest, put his hand into it for the purpose of pulling out the catch; and then Banning, before appellee had withdrawn his hand, pulled the lever and set the machine in motion. Appellee's hand was caught and crushed between the horn and that portion of the machine which came up against it. There was a conflict in the evidence as to whether it was plaintiff's duty to pull out catches, the method of performing such duty, his proper position when at work, whether Banning had any authority over him, and what directions he received when sent to work. Appellee testified that on the morning of the day in which he was hurt he was first engaged in piling tin in another department, the foreman of which was one Magee; that Magee sent him to the body-making department; that there he was told to carry the cans from the body maker, which Banning was operating, to another machine, keep the operator of the other machine going, and to "hustle up;" that he had never worked at the body maker until the day he was injured; that several catches occurred, and Banning at each time of such occurrence told him to take the catch out; that on one of these occasions he said to Banning, "Why can't you take it out?" to which Banning answered, "Take it out. You have got to do what I tell you." A number of witnesses on behalf of appellee testified that they had worked for appellant, and that, in the manufacture of cans such as were being manufactured at the time of the injury, two men were engaged at the machine,—a feeder and a helper; that the duty of the feeder is to feed the tin into the machine, and to run the machine; and that the duty of the helper is to take the cans away, and do whatever the feeder tells him to do.

As a general rule, the question whether servants of the same master are fellow servants is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances of each case. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Middleton, 142 Ill. 550, 32 N. E. 453; Louisville & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Hawthorn, 147 Ill. 220, 35 N. E. 534; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Massey, 152 Ill. 144, 38 N. E. 787; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. House, 172 Ill. 601, 50 N. E. 151; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Swan, 176 Ill. 424, 52 N. E. 916. If, however, the facts are conceded, or there is no dispute with reference thereto, and all reasonable men will agree, from the evidence and the legitimate conclusions to be drawn therefrom, that the relation of fellow servants exists, then the question becomes one of law, and not of fact. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Driscoll, 176 Ill. 330, 52 N. E. 921.

In this case, there being a conflict in the evidence as to whether Banning had authority over the appellee, it is conceded by the appellant that, the appellate court having affirmed the judgment of the superior court, that controverted question of fact has been settled in favor of appellee; and it is admitted that Banning was a superior servant, and had authority from appellant to direct appellee to put his hand into the machine and take out the catch; but it is contended that as to the manual act of starting the machine at the instant when the injury occurred, as Banning had no delegated authority from the common master to order someone else to set the machine in motion instead of himself doing so, but was himself employed to do that act with his own hands, he was not as to that act the superior, but was the fellow servant, of appellee, and that appellant is not liable for the consequences of Banning's negligence in starting the machine while appellee's hand was in the same, as such negligence did not consist in the abuse of his delegated authority. In other words, it is conceded that Banning was the superior servant when he ordered appellee to put his hand into the machine and take out the catch, but, it is said, in the act of immediately starting the machine he was his fellow servant; and it is contended, as it is conceded that Banning was employed to operate said machine, the question as to whether he was the fellow servant of appellee at the immediate time when he started the machine is a question of law. We cannot agree with such contention. When the appellee was ordered by his superior servant to put his hand into the machine and take out the catch, in the absence of any warning or notice he had the right to assume that his superior, who gave the order, would not by his own negligence make the act which he had commanded him to do, and which he was bound to obey, unsafe. In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. May, 108 Ill. 288, we say (p. 298): "The true rule on the subject, as we understand it, is this: The mere fact that one of a number of servants who are in the habit of working together in the same line of employment, for a common master, has power to control and direct the actions of the others with respect to such employment, will not of itself render the master liable for the negligence of the governing servant resulting in an injury to one of the others, without regard to other circumstances. On the other hand, the mere fact that the servant exercising such authority sometimes or generally labors with the others as a common hand will not of itself exonerate the master from liability for the former's negligence in the exercise of his authority over the others. Every case, in this respect, must depend upon its own circumstances." In Pittsburg Bridge Co. v. Walker, 170 Ill. 550, 48 N. E. 915, the plaintiff was injured while engaged, as an employee of the defendant, in moving heavy pieces of iron framework intended to be used in constructing a bridge across the Chicago river. In the process of moving such framework, it was necessary to the safety of the employees that a "tag line" should be attached to the framework, wherewith to steady and control the same while it was being hoisted by a block and tackle. One Farnsworth, who occupied the position of foreman, refused to use such tag line, but undertook to hold and control said framework by hand, whereby the framework swung around and struck the appellee. In discussing one of the defendant's refused instructions, the court says (p. 553, 170 Ill., and p. 916, 48 N. E.): "The argument in support of the principle sought to be announced by the instruction as asked is that, at the immediate time appellee received the injury complained of, Farnsworth was exercising the duties of a common laborer, and at that exact moment was a fellow servant with the appellee; that if appellee was injured, as he contends, because of the negligent failure or inability of Farnsworth to hold and control the swinging framework, the common master is not liable for such act of Farnsworth, whether it resulted from his negligence or lack of strength, for the reason it was the act of a fellow servant. This view is too narrow. . . . If the appellant, through Farnsworth as vice principal, abandoned the use of a tag line,—a confessedly appropriate and safe device,—and adopted an improper and unsafe method of accomplishing such removal, and injury resulted to appellee in consequence thereof, under such circumstances as the master would be liable if Farnsworth had not personally participated in the execution of the plan, no reason is perceived why liability should be avoided upon the ground Farnsworth personally assisted in endeavoring to perform the work. In so assisting, Farnsworth voluntarily assumed temporarily to labor as a common workman; but he was not any the less the representative of the appellant company, nor his position any the less one of superiority." In Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. v. Skola, 183 Ill. 454, 56 N. E. 171, the foreman ordered a car repairer to work under a car on a repair track, and then, as motoneer, ran other cars onto such repair track, and thereby injured said car repairer. On page 457, 183 Ill., and page 172, 56 N. E., it is said: "The question as to what cars should be brought from the main track in and upon this cleaning, inspecting, and repairing track, and when such cars should be so brought in, and where cars so coming in should be placed thereon, was to be determined by McCrumb in the exercise of the duties devolving upon him in his capacity as vice principal. Whether if, after he had directed the deceased to engage in work beneath a car standing on the cleaning, inspecting, and repairing track, ordinary care and due regard for the safety of the deceased required that the foreman, before putting into execution his determination to move other cars upon the same track, should have in some way notified or warned the deceased of what he, as foreman, had determined and was about to do, was a question of fact for the jury. If it was negligence to cause cars to be put in motion on the track where other cars stood under which workmen were engaged in their duties, without first warning the workmen who would be endangered by such course, then the negligence was that of the master, acting through the foreman as the representative of the master." In Taylor v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 121 Ind. 124, 6 L. R. A. 584, 22 N. E. 876, while the appellant, a machinist, was engaged in the work of removing the key of the "equalizer" under the master mechanics' direction, the equalizer was negligently pulled out of its place by the master mechanic, and it fell upon the appellant and very severely injured him. The trial court took the case from the jury on the ground the master mechanic and the appellant were fellow servants. In reversing the case the court says: "It is important to bear in mind that the appellant was performing a special duty enjoined upon him by a superior whom it was his duty to obey. Although the work was within the general scope of his service, nevertheless he was performing it under a special order. It was therefore a wrong on the part of the agent having the right to order him to do the specific work to increase the peril of the service by his own negligence. The employee, acting under the specific order, had a right to assume, in the absence of warning or notice, that his superior who gave the order would not by his own negligence make the work unsafe."

Had the superintendent of the factory ordered the appellee to remove the catch, and then immediately ordered Banning to start the machine, without giving appellee notice and an opportunity to withdraw his hand, there would be no question as to the liability of appellant, and we are unable to see how the fact that Banning had no authority to order any other person to start the machine, but was expressly employed so to do himself, can relieve appellant from liability. The giving of the order to appellee to remove the catch and the act of starting the machine occurred so closely together that the consequences resulting therefrom cannot be separated, and the master is liable therefor. We think the question whether appellee and Banning were fellow servants at the time the injury occurred, under the circumstances of this case, was a question of fact for the jury, and that the court did not err in declining to direct a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will therefore be affirmed.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, App't.,
v.

Howard FERGUSON.

(.....Ind.....)

Mental anguish resulting from failure to promptly deliver a telegram will not support an action against the telegraph company for such failure.

(Jordan J., dissents.)

(May 28, 1901.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for neglect to promptly deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chambers, Pickens, & Moores and Loudon & Loudon for appellant.

Messrs. Henley & Wilson for appellee.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal has been transferred here by the appellate court, under Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 1362 (Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 6586), with the recommendation that the case of Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583, 24 N. E. 163, be overruled. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Ferguson (Ind. App.) 59 N. E. 416. Appellee brought this action to recover damages for appellant's negligent failure to deliver a telegram. The message read:

To Howard Ferguson, Bushrod, Ind.:

Grandma is dead. Will be buried Thursday, two o'clock. Come.

Fred Ferguson.

By the failure to deliver, appellee received neither pecuniary nor bodily injury, but suffered mental anguish consequent upon his being deprived of the opportunity of attending his grandmother's funeral. The assignment that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint and in denying appellant a new trial presents the question whether the negligent causing of mental anguish alone is an actionable wrong. An affirmative answer was given in the Reese Case, decided in 1890, and the question has not been raised in this court since then. The Reese Case is hereby overruled, for the following reasons:

1. Though courts should and do extend the application of the rules of the common law to the new conditions of advancing civilization, they may not rightfully create a new principle unknown to the common law, nor abrogate a known one. If new conditions cannot properly be met by the application of existing laws, the supplying of needful new laws is the province of the legislative, not the judicial, department. The mental-anguish law, so called, was first announced in So Relle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 55 Tex. 308, 40 Am. Rep. 805, decided in 1881. Telegraphy was then a comparatively new element in society, but mental anguish antedated the beginnings of the common law. In determining the limits within which mental anguish was cognizable in the courts, the common law permitted that state of mind to be considered as an element in admeasuring damages in but two classes of cases, broadly speaking. In one, the negligent act was the proximate cause of a physical hurt, and the mental anguish for which compensation was allowed was the proximate result of the physical hurt, not of the negligent act. For the agonies of mind the plaintiff suffered while the train bore down upon him with his foot caught in the frog, not one cent; but damages were allowable only for the mental anguish resulting from the fact that he must go through life a cripple. The using of cases of this class in support of the mental-anguish doctrine is not an extension of the application of the rules of the common law to new conditions, but is a distortion of the rules themselves, resulting from the failure to distinguish between the mental anguish that is attributable directly to the negligent act and the mental anguish that is the direct result of the physical hurt produced by the negligent act. In the other class of cases, of which malicious prosecution, seduction, and libel are illustrative, the wrongful act was affirmative; was one of commission, not merely of omission; was the product of intent or malice, express or implied. The wrongful act was the proximate cause of the legal hurt (a hurt that the law recognizes), for which damages were recoverable irrespective of mental anguish; and the damages allowable for mental anguish were not merely compensation for the mental condition produced by the legal hurt, but were also punishment for the wilful wrong. This class of cases is further removed from the mental-anguish doctrine than the first. Not only is there the distinction that exists between the first class of cases and the mental-anguish doctrine, namely, that in the one the mental anguish hangs upon the hurt produced by the negligent act, while in the other the mental anguish hangs directly upon the negligent act, but there is also the distinction that wilfulness or malice is found in the second class of cases, while the mental-anguish doctrine is based on pure negligence. One who unintentionally fails to perform a duty should pay compensatory damages only. One who maliciously infringes another's legal rights should pay both compensatory and punitive damages. To apply the rules relating to punitive damages for wilful wrongs to a case of unintentional default is certainly not a mere extension of the application of the rules of common law to new conditions. These classes of cases in which mental anguish is cognizable as an incident to causes of action complete without it at least negatively indicate the common-law rule that mental anguish, as the proximate and sole result of a negligent act, does not constitute a cause of action. And the rule follows affirmatively from the principle that damages may not be remote nor conjectural nor speculative. Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341, 5 English Ruling Cases, 502, 525. The supreme court of Florida, in International Ocean Teleg. Co. v. Saunders, 32 Fla. 434, 21 L. R. A. 810, 14 So. 148, in reviewing the Texas decision in So Relle v. Western U. Teleg. Co., said: "The court in that case asserts that it is the settled rule of law in that state that injury to the feelings caused by the wilful neglect or fault of another constitutes such actual damages, for which a recovery may be had, and cites as authority for such assertion the cases of Hays v. Houston & G. N. R. Co., 46 Tex. 279, and Houston & G. N. R. Co. v. Randall, 50 Tex. 261. In neither of these cases is the doctrine either settled or asserted that injury to the feelings or mental suffering alone can be made the subject of a suit for compensative damages. The Case of Hays, 46 Tex. 279, was against a railroad company for damages for wrongfully and forcibly ejecting the plaintiff from its passenger train in the presence of his wife and family, in which it was claimed that the ejection was done in a rude and insulting manner and by personal violence, resulting in injury to plaintiff's clothing and bruises to his person. Exemplary or punitive damages were claimed, and the jury were instructed to estimate the actual damages by the 'injuries sustained by the plaintiff in his person, his estate, and his feelings,' and it was held that by this charge the subject of the amount of actual damages was fairly placed before the jury. But nowhere is it asserted that mental suffering alone can be made an independent basis for admeasuring damages. The case, like many others founded on tort that might be cited, simply holds that the mental suffering or injured feelings may be taken into consideration as an element of damage when coupled with or accompanied by substantive injury to the person or estate, upon the ground, as stated in the authorities, that in such cases the mental suffering growing out of and produced by the physical injury is so interwoven with the latter that it is impossible to consider the one without contemplating the other. . . . The same may be said of the Case of Randall, 50 Tex. 261. In that case the plaintiff, a brakeman on the defendant's train, sued the company for damages for its negligence in having an open ditch across its tracks, into which he fell while performing the duty of coupling two of defendant's cars, and whereby his arm was run over and crushed by the cars, necessitating its amputation. In that case, too, the doctrine is sanctioned that an element of the verdict may be compensation for the mental and physical suffering caused by the injury. But nowhere is the doctrine sanctioned that mental suffering alone can sustain an action. For the support of its ruling in the So Relle Case the Texas court next quotes at length the dictum of the authors of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, which dictum—as ordinarily incorporated in their work—was entirely without the support of any adjudged case. The seduction case of Phillips v. Hoyle, 4 Gray, 568, is next invoked to the support of the Texas court, where injury to the feelings of the parent in consequence of the daughter's seduction was held to be an element of damages. The fact seems to have been overlooked, in citing this case to its support, that in cases of seduction, and other torts independent of contract, injured feelings are given consideration, not so much as a criterion for the admeasurement of compensation, but as a standard by which to estimate the enormity of the outrage wilfully committed, and as a guide whether the damage to be allowed as punishment shall be higher or lower. The next and last authority cited to the support of the So Relle Case is the case of Roberts v. Graham, 6 Wall. 578, 18 L. ed. 791, but we fail to find in it any reference whatever to the subject of damages for injured feelings or mental suffering; the whole case being confined to a discussion of the question of the sufficiency of the allegations of a declaration or complaint for general damages as a predicate for the introduction of proof of special damage. The doctrine of the So Relle Case has for its support, then, in reality, only the unsupported dictum of Shearman & Redfield in their work on Negligence. In the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 563, 46 Am. Rep. 278, decided in 1883, the So Relle Case was expressly overruled in so far as it held that an action for mental suffering alone could be maintained. In Stuart v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 66 Tex. 580, 59 Am. Rep. 623, 18 S. W. 351, decided in 1886, the Levy Case, 59 Tex. 563, 46 Am. Rep. 278, is practically overruled, and the court, without the support of any additional authorities, returns to the doctrine of the So Relle Case. The ruling in Stuart v. Western U. Teleg. Co. has been adhered to in that state ever since, encumbered, however, with finely-drawn distinctions that seem to keep an even pace with the rapid increase of litigation that the enunciation of such a doctrine would naturally engender." An extended examination of the authorities upholding the mental-anguish rule has disclosed but two claims that the doctrine has any root in the common law. One is the old maxim that for every wrong there should be a remedy. But of an antiquity probably as great, at least extending back to the law-Latin days, are the phrases injuria sine damno and damnum absque injuria. The fathers of the common law declared that there were infractions of legal rights that produced no loss or injury the courts could deal with, and also that there were losses or injuries that the courts would recognize except for the fact that no legal right had been infringed. In saying that for every wrong there should be a remedy, by "wrong" they meant a violation of the municipal law, the law of civil conduct, not a transgression of the Divine law, as such, nor a breach of etiquette; and by "remedy" (limiting it in this case to a remedy by the way of damages) they intended damages that courts, dealing practically with the practical affairs of life, can find to be certain and measurable from evidence, the source of which is open to both parties, and the nature not transcendental. The common law, so far from furnishing the formula for transmitting a psychical condition into gold, classes the negligent act that causes only mental anguish as an instance of injuria sine damno. The other claim that the mental-anguish doctrine is an outgrowth of the common law is the relation of telegraph companies to the public. True, that relation requires telegraph companies to serve all the public impartially, and authorizes the public to control, to a degree, the terms of the contract for the transmission of messages. But the same relation exists between the public and the railroad companies, public water or gas companies, and the like; and when the mental-anguish authorities join all others in the realms of English jurisprudence in declaring that merely negligent acts by these latter companies, producing mental anguish alone, are not actionable at common law, they plainly prove that the mental-anguish doctrine is not a native sprout, but a foreign graft.

2. There is no open or practicable means by which the damages occasioned by a negligent act that causes only mental anguish can be assessed. On account of mere difficulties, courts do not and should not falter in finding remedies; but it is not a question of difficulties, purely, when it is proposed to violate the natural principles of justice and fair play. The parties to a lawsuit should have an even chance. The damage for which the plaintiff seeks compensation should be shown by evidence that the defendant may test, impeach, refute. When the plaintiff asks to recover for physical injuries, open or hidden, the court may require him, as a condition of prosecuting his case, to submit his person to an examination by medical experts, who may be called as witnesses by the defendant. South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 60 N. E. 271. The determination of the nature and extent of the physical hurt is not dependent upon the eloquence of the plaintiff as a witness, but upon the eloquence of the facts established by the evidence on both sides, which may not have included the verbal testimony of the plaintiff at all. Now, the mental anguish for which damages are allowable is incident to and dependent upon the nature and extent of the physical injury. And, although there can be no absolute standard for measuring mental anguish in terms of money, nor for measuring physical injuries, yet it is apparent that the differences between the physical injuries in two cases, established by evidence open to both sides, furnished a means of testing in some degree the existence and extent of the mental anguish of the respective plaintiffs outside of their mere assertions. The difference between the mental anguish caused by the presence of a scar on a man's body and that produced by the presence of the same kind of a scar upon a woman's face would hardly be decided in favor of the man, although he alone of the two possessed the vocabulary necessary for a vivid description of the alleged tortures of mind. Even in the case of libel, malicious prosecution, and the like, in which punitive damages may be added to compensatory, the mental anguish of which cognizance is taken is measurable by the enormity of the wilful offense, the nature and extent of which are established by evidence open to both sides. But the mental-anguish doctrine awards damages for a state of mind that is not at all dependent upon or measurable by a cause of action existing outside the mental contemplation of the plaintiff, and provable by evidence open to both parties. If psychometry could determine the difference in the plaintiff's consciousness before and after the defendant's negligent act, it would take something still more occult to measure how much of the total mental disturbance was attributable to the death of the relative, and how much to being prevented from attending the funeral.

3. Manifestly, the defendant is not to pay for the mental anguish caused by the death of the relative. The alleged actionable wrong is in depriving the plaintiff of the opportunity of attending the funeral. But would the plaintiff have accepted the opportunity if seasonably offered? If the defendant is to be mulcted for mere delay, even though the plaintiff would not have gone to the funeral in any event, the damages would be wholly punitive. There would be no loss to compensate. And so in this case (and probably the same thing has been true in all) the plaintiff was asked the following questions:

Q. Suppose the telegram had been delivered to you on the evening of July 13, 1898; could you have reached her funeral by two o'clock on the 14th?

A. I could.

Q. I will ask you whether or not you would have done so?

A. I would, sir; I would.

The plaintiff says he would have gone. But would he? The jury found so, as a fact, wholly from the plaintiff's present opinion on a past condition of things that never existed, but is now summoned before the mind by conjecture. Thus the mental-anguish doctrine not only departs from principle in regard to measuring compensatory damages, but also warps the rules of evidence, which forbid a witness to testify what he would or would not have done in a stated contingency. Weed v. Martin, 39 Ala. 587, 8 So. 132: Would you have put the credit on the note if the money had not been paid? Smith v. Western U. Tele. Co. 83 Ky. 104 (special interrogatory to the jury): If the message had been received by plaintiff, would you have ordered his stock to be sold? Allen v. Stout, 51 N. Y. 668: If you had been permitted to sell those arms, in what condition would it have placed you? Kansas Gulf Short Line R. Co. v. Scott, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 20 S. W. 725: How many trips would you probably have made per year, had the railroad not revoked your pass? Commercial Bank v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 87 Wis. 297, 58 N. W. 391: Would you have settled the loss if you had known that the books of the insured were altered? On the answers to the questions put to the appellee in this case, how could perjury be predicated?

4. As a corollary of the preceding proposition, it follows that it is contrary to public policy (corruptive of public morals) for the courts to tie the hands of a defendant, and give the freest hand in collecting compensatory damages to the plaintiff who is most moving in depicting an alleged psychological condition, and readiest to declare what he would have done under circumstances that never occurred.

5. Denial of equal justice, wrongful discrimination between persons in similar circumstances, is at least as vicious in judgment as in statutory law. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 373, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064. To be a law of equal justice and no discrimination, the mental-anguish doctrine should assert, as a broad general principle, that damages are recoverable for mental distress alone, from every person whose negligent act causes that condition. In Western U. Tele. Co. v. Hamilton, 50 Ind. 181, this court suggested: "Suppose the despatch had been an invitation to a marriage, to a family reunion, or with reference to any other matter where special damages could not be shown; what substantial remedy can the party have, unless it be the recovery of the [statutory] penalty?" And the supreme court of Minnesota, in Francis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406, 59 N. W. 1078, inquired: "Upon what legal principle can a court refuse to allow them for the breach of any other contract? The breach of any contract—even the failure of a debtor to pay his debt at maturity—may result in more or less mental anxiety or suffering to the party to whom the obligation is due. Why not allow damage for the mental suffering or disappointment of passengers caused by the delay of trains through the negligence of the carrier? The object of the journeys of travelers is often not pecuniary, but to visit sick relatives or attend the funeral of deceased ones, which are matters affecting the feelings as much and as exclusively as a telegram. If the train is delayed through the negligence of the carrier, so that the passenger does not reach his destination in time to accomplish his desired object, why is he not entitled to damages for his disappointment and mental suffering, as much as the sender or addressee of a delayed telegram?" But it is useless to undertake to give the instances in which the rule is not the rule; for it is not the rule against any one except telegraph companies, and not against them uniformly. The argument that the gravity and urgency of messages relating to death, and the like, should require the telegraph companies to pay mental-anguish damages for delay or failure in transmission, should apply to all telegrams of that character. The gravity of the matter is disclosed by the announcement of the sickness or death and the summons to come. The urgency is apparent from the selection of the telegraph as the means of communication. But, unless the message shows on its face that the addressee is a relative, it is held that the message, equally grave and urgent, fails to give notice that any mental suffering will result from the company's default. The Horatian heir who has been itching for the ancestral estates may recover on the strength of this mourning raiment, while a David who misses the last look upon the face of his Jonathan gets nothing for his bleeding heart.

6. The difficulties of navigation without chart or compass are understandable without experiment, but the experience of the courts that uphold the mental-anguish doctrine probably outrun any mere a priori conjecture as to possibilities. A brother-in-law is not a relative of whose mental anguish a telegraph company is bound to take notice, without special information on the subject in advance. Cashion v. Western U. Tele. Co. 123 N. C. 267, 31 S. E. 493; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Coffin, 88 Tex. 94, 30 S. W. 896. Failure to deliver a message reading, "Your stepfather died this morning," will support an action. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Nations, 82 Tex. 539, 18 S. W. 709. Negligence that results in nothing but mental anguish is not an actionable wrong (Williams v. Yoe, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 281, 46 S. W. 659), unless the defendant be a telegraph company and the circumstances favorable. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Smith (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 659. There seem to be vital distinctions between "mental anguish," "mental suffering," and "mental anxiety." Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Trott, 86 Tex. 412, 25 S. W. 419; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Edmondson, 91 Tex. 206, 42 S. W. 549. Failure to deliver a telegram intended to relieve mental anguish is not actionable. Akard v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 44 S. W. 538. Failure to deliver a telegram intended to relieve mental anguish is actionable. Womack v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 417; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Womack, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 607, 29 S. W. 932. A telegram reading: "Come on first train. Bring Ferdinand. His father is very low,"—does not give notice that negligence will cause the addressee mental anguish. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 76 Tex. 217, 13 S. W. 70. A telegram reading: "Grace is very low. Can you come and bring Maud?"—does give notice that negligence in transmission will cause the addressee mental anguish. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Linn, 87 Tex. 7, 26 S. W. 490. A telegram reading: "Willie died yesterday evening. Will be buried at Marshall Sunday evening,"—does not give notice that negligence in transmission will cause the addressee mental anguish. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Brown, 71 Tex. 723, 2 L. R. A. 766, 10 S. W. 323. A telegram reading: "Billie is very low. Come at once,"—does give notice that negligence in transmission will cause the addressee mental anguish. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Moore, 76 Tex. 66, 12 S. W. 949. The supreme court of Minnesota expressed the opinion that the "Texas doctrine" has opened a probable Pandora box, and the Ohio supreme court states the view that "the wisdom of the doctrine [denying recovery for mental anguish alone] is well illustrated by the experiences of the courts that have departed from it." Francis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 68 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406, 59 N. W. 1078; Morton v. Western U. Tele. Co. 53 Ohio St. 431, 32 L. R. A. 735, 41 N. E. 689.

7. Not to tempt the seas of uncertainty, but to travel super antiquas vias, is the course that we believe is prescribed by sound reason and the overwhelming weight of authority. The following telegraph cases are directly in point: Peay v. Western U. Tele. Co. 64 Ark. 538, 39 L. R. A. 463, 43 S. W. 965; Russell v. Western U. Tele. Co. 3 Dak. 315, 19 N. W. 408; International Ocean Tele. Co. v. Saunders, 32 Fla. 434, 21 L. R. A. 810, 14 So. 148; Chapman v. Western U. Tele. Co. 88 Ga. 763, 17 L. R. A. 430, 15 S. E. 901; Giddens v. Western U. Tele. Co. 111 Ga. 824, 35 S. E. 638; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Haltom, 71 Ill. App. 63; West v. Western U. Tele. Co. 39 Kan. 93, 17 Pac. 807; Francis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406, 59 N. W. 1078; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748, 13 L. R. A. 859, 9 So. 823; Connell v. Western U. Tele. Co. 116 Mo. 34, 20 L. R. A. 172, 22 S. W. 345; *Neuman v. Jordan, J., dissenting (Filed June 28, 1901):

I cannot concur in the majority opinion in this case, and will endeavor to briefly assign the reasons which constrain me to dissent. The real question presented in this appeal is: Are damages which are caused solely by mental anguish, suffered by reason of the neglect of a telegraph company to transmit a message to the addressee, recoverable in an action by the latter against such company for its neglect? In my opinion, this question should be answered in the affirmative. A negative answer by this court necessarily results in disturbing what has been considered and adhered to as the settled law in this state for a period of over twelve years. The rule declared and enforced in Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583, 24 N. E. 163 (which was decided in 1889), in my judgment is a salutary one. It is true that the rule in question has been denied by the higher courts of several of our sister states, while, upon the other hand, it has been repeatedly affirmed by others. The following cases may be said to answer the question propounded in this appeal in the affirmative: So Relle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 55 Tex. 308, 40 Am. Rep. 805; Stuart v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 66 Tex. 580, 59 Am. Rep. 623, 18 S. W. 351; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wilson, 69 Tex. 739, 7 S. W. 653; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Broesche, 72 Tex. 654, 10 S. W. 734; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Simpson, 73 Tex. 423, 11 S. W. 385; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 75 Tex. 531, 6 L. R. A. 844, 12 S. W. 857; Womack v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 417; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Carter, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 624, 21 S. W. 688; Wadsworth v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695, 8 S. W. 574; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Robinson, 97 Tenn. 638, 34 L. R. A. 431, 37 S. W. 545; Newport News & M. Valley R. Co. v. Griffin, 92 Tenn. 694, 22 S. W. 737; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510, 7 So. 419; Thompson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 106 N. C. 549, 11 S. E. 269, 107 N. C. 449, 12 S. E. 427; Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L. R. A. 669, 11 S. E. 1044; Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265, 13 S. W. 880; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Stephens, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 129, 21 S. W. 148; Logan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 84 Ill. 468; Mentzer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L. R. A. 72, 62 N. W. 1. The following text writers also assert and maintain that such damages may be recovered: Shearm. & Redf. Nez. p. 692, § 605; Thompson, Electricity, § 379; 3 Sutherland, Damages, §§ 975-980, inclusive; Sedgw. Damages, § 894. Prior to the decision of the Reese Case, the question here involved was an open one in this jurisdiction, and I am not convinced that the court, for the reasons expressed in the majority opinion, should at this late date depart from the doctrine asserted and enforced in that case. Nothing is to be gained by courts of last resort in overruling their decisions, especially when the same have stood as the settled law for a long period of time, unless it is evident that they are radically wrong or operate unjustly. The Reese Case, 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583, 24 N. E. 163, as we have shown, is well supported by the decisions of other courts and by eminent text writers, and a settled rule of law of this state should not be abrogated simply because there may be a conflict in the authorities. Not only does the majority opinion overrule the case in question, but it necessarily results in overthrowing the decision in Kenihan v. Wright, 125 Ind. 536, 9 L. R. A. 514, 25 N. E. 822. The defendants in the latter case were undertakers and funeral directors, who had been employed by the plaintiffs to safely keep in a secure vault the body of their dead daughter. They violated their contract with the plaintiffs by allowing the body to be buried at some place unknown to the parents, which place the defendants refused to disclose. The trial court in that case charged the jury that in the assessment of damages they might take into consideration the mental anguish which the parents had suffered on account of the matters set out in their complaint. The charge on appeal was sustained, the court holding that "where a person contracts, upon a sufficient consideration, to do a particular thing, the failure to do which may result in anguish and distress of mind on the part of the other contracting party, he is presumed to have contracted with reference to the payment of damages of that character in the event such damages accrue by reason of the breach of the contract on his part." As a result of the holding in the case at bar, it would follow that where a devoted husband or father employed an undertaker to prepare the body of his deceased wife or daughter, as the case might be, for interment, and the latter, instead of carrying out his contract, should deliver the body over to a medical college, where it was dissected, there could be no recovery by the husband or father for the great mental anguish and pain which he necessarily would suffer by reason of the brutal conduct of the undertaker in disposing, as he did, of the remains of the beloved wife or daughter. Again, upon another view of the question, a railroad train is wrecked upon which the husband of a devoted and loving wife is a passenger, and many of the passengers are killed and maimed, which is disclosed to the wife through the public press. Her husband, however, escapes from the wreck uninjured, and immediately telegraphs her that he is safe, and for her not to be disturbed in respect to his safety. The telegraph company neglects to transmit the message to the wife, although it is aware of its importance. The wife knows that her husband is a passenger on the ill-fated train, the wreck of which she has been apprised, and fears that he has been killed or maimed, and of course suffers great anguish of mind, and continues to suffer the same until she learns of her husband's safety, all of which is due to the neglect of the telegraph company in not delivering to her the message sent by the husband. Under the harsh rule asserted in this case, she could not recover for the anguish of mind which she suffered and endured, which would be more severe to her, perhaps, under the circumstances, than any physical injury imaginable.

It is said that the common law is not sufficiently elastic to cover such cases, but the fault is not so much in the inelasticity of the law as it is in the narrow manner in which it is construed and judicially applied to a given state of facts. The judges who construed the common law, when at a loss for a precedent, declared one, which becomes controlling in the future. The common law certainly can be made to reasonably adapt itself in the furtherance of justice to new conditions which have arisen in this progressive age. It was well said by Judge Deemer in Mentzer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L. R. A. 72, 62 N. W. 1: "One of the crowning glories of the common law has been its elasticity, and its adaptability to new conditions and new states of fact. It has grown with civilization, and kept pace with the march of events, so that it is as virile to-day, in our advanced state of civilization, as it was when the race was emerging from the dark ages of the past. Should it ever fail to be adjustable to the new conditions which age and experience bring, then its usefulness is over, and a new social compact must be entered into."

It is argued that damages for mental distress cannot be recovered at common law for a mere breach of contract. This assertion may be said to be true as a general rule, but, like all such rules, it is, in the administration of justice, subject to reasonable exceptions. In fact, there is ingrafted upon the rule at least one well-recognized exception, namely, a man who enters into a marriage contract is presumed to know or contemplate that he is dealing with the affections and feelings of the woman whom he has agreed to marry, and, if he violates his contract, that she will be subject to humiliation, mortification, and mental anguish. In an action by her against him, the law awards, among other things, damages for her wronged feelings. In cases like the one at bar, courts should regard the subject-matter of the contract. Where the neglected message relates solely to matters of property, the common law affords adequate compensation. What sound reason then can be said to exist for construing the law so as to make it deny the liability of a telegraph company when its negligence has resulted in inflicting a great mental shock or mental suffering which is frequently more painful under the circumstances, than a physical injury possibly could be. It is contended that in actions arising ex delicto, accompanied by physical injury, damages for the wounded or injured feelings may be awarded, but compensation for injury to the feelings is frequently allowed in actions where the matter complained of is unaccompanied by any physical injury. For instance, a passenger lawfully on a train is by the railroad company's agent wrongfully ejected from the car, or rather compelled by the imperative orders or demands of the conductor in charge of the train to leave the car. In an action by the passenger against the railroad company, his humiliation or injured feelings, under the circumstances, may be taken into consideration by the jury in the assessment of damages, although he was not touched or in any manner sustained a physical injury. Such is also the rule in actions for slander or libel. Likewise in malicious prosecutions. Fisher v. Hamilton, 49 Ind. 341. Also in actions for false imprisonment. Stewart v. Maddox, 63 Ind. 51. The removal of the body of a deceased child from the lot where it was lawfully buried to a charity lot is held to entitle the parent of the child to recover against the party removing the body for injury to such parent's feelings. Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 281, 96 Am. Dec. 759. A widow may recover for mental anguish and nervous shock against a person who unlawfully mutilates the body of her dead husband. Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L. R. A. 85, 50 N. W. 238. See also Sutherland, Damages, § 979. Damages are also allowed to a father for his wounded feelings in an action by him against one for the seduction of his daughter.

From the above cases it is manifest that damages in actions of tort are frequently allowed for mental suffering or wounded feelings although there is no physical injury. In cases where there is some direct and proximate connection between the wrongful act and the injury to the feelings, whether the action is connected with a contract or arises out of tort, the allowance of damages for injured feelings and anguish of mind is certainly justifiable. But it is said that, in cases like the one at bar, the damages demanded are frequently too shadowy and speculative to be properly measured. If this is true, it is equally so in cases of tort. While if true it might afford reasons for requiring courts to closely scrutinize and review the verdicts of juries returned in such cases, but it represents no reason for an entire abrogation of the rule for which I contend. In conclusion, I may say that I cannot sanction a rule of the law which affirms that a telegraph company, where it neglects to deliver a message to the husband that his wife is dying, or to a father that his son is dead and will be buried at a designated time, is not responsible except for mere nominal damages. Such an interpretation of the law ought not to be sustained. It will certainly result in telegraph companies neglecting their duties in sending messages of such character as, under the decision in this case, they can virtually escape with impunity. Without further extending this opinion by the citation of authorities and the assignment of other reasons in support of the rule in question, I conclude that the Reese and Remihan Cases, to which I have referred ought not to be overruled, and that the judgment below should be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Iowa

v.

Thomas KING, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A statute providing for the punishment of one who, being confined in the penitentiary, breaks such prison and escapes therefrom, does not apply to an escape from a state quarry 2 miles from the prison, to which the prisoner has been taken to work.
2. Breaking a prison is not effected by a prisoner's concealing himself in a crevice in a stone quarry to which he has been taken to work, until the guards withdraw, and then walking forth without impediment, although to aid the concealment a cover is placed over the crevice, which is removed when the escape is effected.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Jones County convicting him of breaking and escaping from the penitentiary at Anamosa. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. E. Rhinehart, for appellant:

The quarry is not a part of the penitentiary within the meaning of § 4897, for the reason that the necessary force to effect a breaking must be applied on the penitentiary proper.

It is not a crime to climb over the wall of a prison, but only an escape.

Res v. Haswell, Russ. & R. C. C. 458.

There must be actual breaking, and not such as is implied by construction of law.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. § 4, p. 303.

Statutes in derogation of the common law are strictly construed. An escape has never been considered at common law to be a felony.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 296.

Mr. Charles A. Van Vleck, for appellee:

The quarry being a part of the prison property belonging to the state, a breaking and escape therefrom is a breaking such prison and escape.

1 Russell, Crimes, 6th ed. p. 899.

Breach of prison is an unlawful escape out of prison.

Bouvier, Law Dict.; Wharton, Crim. Law, 750.

Escape from a house of correction by tying two ladders together, and placing them against the wall of the yard, was a prison breach.

Res v. Haswell, Russ. & R. C. C. 458; Randall v. State, 53 N. J. L. 490, 22 Atl. 46.

NOTE.—On the necessity of the actual breaking of an inclosure to constitute a prison breach the above case seems to be a novel one. In this particular the case suggests that of State v. Crawford (N. D.) 46 L. R. A. 312, where the question was as to what breaking and entering would constitute burglary.

Mr. Charles W. Mullan, Attorney General, also for appellee.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, while a prisoner in the penitentiary at Anamosa for a period less than life, was taken, with about eighty other convicts, to work in the stone quarries, situated about 2 miles northwest of the prison proper, owned and operated by the state under the supervision of the warden. When returning from dinner, he and another dropped into a natural crevice in the rock, the opening to which was thereupon covered by one of their companions. They were soon missed by the guards, and, as the quarry was watched for some time, must have remained there for nearly two days, and then removed the covering and departed. That the accused escaped from custody is conceded, but it is insisted that there was no breaking. The statute under which the indictment was returned reads: "If any person confined in a penitentiary for any less period than for life breaks such prison and escapes therefrom, he shall be imprisoned in such penitentiary for a term not exceeding five years, to commence from and after the expiration of the original term of his imprisonment." Code, § 4897. It will be observed that the offense described is not a breaking and escape from prison generally. The words "such prison" inevitably refer back to "penitentiary," and it is the breaking and escape from that prison only which is denounced by this statute. If this were not true, there would have been no occasion for the enactment of the section following, relating to jail breaking. The argument of the state, then, in so far as based on the various definitions of "prison," is not pertinent to the case. As said, these stone quarries are about 2 miles from the penitentiary, and nothing in this record or the statutes indicates that they are included therein as a part of it. Indeed, § 5707 of the Code, in authorizing the warden to work convicts therein, describes them as the state stone quarries near the penitentiary. Whether they might have been included need not be considered. It is enough that the statute treats them as near to, but not a part of, the penitentiary, and there is no evidence to the contrary. But, if the quarries were to be regarded as a part of the particular prison described, it does not follow that there was a breaking. These men merely concealed themselves from the guard until the latter withdrew, and then walked forth from the quarries without any impediment whatever. The acts constituting the breaking of a prison are not different from those essential to be shown in establishing burglary or other criminal breaking, save, possibly, in the direction from which applied. Randall v. State, 53 N. J. L. 488, 22 Atl. 46. Something must be done tending to open a way through confining walls or other obstructions to free entrance or exit. By getting in or out of the crevice, or causing the covering to be placed, or in removing it, the defendant neither broke away from nor through any obstruction whatever to his confinement in the prison. He merely eluded temporarily the personal custody of the guards, and when he stepped from the hole in the rock it was at precisely the same place he had left when entering, with no physical obstacle to his freedom removed, save in the departure of the guards. His escape was accomplished by stratagem, not by force. It is the same as though he had concealed himself under cover in his cell, or one of the corridors, and the attendant, not observing him, had left the door open, and he had walked out. This would be an escape, but no one would contend that mere hiding constituted a breaking. It has long been settled that there must be some application of force,—an actual breaking, not merely constructive,—to constitute a prison breach. See Rea v. Haswell, Russ. & R. C. C. 458; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 303; Randall v. State, 53 N. J. L. 488, 22 Atl. 46. Hiding within was not breaking out. Eluding the guards by stratagem was not an interference by force with the natural or artificial prison barriers to escape. As there was no breaking within the meaning of the law, the jury should have been directed to return a verdict for the defendant.

Reversed.

Jennie IVES, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

William WELDEN.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A merchant who fills a jug with gasoline for a customer without complying with the statute providing that no gasoline shall be sold until the package containing it has been marked "gasoline" is liable for injuries to a member of the customer's family by its explosion when she attempts to use it believing it to be kerosene.
2. A child injured by explosion of gasoline which she attempts to use believing it to be kerosene is not, in an action to hold the merchant who sold it liable for the injury, affected by the negligence of her father, who, with knowledge of its character, permits her to use it, or fails to warn her of the danger.

(October 5, 1901.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Hardin County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. L. Huff and Wesley Martin, for appellant:

Contributory negligence of the father is no bar to a recovery by the plaintiff.

Wymore v. Mahaska County, 78 Iowa, 306, 6 L. R. A. 545, 43 S. W. 264; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 29 L. ed. 652, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; Chicago G. W. R. Co. v. Kowalski, 34 C. C. A. 1, 92 Fed. 310; Black, Law & Pr. in Accident Cases, ed. 1900, ¶ 338; Payne v. Humeston & S. R. Co. 70 Iowa, 588, 31 N. W. 880; Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619.

Unless the clerk complied with the plain provisions of the law his act was negligence per se, and the delivery of the gasoline without compliance with the statutory requirement could not have been in good faith.

The statute imposes a duty upon the defendant, a failure to discharge which constitutes negligence. Proof of such failure establishes one of the conditions essential to the plaintiff's right of recovery.

To render a person liable in an action for negligence it is not necessary that he should have foreseen the identical injury for which recovery is sought.

Hazard v. Council Bluffs, 79 Iowa, 106, 44 N. W. 219.

The mere fact that some other cause operates with the negligence of the defendant to produce the injury complained of does not relieve the defendant from liability.

If a person negligently markets a substance hurtful to health, in such form or with such representation as to its identity or properties as to justify the belief that it is harmless, the vendor is liable to any person injured thereby while using the same for an apparently suitable purpose. It is immaterial, in such case, whether the injured person holds a contractual relation to the vendor, or how often the article is resold.

Messrs. Albrook & Lundy and C. M. Nagle for appellee.

Sherwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was burned by the explosion of gasoline which she was using for starting a fire, supposing it to be kerosene oil. She was at the time about fifteen years of age, a member of her father's family, and assisting in the general housework. A short time before she was injured, her father went to the defendant's store with a jug, which he testified he directed the clerk to fill with kerosene oil. As a matter of fact, undisputed, the clerk filled it with gasoline, and did not label it as required by statute (§ 2505). The jug was taken home by the father, and the plaintiff, supposing that it contained kerosene oil, poured some of its contents into a small can, and from there into the stove. She then lit it, when it exploded, and set fire to her clothing. The evidence is conflicting whether the father ordered gasoline or kerosene. The defendant claims that he ordered gasoline. But, as we view the matter, it does not materially affect this case one way or the other. Section 2505 of the Code provides that "no gasoline shall be sold, given away, or delivered to any person in this state until the package, cask, barrel, or vessel containing the same has been marked 'gasoline.'" This statute is evidently for the protection of all persons in the state. It is to warn all that the substance they are handling is dangerous, and that its use requires extreme care. If the plaintiff's father had been injured by the use of the gasoline, it would then be material, perhaps, to inquire whether he ordered gasoline or kerosene; for, if he knew what the jug contained, the failure to label it would probably not constitute negligence as to him. But we have no such case, for it is absolutely beyond dispute in the record that the plaintiff herself had no knowledge that she was using gasoline, and, further, that the jug she took it from was one which was used for kerosene, and for that alone. As to her, then, the failure to label the jug as required by law was negligence per se, because it was a violation of a statutory requirement that it be marked "gasoline" before delivery to any person. Dodge v. Burlington, C. R. & M. River R. Co. 34 Iowa, 279; Ford v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 91 Iowa, 179, 24 L. R. A. 657, 59 N. W. 5; Toboy v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 94 Iowa, 256, 33 L. R. A. 496, 62 N. W. 761; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 13. The trial court instructed the jury on the theory that, if the father knew that the jug contained gasoline, and was negligent in permitting the plaintiff to use it, or in not informing her of the fact, such negligence on his part would defeat her recovery. In so instructing there is error. It has long been the settled law of this state that the negligence of the parents cannot be imputed to the child. Wymore v. Mahaska County, 78 Iowa, 396, 6 L. R. A. 545, 43 N. W. 264; Bradshaw v. Frazier (Iowa) 85 N. W. 752. Whatever diversity of opinion there may formerly have been among the courts on this question, it is now apparent that the tendency of modern decisions is in line with this holding. See 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 78. Instructions 1, 3, and 4 asked by the plaintiff are in accord with this holding, and should have been given.

For the error pointed out, the judgment is reversed.

DES MOINES LEADER et al.

(.....Iowa.....)

A verdict must be directed for defendant in the absence of anything to show ill will or malice, in an action for the publication in a newspaper of an article ridiculing in exaggerated and uncomplimentary terms a public entertainment which is not only childish, but ridiculous in the extreme.

(May 28, 1901.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County in favor of defendants in an action to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. B. Crosby and Spurrier & Maxwell, for appellant:

A libel is a malicious defamation of a person by any printing, writing, sign, figure, representation, or effigy tending to provoke him to wrath, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or to deprive him of the benefits of public confidence and social intercourse.

Iowa Stat. § 5086.

This definition is applicable in a civil action for the recovery of damages.

Call v. Larabee, 60 Iowa, 212, 14 N. W. 237; Stewart v. Pierce, 93 Iowa, 136, 61 N. W. 388; Halley v. Gregg, 74 Iowa, 564, 38 N. W. 416; Mosnat v. Snyder, 105 Iowa, 500, 75 N. W. 356.

To establish a qualified privilege the defendant must show that he believed the published statements to be true.

NOTE.—For earlier cases in this series as to libel or slander by expressing opinions or comment without misstating facts, see St. James Military Academy v. Gaiser (Mo.) 28 L. R. A. 667, and note; and Dowling v. Livingstone (Mich.) 32 L. R. A. 104.

As to words tending to bring one into ridicule or contempt, see cases in note to Morey v. Morning Journal Assn. (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. on page 623.

State v. Haskins, 109 Iowa, 656, 47 L. R. A. 223, 80 N. W. 1063.

The publication in a newspaper of false and defamatory matter is not privileged because made in good faith as a matter of news.

Newell, Slander & Libel, 2d ed. p. 395.

The question whether the occasion is such as to rebut the inference of malice if the communication be bona fide is one of law for the court, but whether bona fides exist is one of fact for the jury, and the jury may find the existence of actual malice from the language of the communication itself, as well as from intrinsic evidence.

Whether or not a publication is a privileged one is a question of law to be determined by the court.

Comfort v. Young, 100 Iowa, 627, 69 N. W. 1032; Clifton v. Lange, 108 Iowa, 472, 79 N. W. 276; Nichols v. Eaton, 110 Iowa, 509, 47 L. R. A. 433, 81 N. W. 792.

The editor of a newspaper has the right, if not the duty, of publishing for the information of the public fair and reasonable comments, however severe in terms, upon anything which is made by its owner a subject of public exhibition, as upon any other matter of public interest; and such a publication falls within the class of privileged communications for which no action can be maintained without proof of actual malice.

Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 235, 23 Am. Rep. 322.

The article complained of being a privileged one, does it contain anything that is libelous per se?

Words ordinarily slanderous may not be so because spoken by the party in the performance of public or official duty, upon a just occasion, and without malice.

Mayo v. Sample, 18 Iowa, 306.

No defamatory words not libelous per se are actionable without extrinsic aid; neither are words published on privileged occasions. Where the words are not actionable per se, special damage must be alleged; and proof of such damage is essential to the cause of action.

Lucas v. Flinn, 35 Iowa, 9; Achorn v. Piper, 66 Iowa, 694, 24 N. W. 513; Scholl v. Bradstreet Co. 85 Iowa, 551, 52 N. W. 500; Hollenbeck v. Hall, 103 Iowa, 214, 39 L. R. A. 734, 72 N. W. 518; Hollenbeck v. Ristine, 105 Iowa, 488, 75 N. W. 355.

Even when libelous per se, if special damages are sought to be recovered, they must be alleged and proved.

Hicks v. Walker, 2 G. Greene, 440.

And even so, unless the special damages are the natural and proximate consequence of the libel, they cannot be recovered.

Georgia v. Kepsford, 45 Iowa, 48; Irlbeck v. Bierle, 84 Iowa, 47, 50 N. W. 36.

In cases not libelous per se, special damages, if properly pleaded and proved, may be recovered, but are limited to those which are the natural and proximate, though not the necessary, consequence of the defamation.

Hollenbeck v. Ristine, 105 Iowa, 488, 75 N. W. 355; Terwilliger v. Wands, 17 N. Y. 54, 72 Am. Dec. 420; Woodruff v. Bradstreet, 116 N. Y. 217, 5 L. R. A. 555, 22 N. E. 354; Dug v. Mater, 27 C. C. A. 100, 52 U. S. App. 38f, 82 Fed. 169.

Plaintiff did not sufficiently plead special damages.

Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 225, 23 L. ed. 308; Fry v. McCord Bros. 95 Tenn. 678, 33 S. W. 568; Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Delaney, 102 Tenn. 289, 45 L. R. A. 600, 52 S. W. 151; Cook v. Cook, 100 Mass. 194; Hollenbeck v. Ristine, 105 Iowa, 488, 75 N. W. 355.

When the matter complained of is privileged the burden of proving malice lies on the plaintiff: the defendant cannot be called upon to prove that he did not act maliciously until some evidence of malice, more than a mere scintilla, has been adduced by the plaintiff.

Words not libelous per se are not evidence of malice.

Scholl v. Bradstreet Co. 85 Iowa, 551, 52 N. W. 500; Hollenbeck v. Hall, 103 Iowa, 214, 39 L. R. A. 734, 72 N. W. 518.

Deemer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is predicated on the publication of the following article: "Billy Hamilton, of the Odebolt Chronicle, gives the Cherry Sisters the following graphic write-up on their late appearance in his town: 'Effie is an old jade of 50 summers, Jessie a frisky filly of 40, and Addie, the flower of the family, a capering monstrosity of 35. Their long skinny arms, equipped with talons at the extremities, swung mechanically, and anon waved frantically at the suffering audience. The mouths of their rancid features opened like caverns, and sounds like the wailings of damned souls issued therefrom. They pranced around the stage with a motion that suggested a cross between the danse du ventre and fox trot,—strange creatures with painted faces and hideous mien. Effie is spavined, Addie is springhalt, and Jessie, the only one who showed her stockings, has legs with calves as classic in their outlines as the curves of a broom handle.'" The defendants pleaded that plaintiff, with her sisters, were engaged in giving public performances, holding themselves out to the public as singers, dancers, reciters, and comedians; that their performances were coarse and farcical, wholly without merit, and ridiculous; that the Des Moines Leader is a newspaper published in the city of Des Moines, which the other defendants were conducting, and that the article appeared as a criticism of the performance given by plaintiff, and to expose the character of the entertainment; that it was written in a facetious and satirical style, and without malice or ill will towards plaintiff or her sisters. This is clearly a plea of privilege, and the direction to the jury to return a verdict for defendants was, no doubt, on the theory that the plea of privilege was established. That it was published of and concerning plaintiff in her rôle as a public performer scarcely admits of a doubt, and it is well settled that the editor of a newspaper has the right to freely criticize any and every kind of public performance, provided that in so doing he is not actuated by malice. In other words, the article was qualifiedly privileged. Gott v. Pulsifer, 122 Mass. 238, 23 Am. Rep. 322; Fry v. Bennett, 28 N. Y. 324; Shurtleff v. Stevens, 51 Vt. 501, 31 Am. Rep. 698; Dooling v. Budget Pub. Co. 144 Mass. 258, 59 Am. Rep. 83, 10 N. E. 809. The occasion was such that the presumption of malice arising from the publication is rebutted, and plaintiff, in order to recover, must prove actual malice. Nichols v. Eaton, 110 Iowa, 509, 47 L. R. A. 483, 81 N. W. 792. By the term "actual malice" is meant personal spite or ill will, or culpable recklessness or negligence. Such malice may be shown by extrinsic evidence, or it may be gathered from the publication itself. Nichols v. Eaton, 110 Iowa, 509, 47 L. R. A. 483, 81 N. W. 792. There is absolutely no evidence, outside the publication itself, tending in any manner to show malice; hence, if malice be found, it must be from the article published. Ordinarily publication of such an article as the one in question would of itself be an inducium of malice, but as applied to the facts of this case, we do not think it should be so held. Plaintiff described the entertainment she and her sisters gave, in part, as follows: "These entertainments are concerts,—literary entertainments. I don't sing much. The others do. I have recitations and readings; recite and read in costume. In feminine costumes. Dresses as long as I have on, or shorter. I don't wear short dresses. Sometimes I have worn men's clothes. I never dance. I recite essays and events that have happened, I have written up of my own. I have none of them with me. One is 'The Modern Young Man;' the other, 'An Event that Happened in the City of Chicago.' I sing an Irish song,—an Irish ballad; also a eulogy on ourselves. It is a kind of a ballad composed by ourselves. I help the others sing it. I have forgotten it. It is about an editor. In the chorus I walked a little around the stage,—kind of a fast walk. A cavalier is a Spaniard, I believe. I represent a Spaniard. That is given in the act that we call 'The Gypsy's Warning.' I wear my bicycle bloomer rig. They reach to my knees, and are divided like leggings,—black leggings with buttons on them. I wear a blue blouse,—a blue velvet blouse. Sometimes red and sometimes green. I have many suits; wear then in turn. The leggings are always black. In the chorus I walked a little around the stage,—kind of fast walk or a little run. Had on different kind of clothes,—mostly silk. We had a reproduction of the performance called 'Trilby.' The singing of Ben Bolt by my little sister. I would come in and hypnotize her in a farce way. I would tell the audience that I would hypnotize her while she would sing. I didn't appear at any show without stockings. My little sister was barefooted in one act,—in very long dresses to her ankles. She also appears in a long robe in a tableau clinging to the cross. 'Cherries ripe and cherries red,' is a eulogy song. I was not asked to repeat only one verse. Q. What is the verse? A. 'Cherries red and cherries ripe, the cherries they are out of sight, cherries ripe and cherries red, Cherry Sisters still ahead." The defendants' evidence regarding the character of the performance is in part as follows: "It was the most ridiculous performance I ever saw. There was no orchestra there. The pianist left after the thing was half over. She could not stand the racket and left. There was no other music, except vocal music from the Cherrys. They had a drum, and I think they had cymbals. As near as I can recollect, the curtain raised at the beginning, and the Cherrys appeared and gave a walk around and a song. I think it was 'Ta, ra, ra, Boom de ay.' They read essays and sung choruses and gave recitations, interspersed with the remarks that, if the boys didn't stop, the curtain would go down. One young man brought a pair of beer bottles which he used as a pair of glasses. They threatened to stop the performance unless he was put out, but he was not put out, and they didn't stop. When the curtain went up the audience shrieked and indulged in catcalls, and from that time one could hardly hear very much, to know what was going on, to give a recital of it. There was no bad language used, however. When Jessie was on the stage she appeared in the Trilby act in bare feet and short dresses. She was asked to trim her toe nails, and such irreverent remarks as that. She appeared more pleased than anything else. They had a washtub scene. I think Effie and Addie appeared with bare arms showing to the elbow, which was quite prominent. They went through the motions of washing, singing at the time. There was another piece called 'The Gypsy's Warning.' One of the sisters appeared in a male costume. Then there was a song, 'I want to be an editor,' and an explanation, accompanying the song, that an editor down at Cedar Rapids insulted them, and they made him pay dearly for it. The song was so jumbled up one could hardly make anything out of it, except, 'I want to be an editor, I want to be an editor,' whereupon the audience rose as one man and called on me to stand up. I did not stand up. My wife was there. While Jessie sang this she was rolling her eyes and swaying her body. I am not qualified to pass an opinion upon the merits of the singing. The discord was something that grated on one's nerves. There was short stepping around and swaying of the body. They went around the stage in one of their pieces,—I cannot say which,—sort of a mincing gait, shaking their bodies and making little steps. That is what made me describe it as a cross between the danse du ventre and a fox trot. They had their hands in front of them and at their sides. There was a tableau at the close, as I recollect. Jessie was the central figure in that piece, with her eyes uplifted, red lights, and so on. There was a 'Rock of Ages.' The audience was talking to the women, and they (the Cherry Sisters) would talk back. They would say: 'You don't know anything. You have not been raised well, or you would not interrupt a nice, respectable show.' Nobody left during the performance except the pianist." In the light of this evidence, and some other that cannot be reproduced, the trial court directed a verdict for the defendants. We are now asked to set aside its order on the theory that the question of malice was for the jury. This is, no doubt, the correct rule, when there is any substantial evidence of actual malice, either in the publication itself, or in the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction. A mere scintilla is not sufficient, however, to take the case to the jury. The evidence should raise a probability of malice, and be more consistent with its existence than its absence. When the occasion is privileged the presumption arises that the publication was bona fide and without malice, and it is incumbent on plaintiff to overcome this presumption. If, from defendant's point of view, strong words seemed to be justified, he is not to be held liable unless the court can say that what he published was to some extent, at least, inconsistent with the theory of good faith. These rules are well settled, and need no citation of authorities in their support. One who goes upon the stage to exhibit himself to the public, or who gives any kind of a performance to which the public is invited, may be freely criticised. He may be held up to ridicule, and entire freedom of expression is guaranteed dramatic critics, provided they are not actuated by malice or evil purpose in what they write. Fitting strictures, sarcasm, or ridicule, even, may be used, if based on facts, without liability, in the absence of malice or wicked purpose. The comments, however, must be based on truth, or on what in good faith and upon probable cause is believed to be true, and the matter must be pertinent to the conduct that is made the subject of criticism. Freedom of discussion is guaranteed by our fundamental law and a long line of judicial decisions. As said in the Gott Case, 122 Mass. 238, 23 Am. Rep. 322, the editor of a newspaper has the right, if not the duty, of publishing, for the information of the public, fair and reasonable comments, however severe in terms, upon anything which is made by its owner a subject of public exhibition, as upon any other matter of public interest; and such a publication falls within the class of privileged communications, for which no action will lie without proof of actual malice. See also Eastwood v. Holmes, 1 Foot. & F. 347; Paris v. Levy, 9 C. B. N. S. 342; Donaghy v. Gaffy, 53 Conn. 43, 2 Atl. 397; Carr v. Hood, 1 Campb. 355, note. Surely, if one makes himself ridiculous in his public performances, he may be ridiculed by those whose duty or right it is to inform the public regarding the character of the performance. Cooper v. Stone, 24 Wend. 434. Mere exaggeration, or even gross exaggeration, does not of itself make the comment unfair. It has been held no libel for one newspaper to say of another, "The most vulgar, ignorant, and scurrilous journal ever published in Great Britain." Heriot v.

Stuart, 1 Esp. 437. A public performance may be discussed with the fullest freedom, and may be subject to hostile criticism and hostile animadversions, provided the writer does not do it as a means of promulgating slanderous and malicious accusations. O'Connor v. Sill, 60 Mich. 175, 27 N. W. 13; Davis v. Duncan, L. R. 9 C. P. 396. Ridicule is often the strongest weapon in the hands of a public writer; and, if it be fairly used, the presumption of malice which would otherwise arise is rebutted, and it becomes necessary to introduce evidence of actual malice, or of some indirect motive or wish to gratify private spite. There is a manifest distinction between matters of fact and comment on or criticism of undisputed facts or conduct. Unless this be true, liberty of speech and of the press guaranteed by the Constitution is nothing more than a name. If there ever was a case justifying ridicule and sarcasm,—aye, even gross exaggeration,—it is the one now before us. According to the record, the performance given by the plaintiff and the company of which she was a member was not only childish, but ridiculous in the extreme. A dramatic critic should be allowed considerable license in such a case. The public should be informed as to the character of the entertainment, and, in the absence of proof of actual malice, the publication should be held privileged. There is another rule of general application, now well known to the profession, that is involved, and that is that a motion to direct a verdict should be sustained when it clearly appears to the trial judge that it would be his duty to set aside a verdict in favor of the party on whom the burden of proof rests. Meyer v. Houck, 85 Iowa, 319, 52 N. W. 235.

Viewing the evidence in the light of the rules heretofore announced, and remembering that the trial court had the plaintiff before it and saw her repeat some of the performances given by her on the stage, we are of opinion that there was no error in directing a verdict for the defendants.

DIAMOND JO LINE STEAMERS et al.,
Appts.,
v.

City of DAVENPORT.

(114 Iowa, 432.)

1. The condemnation of land for a public wharf is not prevented by the fact that it is already in use by a common carrier as a landing place in connection with its business as such carrier.
2. Condemnation by a city of land for a public wharf cannot be defeated by the fact that it intends to grant a railroad right of way over the property after it has acquired title.

(October 2, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Scott County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding to condemn real estate for a wharf and public landing. Affirmed.

Statement by Waterman, J.:

This proceeding was originally instituted by the city of Davenport to condemn certain real estate belonging to defendants for a wharf and public landing. Commissioners were duly appointed, who appraised the damages, against the protest of the Diamond Jo Line Steamers, and the land was taken by the city. The steamer company appeals.

Messrs. Schmidt & Vollmer, Henderson, Hurd, Lenahan, & Kiesel, and Kretzinger, Gallagher, & Rooney, for appellants:

The right of eminent domain may be exercised only under express grant or necessary implication, and not then if it appears that the property sought to be taken in the exercise of the right is in fact devoted to, and indispensable for, the purposes of the corporation.

Messrs. Davison & Lane, George W. Scott, and E. M. Sharon for appellee.

Waterman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Diamond Jo Line Steamers is a corporation organized for pecuniary profit under the general incorporation acts of the state. The nature of its business, as stated in its articles, is "the transporting of persons and property on the Mississippi river and tributaries and the storage and forwarding of property." It owns, jointly with the estate of one Richard Gray, deceased, a tract of land in the city of Davenport 208 feet wide on Front street, and extending south 148 feet, at which point it widens to the west 20 feet, and thence extends further south the full width of 228 feet to "low-water mark" of the Mississippi river, as the record before us discloses. Inasmuch as no question is made by counsel as to the south line of this property, and no showing with relation to the source of title, we shall accept the boundaries given. In 54 L. R. A.

our view of the case, it makes no difference whether the tract in dispute extends to low-water mark, as claimed, or only to high-water mark, which this court has fixed as the limit of private ownership on navigable waters. McManus v. Carmichael, 3 Iowa, 1; Haight v. Keokuk, 4 Iowa, 199; Ingraham v. Chicago, D. & M. R. R. Co. 34 Iowa, 249. On the north part of this tract is a building used by plaintiff for a warehouse. The south 114.60 feet is open ground, which was used as a landing and wharf for plaintiff's steamers. The city of Davenport is acting under a special charter, and has power to acquire land by condemnation for a public landing. Code, § 999. In August, 1898, it instituted proceedings to condemn the south 114.60 feet of plaintiff's said tract, together with contiguous property belonging to others, for the purpose of making a public landing for boats. The Diamond Jo Line Steamers Company protested without avail against the proceedings. Damages were duly awarded, and the land taken. No question is raised here as to the amount of the damages allowed. The contention on the part of the appellant is that the property sought to be taken was already so devoted to public service as to protect it from condemnation for another public use. The general rule on this subject is that, when property has been devoted to public use, in the sense that will be later explained, it cannot be taken and applied to another conflicting public use by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, unless by authority of the legislature, expressly given or necessarily implied. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Starkweather, 97 Iowa, 159, 31 L. R. A. 183, 66 N. W. 87, 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1052, notes. Here arises the principal question in dispute. Was this property devoted to public use, within the meaning of this rule? Before taking up the facts, it may be well to examine the law on the subject. It cannot be that all real estate is exempt from condemnation which the owner uses as a matter of choice for public benefit. If that were so, the real estate of an individual owner of a line of stage coaches or transfer wagons, if he were doing business as a common carrier, would be secured against the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Manifestly, this cannot be the law. "The true criterion by which to judge of the character of the use is whether the public may enjoy it of right or by permission only." Olmsted v. Morris Aqueduct, 47 N. J. L. 311. "If the company may abandon its business, and sell its lands by an absolute title, without any responsibility to the state, its property is not so held as to be exempt from condemnation." Mills, Em. Dom. § 45. Where the property, by its use will tend incidentally to benefit the public, affording additional accommodations for business, and commerce, yet this is not sufficient to bring it within the rule of property devoted to public use, especially where the property is to remain under private control, and no right to its use or to direct its management is conferred upon the public. Re

Eureka Basin Warehouse & Mfg. Co. 96 N. Y. 42. The mere use of the property for public purposes is, then, not enough to give the exemption. Such property, it seems, must be impressed with a trust in favor of the public, so that the latter's use is of right, and not of grace; and this right must be one that cannot be defeated or destroyed at the owner's will. The most pertinent case to which our attention has been called is Re New York, L. & W. R. Co. 99 N. Y. 12, 1 N. E. 27, in which plaintiff sought to take by condemnation certain real estate belonging to the defendant and which was used by the latter in connection with the operation of its boats on the northern lakes. The same defense as here was set up,—that the real estate was already devoted to public use by the steamboat company. The court disposed of the issue as follows: "It is further contended that the property sought to be taken is already so devoted to the public use as to protect it from condemnation to another public use. The proof shows that the Union Steamboat Company is a corporation created and existing under the laws of this state, and engaged in the business of carrying by water passengers and freight on the great lakes of the north, and using the property in question as a dock or wharf for the landing and delivery of a portion of its freight. In one sense, therefore, the property is already in use for public purposes, and quite as much so, it is contended, as it will or can be when devoted to the uses of the petitioner. Undoubtedly, the facts bring us to the inquiry whether the use of corporate property for the public convenience, and for purposes of a quasi public character, is sufficient to protect it from the grasp, under the right of eminent domain, of another corporation, whose property is held for similar public uses. The law did not confer upon the steamboat company the right to acquire land in invitum, and that now held by it is held by purchase, and by the same tenure as that of a private individual. The general authority conferred upon railroad corporations to acquire lands against the will of the owner is broad and comprehensive. In terms it covers all and excepts none. But because it could not be intended that the state, having authorized one taking, whereby the lands became impressed under authority of the sovereign with a public use, meant to nullify its own grant by authority to another corporation to take them again for another public use unless it so specially decreed, it has been ruled that lands so held and impressed with a public trust were not embraced in words of general authority. Were the rule otherwise, this evil would result. A corporation (No. 1) having the right of eminent domain takes land from a similar corporation (No. 2) having the same right. Number 2 thereupon proceeds again to condemn it for its own use, and No. 1 retaliates, and so the absurd process goes on. It is clear that the legislature never meant any such result, and hence, from any general grant containing in its terms no word of exception, there is necessarily excepted property already held upon a public trust by the authority and under the ward and control of the state. An examination of the cases in this court will show that the exception has gone no further. . . . Is the property here sought to be condemned so held? The steamboat company was organized under a general law. . . . Under that law it was and might remain a private corporation. Its charter did not make it a common carrier, or impose upon it public obligations. If it became a common carrier, or assumed public obligations, that sprang from its own voluntary action, and not from the will of the sovereign. It might carry passengers or not, as it pleased. It might transport freight for one firm or corporation or a single individual, excluding all others, and confine its operations within that narrow boundary; and practically and mainly such was the scope of its business. It might use the land here in question wholly for the purpose of building and equipping the vessels of its line, and then apply them solely to private uses. The test appears to be, not what it does or may choose to do, but what, under the law, it must do, and whether a public trust is impressed upon it. It does not so hold its property impressed with a trust for the public use unless its charter puts that character upon it, and so that it cannot be shaken off. If the law of its existence does not prevent it from being a mere private corporation, from disregarding, if it pleases, all public uses; if it may abandon its business at any moment, and refuse to run its propellers, and sell its lands by an absolute title, without responsibility to the sovereign, which is permitted by its charter; . . . in short, if under that charter it may be a purely private corporation,—its property is not so held as to be exempt from a taking under the law of eminent domain. Any other rule would be surrounded with difficulties. If the test should be made that of the actual use, of the character of the business done, and the benefit to the public realized, we shall never know where to draw the line, and must equally exempt individuals whose property is thus used; and in every case an uncertain and shifting question of fact would dominate the decision to be rendered." See also, as in point, New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Metropolitan Gaslight Co. 63 N. Y. 326. It is held in this case that the fact of a corporation's business being of a public nature is not sufficient to impress its real estate with a trust in favor of the public, and thus exempt it from being taken by the exercise of the power of eminent domain.

Now, looking to the facts, plaintiff company was incorporated under the general statutes as a carrier of freight and passengers. It acquired this real estate for use in its business. But it does not appear that the ownership or possession of such property was essential to the operation of its boats. It had a right to land them at the city of Davenport, using the public landing, or it could maintain a wharf boat in the river. Furthermore, it is not obliged under its artcles to act as a common carrier longer than it sees fit to do so. Nor is it compelled to give the public any use of this property. There is no way to prevent plaintiff from inclosing this tract at any time it desires, and thus shutting the public out from its use. Clearly, the public use here is a matter of favor, and not of right. Another consideration of weight is that the title to this property is so held that it cannot be devoted absolutely and as of right to public use by plaintiff, for the estate of Richard Gray, a private owner, has an undivided one half interest therein. Counsel for plaintiff cite a number of cases as sustaining their position. Hickok v. Hine, 23 Ohio St. 523, 13 Am. Rep. 255, is not in point. All the others are cases where the owners from whom the property sought to be taken devoted it to public use as matter of right; and, furthermore,—and this is an important, if not controlling, consideration,—such owners had authority to condemn the lands for the uses to which they were put. We may say in this connection that the plaintiff in the case before us has no authority under the law to exercise the power of eminent domain. We do not wish to be understood as saying that no real estate is impressed with a public use save such as has been actually condemned. But it is important, if not essential, in determining the character of the use to which it is put, to ascertain whether the holder might have condemned it for such purpose; for it seems that only in the hands of one having such power can it be impressed with a trust in favor of the public. Our conclusion is that the real estate in question was subject to condemnation by the city.

2. It is claimed on the part of the appellant that the real purpose of the city in condemning this real estate was not to make a public landing, but was to procure a right of way across the tract for a railway line which was seeking to enter the city. It is urged that the extraordinary power of eminent domain cannot be resorted to for such ulterior purpose. A certain question was propounded to a witness by appellant's counsel for the purpose of developing this phase of the case. An objection to it was sustained, and plaintiff then made the following offer of proof: "The appellants offer to show by the testimony of witness that the city of Davenport, in the condemnation proceedings commenced by it for the purpose of appropriating the strip of land in front of the property owned by the Diamond Jo Line Steamers and the estate of Richard Gray, deceased, and lying southerly from a line parallel with the south line of the buildings upon said premises, and 25 feet therefrom, for the ostensible purpose of establishing a wharf and landing place for boats, in fact intended by said proceeding to acquire said property with the purpose and intention of thereafter giving the Davenport & Rock Island Bridge & Railway Terminal Company and its successors the right to lay down upon said strip of ground its double tracks within 25 feet of the buildings of the appellants, and to be operated as a railway thereafter. Appellants propose further to show that all of said condemnation proceedings were under the direction and control of the officers and agents of the Davenport & Rock Island Bridge & Railway Terminal Company or its successors, and that certain of the expenses connected with such condemnation were paid or were to be paid by said railway company upon the completion of the condemnation proceedings thus commenced in the name of the city of Davenport." It will be noted that this offer does not include any evidence going to establish that the city did not need a public landing, and did not intend to devote this land to that purpose. The most that can be claimed for it is that appellant desired to show that the railroad company was interested in the matter, and when the city obtained title it intended to grant an easement or right of way across it to said railroad company. This the city had a right to do. See § 767 of the Code; Cook v. Burlington, 30 Iowa, 94, 6 Am. Rep. 649, 36 Iowa, 357, with cases therein cited. The proceeding to condemn cannot be annulled because the city had agreed to do that which it had a legal right to perform.

The judgment of the District Court is in all respects correct, and therefore affirmed.

George H. MARSHALL

v.

John A. BULLARD, Appt., et al.

(.....Iowa.....)

Payment of part of a judgment by a third person for the benefit of the debtor is a sufficient consideration for a release of the entire judgment.

(October 4, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant Bullard from a decree of the District Court for Lee County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to enjoin the issuance of execution upon a judgment. Affirmed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

On February 4, 1895, the First National Bank of Ft. Madison obtained judgment against plaintiff and Fannie Bullard for the sum of $555.50, with costs. About February 20, 1895, the defendant, with said Fannie, executed a stay bond. In December of that year execution issued, whereupon the defendant paid the amount necessary to satisfy it to the bank's attorney, who indorsed on the judgment record: "Received satisfaction of this judgment and atty's fees of John A. Bullard, except sheriff's fees, and execution ordered, and same is returned, and judgment is hereby assigned to him without recourse," and signed as "Atty. for Pltff." About July 14, 1897, the defendant caused execution to issue, and directed it levied on property of plaintiff. Before this was done, however, the parties hereto agreed that, if plaintiff would raise for defendant $320,—one half the amount due on the judgment,—the judgment should be satisfied in full. This money was raised, as will more fully appear in the opinion, and defendant signed an indorsement on the record in these words: "Received the sum of $320 from Geo. H. Marshall, being settlement in full of one half of this judgment." Shortly before the beginning of this action, in 1898, the defendant ordered execution against plaintiff, and this suit was brought to enjoin issuing the same. Decree as prayed, and defendant appeals.

The rule that the payment of a smaller sum in satisfaction of a larger is not a good discharge of a debt does not apply when the payment of a less sum is made before the debt falls due or at another place than that stipulated in the contract; and any collateral benefit received by the creditor which would raise a technical legal consideration, however small, is sufficient to support the agreement.

First M. E. Church v. Donnell, 110 Iowa, 5, 46 L. R. A. 858, 81 N. W. 171.

Marshall became liable to Wilson Bullard for the money furnished,—a greater sum than could have been realized out of the sale of his property under execution.

Marshall, the debtor, if such he was, procured Wilson Bullard, a third party, to secure the money to pay the amount agreed upon. Wilson Bullard secured the money from the bank and gave his own individual note, and this is a sufficient consideration.

When Bullard received the full sum of money he had agreed to accept, the source of it made no difference in the discharge of the contract.

Drummond v. Crane, 23 L. R. A. 707, and note, 712, 159 Mass. 577, 35 N. E. 90.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It may be conceded that John A. Bullard became the equitable owner, at least, of the judgment, as the amount thereof was paid to the judgment plaintiff's attorney upon the express understanding that it should be assigned to him. Thereafter he caused an execution to issue, and directed the sheriff to levy upon the property of plaintiff, one of the judgment defendants; but when the sheriff was about to do so Bullard told Marshall if he would raise and pay one half the judgment he would release him therefrom, and would give the other to his (Bullard's) mother, the other judgment defendant. Possibly the word "release" may not have been used, but such was clearly the understanding of the parties, though denied by Bullard. The latter knew at the time that Marshall had no property other than four horses and fourteen pigs, and that this was inadequate to satisfy the debt. The design was evidently that he should raise money by procuring it from another, and he accordingly consulted Willard Bullard, advising him fully of the circumstances. It should here be noted the debt was that of Mrs. Bullard, and the liability of Marshall resulted from signing with her as surety. Upon being informed of the situation, she executed a chattel mortgage to Willard Bullard, securing him the payment of the money which he promised to procure. The latter, in the evening of the same day, went to see John A. Bullard, and said, "Marshall tells me you will settle that judgment in full if he will raise you $320," and was answered, "I did tell him I would;" and he was then informed Willard Bullard would help Marshall to the money, and that his (Bullard's) mother would secure him therefor by a chattel mortgage on his personal property. Willard Bullard borrowed the necessary amount of one McCown, executing his individual note therefor, and paid the $320 to the sheriff. This was done in reliance on John A. Bullard's agreement to release the judgment as against Marshall. The note to McCown was afterwards paid by Mrs. Bullard. Shortly after the above payment, Marshall and John Bullard each by agreement paid one half of the sheriff's costs. Being after the close of the transaction, this cannot be regarded as of controlling importance. But see Harper v. Graham, 20 Ohio, 105; Baum v. Buntyn, 62 Miss. 110; Mitchell v. Wheaton, 46 Conn. 315, 33 Am. Rep. 24.

1. The rule that an agreement to accept part in satisfaction of the whole of a liquidated demand is invalid because without consideration has been declared too many times in this state to permit of reconsideration. Keller v. Strong, 104 Iowa, 585, 73 N. W. 1071; Bryan v. Brazil, 52 Iowa, 350, 3 N. W. 117; Works v. Hershey, 35 Iowa, 340; Myers v. Byington, 34 Iowa, 205; Rea v. Owens, 37 Iowa, 262; Sullivan v. Finn, 4 G. Greene, 544. But see Clayton v. Clark, 74 Miss. 490, 37 L. R. A. 771, 21 So. 505, 22 So. 189, an interesting decision to the contrary. It is applicable to judgment debts. Deland v. Hiett, 27 Cal. 611, 87 Am. Dec. 102; Fletcher v. Wurgler, 97 Ind. 223; Coblentz v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 40 Ark. 180. If, however, such an agreement is supported by any new consideration, though insignificant, or technical merely, if valuable, it will be upheld. Thus, if a part is to be and is paid before due, or at a place other than that at which the obligor was legally required to pay, or if payment is made in property, no matter what its value, or by the debtor in composition with his creditors generally, in which they agree to accept less than their demands, the consideration is held to be sufficient. Boyd v. Moats, 75 Iowa, 151, 39 N. W. 237; Stoutenberg v. Huismen, 93 Iowa, 213, 61 N. W. 917; Jones v. Perkins, 29 Miss. 139, 64 Am. Dec. 136, and note; White v. Kuntz, 107 N. Y. 518, 14 N. E. 423; Very v. Levy, 13 How. 345, 14 L. ed. 173. See cases collected in note to Fuller v. Kemp (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 785; also in 1 Cyclop. Law & Proc. 323; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 415. So, too, payment by a stranger to the original debt of a less amount than due in full satisfaction has been uniformly held to be a good accord and satisfaction, and to bar a subsequent action for the balance. Gordon v. Moore, 44 Ark. 349, 51 Am. Rep. 606; Fowler v. Smith, 153 Pa. 639, 25 Atl. 744; Clark v. Abbott, 53 Minn. 88, 55 N. W. 542; 1 Cyclop. Law & Proc. 325. In Shaw v. Clark, 6 Vt. 507, 27 Am. Dec. 578, the debtor furnished money to another to obtain the judgment in his name, which he did, and then discharged the defendant therefrom; and in a suit for the balance this was held to be no defense. 64 L. R. A.

"As the sum paid was really the money of the debtor, and paid over by his agent, it is the same as if paid by himself." In Bunge v. Koop, 48 N. Y. 225, 8 Am. Rep. 546, the compromise was to be effected if the debtors could induce their friends to raise and loan them the portion to be paid, which was done; but the court said: "The money, when paid, was to belong, and in fact did belong, to the defendants. It was to be paid and was paid as their money. Suppose a debtor agreed to go to work and earn the money, or to dig for it in the earth, would this furnish a new consideration to uphold an agreement of the creditor to take less than his conceded due? In all cases an embarrassed debtor must make some effort to procure the money to make a compromise, but no case can be found holding that the fact that he had agreed to make such effort furnishes any consideration to uphold the compromise. The debtor is legally bound to pay, and it is utterly indifferent to the creditor where he gets the means to do it; that is a matter of the debtor, and all his efforts are expended in simply endeavoring to discharge a legal obligation. Hence the fact that the defendants agreed to induce their friends to loan them the money, and that they did induce them to loan it, furnishes no new consideration to uphold the compromise." In Harriman v. Harriman, 12 Gray. 341, the creditor agreed "that, if the defendant . . . would raise and pay plaintiff the sum of $20, he would receive the same in full satisfaction of the judgment;" but there was nothing to indicate that a portion was to be borrowed, and it was held payment under such circumstances operated as no defense, as the raising implied no more than a proposition to collect or obtain from other funds. The facts of the case at bar clearly distinguish it from those cited. Marshall had not borrowed the money, as was done in Bunge v. Koop, and the arrangement for raising it implied procuring it from another, as he had no other way of obtaining it, as was known to the owner of the judgment. The money paid never belonged to the debtor, but was the property of and paid by a third party in reliance on the agreement to release plaintiff. True, repayment was secured by the other judgment debtor, but on the faith of this same promise. This, however, did not affect the title in any way to the money borrowed by said third party for the express purpose of releasing the plaintiff from liability of the judgment. It may be, as contended, that there was no consideration moving from plaintiff, but, as the agreement contemplated furnishing money by a third party, and it was so furnished, a new consideration moved from said third party for his benefit, and the agreement will be upheld. See Dalrymple v. Craig, 149 Mo. 345, 50 S. W. 884.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Telitha MUNRO, Appt.,
v.
Samuel M. BOWLES.

(187 Ill. 346.)

Delivery of a deed in escrow sufficient to pass title is made where the grantor turns the deed over to his housekeeper, with instructions to deliver it to the grantee on his death, with no apparent intention of retaining control thereof and no subsequent attempt to control or take possession of it, although it is placed by her for safe keeping, together with other papers of hers, in the grantor's trunk, which is locked, and the key to which he retains until his death.

III. Summary.

Scope.

This note, so far as the subject of a delivery to a third person is concerned, is confined to deeds which meet the requirements of Chief Justice Shaw's definition of a deed presently (Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Met. 412, 37 Am. Dec. 154) i. e., a deed delivered to a third person to await the happening of some contingency, and not the performance of a condition, before its delivery to the grantee. Instruments which come within his definition of an escrow, i. e., when the future delivery is to depend upon the payment of money or the performance of some other condition, are excluded. In some cases, however, instruments which come within the above definition of a deed presently are treated by the courts as escrows. Such cases are, of course, included.

I. Delivery to person previously authorized or designated by grantee.

It is obvious that a delivery of a deed to a third person, previously authorized by the grantee to receive it, is equivalent to a delivery to the grantee himself, and it is so held in Skinner v. Baker, 79 Ill. 496; Fletcher v. Shepherd, 174 Ill. 262, 51 N. E. 212; Young v. Stearns, 3 Ill. App. 498; Miller v. Irish Catholic Colonization Assn. 86 Minn. 857, 81 N. W. 215; Sowards v. Moss, 58 Neb. 119 78 N. W. 873; Bond v. Wilson (N. C.) 40 S. E. 179; Peck v. Rees, 7 Utah, 467, 13 L. R. A. 714, 27 Pac. 581.

A deed may be delivered to a third person as the servant or bailee of the grantee, and such delivery will be valid. Souveryby v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 240.

The delivery of a deed to one of the officers of a corporation is a delivery to the corporation ed, would place it on the same basis as a forged deed.

Hadlock v. Hadlock, 22 Ill. 388.

The act of recording a deed cannot amount to a delivery when there does not appear to be an assent to, or knowledge of the grantor of, its delivery, which could not be in this case by the acts of the housekeeper after the death of the grantor.

Doe ex dem. Herbert v. Herbert, Breese (Ill.) 278; Wiggins v. Lusk, 12 Ill. 132; Wormley v. Wormley, 98 Ill. 544.

To constitute a valid delivery of the deed, whatever method of delivery is adopted by the grantor, it must appear that by his acts or words, or both, he intended to divest himself of his title and put the deed beyond his control or dominion forever.

Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 105, 48 N. E. 421; Fouts v. Bell, 172 Ill. 345, 50 N. E. 198; itself, and the deed, therefore, takes effect immediately. Price v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 84 Ill. 13.

Provided that it is for the use and benefit of the corporation, and with intent to pass an absolute title or interest. Southern Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359.

The delivery of a chattel mortgage to the agent of the mortgagee is valid notwithstanding that his agent was also the attorney of the mortgagor. Fletcher v. Martin, 126 Ind. 55, 25 N. E. 886; Day v. Sines, 15 Wash. 525, 46 Pac. 1048.

A delivery of a deed by the grantor to a person whom the grantee had requested to obtain it, with directions to hand it to the grantee, is a good delivery, although it was not handed over to the grantee, and was found among the grantor's papers after his death. Stinger v. Com. 26 Pa. 422.

Where a deed is signed and acknowledged and left with the common agent of the parties without any qualifications or instructions by the grantor, the delivery is complete, and it cannot be affected by the subsequent instruction by the grantor not to deliver it until the purchase price is paid. Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. 286, 51 Am. Dec. 478.

The delivery by a father of a conveyance of an equitable interest to his infant son, to an attorney whom he, as the guardian of his son, had employed to procure the legal title to the lands, constitutes a delivery to the son. Byington v. Moore, 62 Iowa, 470, 17 N. W. 644.

The delivery of a deed, after it had been signed, sealed, and acknowledged, to one engaged by the grantee to prepare it and to take the grantor's acknowledgment, is, in the absence of any condition or restriction, a delivery to the grantee, since, under the circumstances, such person is to be deemed the grantee's agent for the purposes of the delivery. Swank v. Swank, 37 Or. 439, 61 Pac. 846.

The court, in Ward v. Small, 90 Ky. 198, 13 S. W. 1076, expressed the opinion that the person to whom the deed was delivered, though not expressly authorized to receive it, or to act as the grantee's general agent, was so far the latter's agent as to render the delivery to him effective as a delivery to the grantee, it appearing that he had for many years, to the grantor's knowledge, attended to various matters for the grantee, notwithstanding that he testified that it may have been two, or even ten, years before the reception of the deed, since he had last attended to any matters for the grantee, he having also testified that he would not have received the deed unless he thought he had authority to do so.

Hawes v. Hawes, 177 Ill. 415, 53 N. E. 78; Provost v. Harris, 150 Ill. 40, 36 N. E. 958; Stinson v. Anderson, 96 Ill. 373; Hayes v. Boylan, 141 Ill. 400, 30 N. E. 1041; Bovee v. Hinde, 135 Ill. 140, 25 N. E. 694. Messrs. W. J. Entringer and J. T. Kenworthy for appellee.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action of ejectment brought by the appellant, Telitha Munro, against the appellee, Samuel M. Bowles, in the court below, to recover a farm of 320 acres in Rock Island county, there was a verdict of not guilty, and a judgment for defendant, the appellee. On this, her appeal, the appellant contends that upon the evidence the verdict and judgment should have been for the plaintiff, and that the court erred in the

But while the delivery of a deed of release to a known agent of the releasee is, in law, a delivery to the principal, and the deed will ordinarily be operative from the time of such delivery, there is no such identity between the releasee and his agent as to preclude the latter from becoming the depository of an escrow, where the acceptance of an agency from both parties involves no violation of duty to either. Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Ill., 13 Ohio St. 235.

So, leaving a deed with a depository is not a delivery to the grantee even if the depository was the latter's agent, where it was not delivered unconditionally, but was to remain subject to the dominion and control of the grantor. Vanstone v. Goodwin, 42 Mo. App. 39.

And the delivery of a deed to the grantee's agent to enable him to determine whether or not he will accept it is not a valid delivery, where the agent decides to reject it. Ford v. James, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 159; Carnes v. Platt, 7 Abb. Pr. N. S. 42.

A delivery to a third person pursuant to an agreement between the grantor and grantee, or with the previous assent of the grantee, is equivalent to a delivery to the latter. Haenni v. Bleisch, 146 Ill. 262, 34 N. E. 153 (obiter); Fewell v. Kessler, 30 Ind. 195; Hatch v. Bates, 54 Me. 139; Shaw v. Hayward, 7 Cush. 170; Ellis v. Missouri P. R. Co. 40 Mo. App. 165; Diehl v. Fowler, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 558, 30 S. W. 1086.

Where the grantee saw the deed after it was drawn, and the parties came to an understanding that the same should be executed and left with the register to be recorded, the register, pro hac vice, may be considered as the agent of the grantor to receive it; and the title passes to the grantee as soon as the deed is delivered to the register in pursuance of such agreement, and is not subject to the lien of a judgment recovered after that time. Cooper v. Jackson, 4 Wis. 537.

The act of a chattel mortgagor in leaving the mortgage with the town clerk for transmission to the mortgagee, as well as for registration, will complete the delivery if done pursuant to a previous agreement between the parties. Com. v. Cutler, 153 Mass. 252, 26 N. E. 855.

The mortgagee's assent to the mortgage may be inferred where it was made in pursuance of a previous agreement between the parties, was drawn in the mortgagee's counting-room, and was, by his direction, taken to the home of the mortgagors, where it was executed and acknowledged before a justice of the peace, and, in the absence of the mortgagee, was handed to the justice who took the acknowledgment, to be instructions given to the jury. The appellant claimed title as the only heir at law of her father, Samuel Bowles, deceased. The appellee claimed title through a warranty deed from said Samuel Bowles. The evidence tended to prove that the appellee was the illegitimate son of said Samuel Bowles, who, as it was shown, recognized appellee and brought him up as his own son. He was a man of wealth, and it clearly appeared that it had long been his avowed purpose to give the farm to appellee. On June 29, 1893, he called on his attorney at Moline, Illinois, and told him of his purpose to make such gift, and requested him to prepare a deed to his said son for the land. The attorney drew the deed as requested, the consideration expressed being natural love and affection and $1. The deed was read to, approved and signed by,

Samuel Bowles, who took it away with him to a notary public, before whom it was duly acknowledged. The only question in the case is whether or not there was any effective delivery of the deed. When the deed had been prepared, and before the grantor took it from the office of his attorney, the attorney asked him if he was going to give it (the deed) to his son, to which Bowles replied, "Not during my lifetime." The attorney then said to him, "Do you know that if you should keep this deed in your possession, and it should be found among your papers after your death, it would be worthless?" Bowles replied that he did not know that. His attorney then informed him that such was the law, and advised him to deliver the deed to a third person, beyond his recall, with instructions to such person to deliver it, after the grantor's death, to the grantee.

carried by him to the registry of deeds. Greene v. Conant, 151 Mass. 223, 24 N. E. 44. It was said that the court might properly infer, in the absence of any objection by the mortgagee afterward, that he impliedly authorized the selection of the justice to receive the conveyance and carry it to the registry of deeds for him, and consented that the delivery should be made in that way. In this case it was held that the delivery took effect as of the time of the delivery to the justice, so as to cut off an attachment between that time and the time the mortgage was actually delivered to the mortgagee.

II. Delivery to person not previously authorized or designated by grantee; recording.

a. General rule as to delivery to third person.

1. In general.

It is well established that, under proper conditions to be hereafter discussed, a valid delivery of a deed may be made by delivering the same to a third person for the grantee, if the latter subsequently accepts it, notwithstanding that he has not previously authorized or designated the third person to receive it. The circumstances under which such delivery may be upheld, the manner in which, and the time when, the deed takes effect, and the respective rights of the parties and third persons, are discussed in subsequent subdivisions of this note. Most of the cases cited in such subdivisions, either expressly or by implication, recognize the truth of the foregoing proposition, in the restricted and qualified form in which it is here stated. The following cases illustrate some of the forms in which the proposition has been stated and some of the applications that have been made of it.

In order to constitute a valid delivery of a deed, it is not necessary that it should have been delivered personally to the grantee; it will be sufficient if delivered to some third person for the use of the grantee, although the latter was not present at the time, had no knowledge of the existence of the deed, and never gave any authority to the person receiving it to act in his behalf. Woodward v. Camp, 22 Conn. 457.

Delivery may be made to a stranger for and in behalf, and to the use of, him to whom it is made, without authority, under certain circumstances. Hulick v. Scovil, 9 Ill. 159; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416; Chess v. Chess, 1 Penn. & W. 32, 21 Am. Dec. 350.

Delivery of a deed, executed in behalf of an infant for the consideration of love and affection, to a witness of the deed, for the benefit of the infant, is delivery to the infant. Parker v. Salmon, 101 Ga. 160, 28 S. E. 681. In this case the delivery was to the infant's father.

If a deed is delivered to a stranger who has no authority to receive it, the grantee may ratify the act of the stranger, and the delivery will be good, even in cases where the deed is made without the grantee's knowledge. Morrison v. Kelly, 22 Ill. 626, 74 Am. Dec. 169; Cook v. Patrick, 135 Ill. 499, 11 L. R. A. 573, 26 N. E. 658; Haenni v. Bleisch, 146 Ill. 262, 34 N. E. 153; Thatcher v. St. Andrew's Church, 37 Mich. 264.

Where a grantor places a deed in the hands of a third person for the benefit of the grantee, and writes the latter that he has done so, there is a sufficient delivery. Rawson v. Fox, 65 Ill. 200.

In Henrichsen v. Hodgen, 67 Ill. 179, where the deed was relied upon by the grantee as color of title to support his claim of adverse possession, the court held that there was a sufficient delivery, it appearing that the deed, with the assent of the grantor, was left in the hands of a third person for the grantee.

The delivery of a deed to one person for the benefit of another is good. Nye v. Lowry, 82 Ind. 316; Frank v. Helmer, 117 N. C. 79, 28 S. E. 42.

A delivery of a deed to a third person for the benefit of the grantee is just as much a delivery as if made to the grantee or party himself, unless some other intent is evinced. Hosley v. Holmes, 27 Mich. 416.

An agreement to procure a conveyance and release of a dower right within six months is sufficiently performed to support an action for the consideration where a deed conveying such right to the other party is executed and delivered to a stranger, with or without previous authority, if the grantee within the six months directs the latter to retain the deed for him. Turner v. Whidden, 22 Me. 121.

A deed left with a third person unconditionally to be delivered to the grantee is sufficiently delivered if subsequently received by the grantee under circumstances indicating acceptance. Campbell v. Kuhn, 45 Mich. 513, 40 Am. Rep. 479, 8 N. E. 523.

An unconditional delivery to a third person will be good if assented to by the grantee either before or after the grantor's death. Allen v. DeGroot, 105 Mo. 442, 16 S. W. 494, 1049.

A delivery of a deed may be made either to the grantee or to a third person, without any special authority, for the use of the grantee.

We are satisfied that he undertook to carry out the instructions of his attorney, and, as found by the jury, intended to make, and did make, an effectual delivery of the deed as an escrow. He was living alone, except that he had a housekeeper. On the same day that the deed was drawn and executed, he returned home, and told his housekeeper, Miss Witherspoon, of his attorney's instructions for him to make a delivery of the deed. She testified, in substance: "He said he would give the deed to me to keep, and at his death that I should give it to Sam [the appellee], and I told him I would. He then handed me the deed, and I took it. It was in an envelope, with Sam's name on the back of the envelope. I asked him what I could do with it, and he told me I could keep it in his trunk, and he handed me the key. The trunk was locked. I went into his room, and put the deed in the right-hand corner of the trunk, with a sewing-machine receipt which I had there. The trunk was the safest place in the house." A few months after the deed was made, Samuel Bowles fell unconscious while walking up the steps of his residence, and expired almost immediately after having been taken to his room. After he was dead, Miss Witherspoon, in whose hands the deed had been placed by Mr. Bowles, took from his vest pocket the key to his trunk, and then unlocked the trunk, and took therefrom the deed in question, and shortly thereafter delivered it to Samuel M. Bowles, the grantee, who filed it for record. She testified that the deed was in the envelope, in the same place in the corner of the trunk, with her machine receipt, where she had placed it Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 536, 7 Am. Dec. 348.

The delivery of a deed to a third person for the benefit of the grantee is valid if afterwards assented to by the grantee. Marsh v. Austin, 1 Allen, 238.

That the delivery of a deed is to another than the grantee does not necessarily invalidate it; but delivery may be made to a stranger for the grantee's use. Meeks v. Stillwell, 54 Ohio St. 341, 44 N. E. 267.

It is not necessary to the validity of a deed that the delivery should be made to the grantee himself. It may be delivered to a stranger in his behalf and for his use, even without his precedent authority. Eyrick v. Hetrick, 13 Pa. 488.

Where tenants in common execute a deed of land which has been fully paid for by the purchaser, the delivery of the deed after the death of one of the tenants in common, by the other, or by some third person in whose hands it has been placed for that purpose, is a good and lawful delivery. Holt's Appeal, 98 Pa. 257.

A delivery sufficient to transfer the title to the grantee is shown where one, in anticipation of marriage, executed a deed to his intended wife, and delivered it for her to a third person, who, the same day, delivered it to her. Turner v. Warren, 160 Pa. 836, 28 Atl. 781.

The rule has been applied in the following cases where the actual delivery was to the person to be benefited by the deed, though another was named as grantee:

In Richardson v. Clow, 8 Ill. App. 91, a release of land, running to the mortgagor, was delivered to one who had purchased the land from the latter. The court held that the release could be sustained upon either one of two grounds, (1) that there was, in legal effect, a delivery to the mortgagor; (2) that a delivery to the owner of the land was sufficient, she being the party to be benefited by the release.

A delivery of a deed to the real beneficiary, or the person to whose benefit it will inure, is good without any delivery to the person named as grantee in the deed; therefore, when a deed to one person will inure to the benefit of another by reason of covenants of title in a deed from the former to the latter, a delivery to the latter of a curative deed running to the former will be good without any delivery to the latter. Holcombe v. Richards, 38 Minn. 38, 35 N. W. 714.

A sufficient delivery of a deed executed to one person for the benefit of another is made by delivery to the latter, followed by the former's acquiescence in the use of his name by subsequently executing a deed to the latter. Kyte v. Kyte, 8 Kulp, 1.

And the rule has been applied where the third person has purchased the property but procured the deed to be made out to another and delivered to himself; thus:

There is a sufficient delivery of a deed to the grantees where it is given by the grantors to a third person, who buys and pays for the property and retains the deed in his possession until his death, when it is recorded by the grantees, who take possession of the property. Cook v. Patrick, 135 Ill. 499, 11 L. R. A. 573, 28 N. E. 658.

Where a husband purchases land and directs a deed absolute in form to be made to his wife, and the grantor, with the intention of passing the title, makes the deed as directed and delivers it to an agent designated by the husband, it is a prima facie delivery to the wife, and the fact that the deed was afterward found in possession of the husband does not, considering the relation of the husband and wife, rebut the presumption of delivery to her. Rumsey v. Otis, 133 Mo. 85, 34 S. W. 551.

Where a father, without any request from his daughter, or any intimation to her of his intention, purchases a house and lot and procures the deed to be made to her, and receives the deed from the grantor, and subsequently informs her of what has been done, and she assents thereto, the title vests in her. Shrader v. Bonker, 65 Barb. 615.

Where a purchaser of land procures the deed to be made out to a third person, but has it delivered to himself, and the grantee ratifies such acts as soon as he learns of the deed, the legal title will be deemed to have passed to him as between him and the widow and heirs of the third person, whatever may be the equitable rights of the parties in the premises. McPherson v. Featherstone, 37 Wis. 632.

But where the equitable owner of property procures the holder of the legal title to make a deed to his (the equitable owner's) wife, and to deliver it to him, it is optional with him whether effect shall be given to it by delivering it to his wife or not, and he may, if he choose, suffer the legal title to remain in the grantor. Newell v. Cochran, 41 Minn. 374, 43 N. W. 84.

So, also, a delivery to one of the grantees, or persons interested in a deed, has been upheld as a delivery to the others; thus:

A deed conveying property in trust for the life of a person named, with remainder to his children, may be sufficiently delivered to the remaindermen by a delivery to the life tenant que trust. Eyrick v. Hetrick, 13 Pa. 488.

A delivery to a wife of a deed conveying when it was put into her hands for delivery to appellee.

The evidence shows beyond all doubt that from what the grantor did and said he intended to make an effectual delivery of the deed. In Hawes v. Hawes, 177 Ill. 409, 53 N. E. 78, we reiterated what had been said, in substance, in many previous cases, that "no special form or ceremony is necessary to constitute a sufficient delivery. It may be by acts or words, or both, but something must be said or done showing an intention that the deed shall become operative to pass the title, and that the grantor loses all right of control over it. The delivery need not necessarily be made to the grantee, but may be made to another in his behalf and for his use; but it is indispensable that the grantor shall part with control over the deed, and shall not retain a right to reclaim it." Hayes v. Boylan, 141 Ill. 400, 30 N. E. 1041; Procart v. Harris, 150 Ill. 40, 36 N. E. 958; Wilson v. Wilson, 158 Ill. 567, 41 N. E. 1007; Shults v. Shults, 159 Ill. 654, 43 N. E. 800. It is contended in the case at bar that the grantor, Samuel Bowles, retained control of the deed, because, after he delivered it to Miss Witherspoon, she put it in his trunk, to which he carried the key, and that he virtually retained possession of the deed until his death. The argument is that what was done after the execution and acknowledgment of the deed was all one transaction, the effect of which was that the grantor retained full control of the deed, with the right and power to recall or reclaim it at any time, according to his pleasure. So far as the question of fact is concerned, the jury and the court below have found against this contention, and we think property to her for life, with remainder to her children, or in case she dies without children to her husband, is a sufficient delivery as to the husband and children also. Lambert v. McClure, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 577, 84 S. W. 978.

A delivery of a deed, creating a life estate and a remainder, to the remainderman, is a sufficient delivery to the life tenant so far as delivery depends upon the acts of the grantor, and the fact that the life tenant is claiming title under the deed sufficiently indicates an acceptance of it on his part. Stout v. Dunning, 72 Ind. 348.

A mortgage purporting to have been given to three grantees, for three several sums, was delivered to one of them by the mortgagor, with words to the effect that he delivered it for her use only. The court decided that the delivery inured to the benefit of all, saying: "The instrument purports to be a conveyance of the whole property described to the three grantees and their assigns on one consideration moving from them all, but paid in different proportions. . . . Such a conveyance vested in them an interest in the goods, and whether this interest is technically a joint interest or an interest in common is wholly immaterial. It inures to their common benefit. . . . This being the character of the instrument signed and sealed by the plaintiff, the court are of the opinion that by the delivery of it to one of the grantees, to inure as his deed to such grantee, it thereby became the deed of the grantor for all the purposes expressed in it; and that it was not competent for the grantor to restrain the operation of it, as his deed, by the use of words, so as to give it effect as his deed to one of the grantees and prevent it from having that effect as to the others." Hubby v. Hubby, 5 Cush. 516, 52 Am. Dec. 742.

Delivery of a deed to one of two joint grantees is a delivery to both. Eshleman v. Henrietta Vineyard Co. 102 Cal. 199, 36 Pac. 579.

When a deed is delivered to a grantee who is named in the deed jointly with another grantee, both made by the instrument tenants in common, in the absence of facts tending to show differently, such delivery will be regarded as a delivery to both. Minor v. Powers (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 710, affirmed in 87 Tex. 83, 26 S. W. 1071.

Where a father executed a deed to his two sons and handed the same to one of them, telling the latter that it was for him and his brother, there was a good delivery to both. Benson v. Hall, 150 Ill. 60, 36 N. E. 947.

But if one makes a deed to two persons, and delivers it to one of them only, and says nothing with reference to the other at the time of the delivery, the deed is void as to the latter. Hannah v. Swamer, 8 Watts, 9, 34 Am. Dec. 442.

And if a deed to two grantees is delivered to one of them without the knowledge of the other, and the latter, upon learning of it, dissents therefrom, the deed is void as to him, and he cannot thereafter maintain ejectment. Baxter v. Baxter, 44 N. C. (Busbee L.) 341.

2. When not to be delivered to grantees until after grantor's death.

Postponing for the present the discussion of the conditions necessary to such a delivery, it may be said to be established by the overwhelming weight of authority that, in the absence of rights of third persons superior to those of the grantor (as to such rights, see II. §, infra), the fact that the third person is directed not to deliver the deed to the grantee until after the grantor's death does not defeat the delivery. Doe ex dem. Guest v. Beeson, 2 Houst. (Del.) 246; Dinwiddle v. Smith, 141 Ind. 318, 40 N. E. 748; Stout v. Rayl, 146 Ind. 379, 45 N. E. 515; Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. 807, 6 Am. Dec. 67; Latham v. Udell, 88 Mich. 238; Thatcher v. St. Andrew's Church, 87 Mich. 264; Howard v. Patrick, 88 Mich. 805; Jenkinson v. Brooks, 119 Mich. 108, 77 N. W. 640; Brown v. Stutson, 100 Mich. 574, 59 N. W. 238; Williams v. Latham, 118 Mo. 165, 20 S. W. 99; Diefendorf v. Diefendorf, 132 N. Y. 100, 30 N. E. 375; Arnegard v. Arnegard, 7 N. D. 475, 41 L. R. A. 258, 75 N. W. 797; Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Hunt (Tex. Civ. App.) 38 S. W. 1134.

There is a good delivery where the grantor gives the deeds to a third person with directions to hand them after his death to the persons to whom they were made, or have such of them as were to minors recorded. Stephens v. Huns, 54 Pa. 26.

In Jones v. Jones, 6 Conn. 111, 16 Am. Dec. 35, a parent, in consideration of natural affection, executed deeds of part of his estate to his children, but retained the deeds in his custody giving directions to his wife to lodge them, after his death, with the town clerk for record, which was accordingly done. The court held that, as the deeds were never delivered, the putting them into the custody of the town clerk for record must be laid out of the question. It was said, however, that the case would have been different if the deeds had been delivered to the wife before the grantor's decease; for in that event the delivery of them to the use of the grantees to take effect on the death of the their finding is sustained by the evidence. The evidence shows that he never did attempt to recall or reclaim the deed, or to exercise any control over it whatever, except that he permitted its custodian to keep it in his locked trunk, with a paper belonging to her which she kept in the same place. His intention to carry out the instructions of his attorney, and to make an effective delivery beyond his right of recall, is clear. Had Miss Witherspoon placed and kept the deed in a trunk or other place of deposit belonging to her, no question as to the delivery could have arisen. The question, then, is, Does the mere fact that she put the deed in his trunk, to which he carried the key, immediately upon its delivery to her, necessarily render such delivery, or alleged delivery, ineffectual? We think not. Such a fact, in connection with others, might cast suspicion upon the intention of the grantor, and give rise to the conclusion that the attempted delivery was only colorable, and that he had no intention of parting with the control of the deed; but in the case at bar there was no evidence whatever that he did not intend in good faith to make a complete and final delivery of the deed as an escrow, but, as before said, the evidence was that he did so intend. So far as he was concerned, the act of delivery was complete, and no conditions were attached to it, except that the person to whom it was so delivered should, at his death, deliver it to the grantee. This condition was fulfilled, and we cannot say, as a matter of law, that because the custodian put and kept the deed in a receptacle belonging to him, where he could, by the exercise of mere physical power, regain the actual possession of the instrument as against such custodian, he did not part with all dominion and control over the grantor would, by legal operation, have been a delivery to the grantees themselves.

That the person to whom a deed was delivered by the grantor with instructions to hold it until the death of the grantor and then deliver it to the grantee violated his trust, and gave the deed to the grantee before the grantor's death, does not defeat the delivery. Wallace v. Harris, 32 Mich. 380.

The cases just cited represent but a small part of those that support the proposition heretofore stated with reference to the delivery of a deed to a third person to await the grantor's death. Most of the cases, however, in which the question is involved, treat the general proposition as beyond dispute, and occupy themselves with the question as to the circumstances under which such delivery may be made, the manner in which, or the time when, the deed takes effect, or the respective rights of the parties and third persons, and for that reason are more appropriately cited in the following subdivisions.

The following cases seem to take the view that the direction to the third person not to deliver the deed to the grantee until after the grantor's death is necessarily fatal to the delivery.

In Doe ex dem. Lloyd v. Bennett, 8 Car. & P. 124, one made a deed of gift to his daughter, signed and sealed it in the presence of the attesting witnesses, and said: "I deliver this as my last act and deed." Afterwards, on the suggestion that the grantee might otherwise take his property from him in his lifetime, he requested a third person to keep the deed and not deliver it to the grantee until after his death. It was held that the delivery was completed by the declaration of the grantor. Coleridge, J., said, however, that he doubted whether, if the instrument had been delivered on the condition that the grantee should not have it till the grantor's death, it could operate as an escrow.

Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Ga. 267, 63 Am. Dec. 235, held that the delivery of a writing as a deed to a third person, as the agent of the grantor, to hold during the life of the grantor and to be delivered at his death to the grantees, does not operate as the deed of the grantor presently, or as an escrow, and a delivery by the third person to the grantee, after the grantor's death, is invalid. The court, in the opinion, seems to disapprove of the entire doctrine that an effectual delivery to the grantee may be made by a delivery to a third person with instructions to deliver it to the grantee after the grantor's death, and disapproves of Wheel- wright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 447, 3 Am. Dec. 66, and the cases following that case. It is stated, however, in the statement of facts preceding the opinion, that the grantor delivered the deed to the third person (a subscribing witness) as his agent; and the opinion repeatedly states that the deed was subject to the grantor's control. If by this statement is meant that the grantor in the particular case, by constituting the third person as his agent, retained control over the deed, the case would, by the very terms in which the doctrine has been stated, be excluded from it. It may be, however, the court meant that the third person, under such circumstance, is to be deemed the agent of the grantor without any special agreement or understanding to that effect.

Gilmore v. Whitesides, Dud. Eq. 14, 31 Am. Dec. 563, is to the same effect as the last case. The court said that, although a delivery to one person for another may be good, that can be the case only where there is an unconditional delivery, or where it is upon a condition over which the grantor can have no further control; but in this case it is not pretended but that the grantor might at any time have resumed the paper and resumed the gift. This statement does not seem to have been made in view of any understanding or agreement that the grantor might recall the deed, but apparently because the court took the view that, as the deed was not to be delivered to the grantee or donee until after the grantor's death, it was necessarily within his control. This case, therefore, seems to be opposed to the general doctrine.

Baker v. Haskell, 47 N. H. 479, 93 Am. Dec. 455, seems to practically deny that a delivery of a deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death may be upheld as a delivery to the grantee where the latter knew nothing about the deed until after the grantor's death. The opinion first states that it must be regarded as the established doctrine of the state that placing a deed in the hands of a third person is not a good delivery, unless the grantor parts with his dominion over the deed, and that if he continues till his death to have the right to recall the deed from the depository, there is no delivery, although such right was never exercised. It then apparently takes the position that until there is some privity between the depository and the grantee, the deed is necessarily within the control of the grantor, notwithstanding that he may have originally intended to part with all dominion over it. The court says the grantor has a right to change his mind and recall the deed at any time before the depository has entered into an dead. Once parted with, it was gone forever, and he could not thereafter rightfully or effectually reassume a control which he had parted with, even if he had obtained possession of the deed; nor did he attempt to do so, but suffered the deed to remain undisturbed where Miss Witherspoon had placed it. We are disposed to agree with the findings below that the grantor did intend to make, and did in fact make, a delivery of the instrument. The instructions of the court to the jury were in harmony with these views, and no other error is pointed out.

The judgment will be affirmed.

Magruder, J., dissenting:

In my opinion there was no valid delivery of the deed. The deceased directed his housekeeper to take the deed, and put it in arrangement with the grantee to hold it for him, or deliver it to him. It seems doubtful from the testimony with reference to the delivery to the depositary whether the grantor intended to part with the dominion and control over the deed, and it would seem that the decision might have been put upon the ground that he did not so intend, but the opinion itself seems clearly to put the decision upon the ground that, under the circumstances, the grantor did not part with all dominion and control over the deed, irrespective of what his original intentions may have been. The action was ejectment against the grantee, the plaintiff basing his title on the claim that the grantor died seised of the property. See also Hale v. Joslin, 134 Mass. 310, infra, II. b, 2, b, (2).

It is apparent from the citations previously made that the four cases last cited are opposed to the overwhelming weight of authority.

b. Requisites on part of grantor.

1. General statement.

Having stated in II. a, 1, the general proposition that a valid delivery may be made by delivering the deed to an unauthorized third person for the grantee, and in II. a, 2, the further general proposition that a direction to the third person not to deliver the deed to the grantee until after the grantor's death will not defeat the delivery, it is the purpose in this and the following subdivision to show what is requisite, on the part of the grantor, to uphold such a delivery. The question of acceptance by the grantee is discussed separately in II. c, infra.

The first requisite on the part of the grantor is that he shall deliver the deed to the third person for the benefit of the grantee and in some way express his intention to that effect; thus:

The mere leaving of a deed by the grantor with his agent, without any instructions as to what he desires to be done with it, does not amount to a delivery. The law does not presume, when a deed is handed to a third person, that it is done with the intention to pass the title to the grantee. In order to make such act a delivery, the intention of the grantor must be expressed at the time in an unmistakable manner. Fitzpatrick v. Brigman (Ala.) 30 So. 560.

A deed is good if delivered to a stranger to the use of the grantee. But if it is delivered to a stranger without any such intention (unless it be delivered as an escrow) it seems this is not a sufficient delivery. Threadgill v. Jennings, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 384.

his trunk, which was in his bedroom. As soon as she placed it in his trunk, she gave him the key to his trunk. He put the key in his vest pocket, and carried it there for several months, until his death. It was found in his pocket after his death. It is evident that the deed never left his possession or control. Being in his trunk in his bedroom, the deed was all the time in his sight, and, having the key in his hands, he could get the deed and destroy it at any time. Byars v. Spencer, 101 Ill. 429, 40 Am. Rep. 212; Walls v. Ritter, 180 Ill. 616, 54 N. E. 565; Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 96, 48 N. E. 421; Hayes v. Boylan, 141 Ill. 400, 30 N. E. 1041; Hawes v. Hawes, 177 Ill. 409, 53 N. E. 78; Provost v. Harris, 150 Ill. 40, 36 N. E. 958; Wilson v. Wilson, 158 Ill. 567, 41 N. E. 1007; Shultz v. Shultz, 159 Ill. 654, 43 N. E. 800.

An unconditional delivery of a deed to a third person for the use and benefit of the grantee, where the grantor intends to divest the title, and to part with all control over the instrument, is ordinarily a sufficient delivery. Wuester v. Follin, 60 Kan. 334, 56 Pac. 490.

A deed need not necessarily be delivered directly to the grantee himself; a delivery to any other person for him and to his use is sufficient. If it has passed beyond the control of the grantor by his own act, accompanied with declarations that it is delivered for the use and benefit of the grantee, it has the same effect in the hands of the custodian, though a stranger, as if delivered to the party beneficially entitled. Eckman v. Eckman, 55 Pa. 269.

The act of a chattel mortgagor in placing the mortgage in the hands of a third person, not for the use and benefit of the mortgagee, but merely to have him place it on file for his own use, does not amount to a delivery. Miller v. Blinbury, 21 Wis. 676.

To uphold a delivery of a deed, there should be evidence, beyond delivery to a third person, of the intent of the grantor to part with his title and the control of the deed, and that such delivery is for the use of the grantee. Osborne v. Fallinger, 155 Ind. 351, 58 N. E. 439; Mitchell v. Ryan, 30 Ohio St. 287.

A delivery of a deed to a stranger having no authority to accept it, for the grantee, is a valid delivery, provided the grantee afterward accepts the deed; and such acceptance may be shown by implication. But to make a delivery to a stranger effectual, the intention with which the delivery is made must be expressed at the time. McElroy v. Hiner, 133 Ill. 156, 24 N. E. 435 (obiter).

A delivery to a third person does not authorize the presumption that it is done with the intention of passing the title. The facts and circumstances attending the transaction must be such as to show that the grantor intended that the deed should be delivered by the custodian to the grantee. Every such case must be determined by the intention of the grantor. Trask v. Trask, 90 Iowa, 318, 57 N. W. 841.

A bare delivery of a deed to a stranger without words of direction to deliver over to the grantee, either absolutely or conditionally, is merely void. Hannah v. Swarner, 8 Watts, 9, 34 Am. Dec. 442.

The mere leaving of a will in the custody of a third person without any instructions as to the delivery thereof to the grantee does not amount to a delivery to the latter. Thompson v. Lloyd, 49 Pa. 127.

But the authority of a notary, to whom a mortgage is delivered by the mortgagor without special directions, to deliver it to the mortgagee, will be presumed, where the mortgagor executed the instrument with the intention that it should be delivered. Adams v. Adams, 70 Iowa, 258, 80 N. W. 795.

And the fact that the delivery of a deed by the grantor to a stranger was "for and in behalf and to the use of him to whom the deed is made" may be shown by either actions or words which evince the intent of the grantor. Canning v. Pinkham, 1 N. H. 353.

A delivers a deed made to J. S. to J. D., though he does not say to the use of J. S., yet it is a good delivery of the deed to J. S. if he accepts it. Anonymous, 13 Viner, Abr. 23 K, pl. 12 a.

It is also established by the great weight of authority, though there are a few cases to the contrary, that the grantor must part with all dominion and control over the deed at the time of its delivery to the third person. Younge v. Guilbeau, 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262; McCalla v. Bane, 45 Fed. 828, Appeal dismissed 145 U. S. 646, 36 L. ed. 854, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 984; Elisbury v. Boykin, 65 Ala. 336; Porter v. Woodhouse, 59 Conn. 568, 18 L. R. A. 64, 22 Atl. 299; Arnegaard v. Arnegaard, 7 N. D. 475, 41 L. R. A. 258, 75 N. W. 797; Fitzpatrick v. Brigrman (Ala.) 80 So. 500; Crocker v. Lowenthal, 88 Ill. 579; Stinson v. Anderson, 96 Ill. 373; Shults v. Shults, 159 Ill. 854, 43 N. E. 800; Morris v. Candle, 178 Ill. 9, 44 L. R. A. 489, 52 N. E. 1036; Crabtree v. Crabtree, 159 Ill. 842, 42 N. E. 787; Latimer v. Latimer, 174 Ill. 418, 51 N. E. 548; Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 96, 45 N. E. 421; Shea v. Murphy, 164 Ill. 614, 45 N. E. 1021; Provart v. Harris, 150 Ill. 40, 36 N. E. 958; Bennett v. Waller, 23 Ill. 97; Merritt v. Temple, 155 Ind. 497, 58 N. E. 699; Goodpaster v. Leathers, 123 Ind. 121, 23 N. E. 1090; *Osborne v. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, says: "There are well considered cases holding that, even though the grantor delivers the deed to the depositary, reserving the right to recall it, yet if he dies without recalling it, and the deed is then delivered, such delivery is complete and entire, and carries title. We are not disposed to indorse that doctrine, and think the principle recognized in this case goes far enough for all proper purposes. The essential requisite to the validity of a deed transferred under circumstances as indicated in this case is that, when it is placed in the hands of the third party, it has passed beyond the control of the grantor for all time."

Placing a bill of sale of personal property in the hands of a third person to keep or hold it subject to the order of the depositor does not amount to a delivery, actual or constructive. Alsop v. Swathel, 7 Conn. 500. The court said that if it had been deposited with a third person for the use of the grantee, it would have amounted to a delivery.

If a deed is placed in the hands of a third person as the agent, servant, friend, or bailee 54 L. R. A.

of the grantor for safe keeping only, and not for delivery to the grantee; if the fact that the instrument is a deed is not made known to such third person, either at the time it is handed over, or at any time before the death of the grantor; if the name of the grantee, or other description of him, is not given; and if there is no evidence, beyond the mere fact of such delivery, of the intent of the grantor to part with his control over the instrument and his title to the land, such transfer of the mere possession of the instrument does not constitute a delivery, and the instrument falls for want of execution. Osborne v. Eslinger, 155 Ind. 351, 58 N. E. 439.

A deed delivered by the grantor to a third person "for safe keeping and delivery," with an express reservation of the right to withdraw it at any time before the grantor's death, and with directions to hold the same until after his death, and if not recalled in the meantime, to deliver it to the grantees after that event, will not operate to pass the title, although the grantor never attempted to exercise the power of withdrawal, and the deed was delivered to the grantee by the third person after his death. Brown v. Brown, 66 Me. 316.

Where the grantor places in the hands of a depositary a deed to be delivered to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, reserving the right or power to recall the deed at any time before his death, there is no delivery, and the deed passes no title to the premises. In such case the depositary is the agent of the grantor, and holds the deed subject to his direction and control. Ball v. Foreman, 37 Ohio St. 132.

One of the requisites of the delivery of a deed is the intention of the grantor, and of the person to whom it is delivered, that it shall presently become operative and effectual. Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 96, 48 N. E. 421; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416.

The deed must have been put into the hands of the third person under such circumstances as to make it the duty of the latter to refuse to surrender it to the grantor at his request. Osborne v. Eslinger, 155 Ind. 351, 58 N. E. 439; Cook v. Brown, 84 N. H. 460, Overruling Shed v. Shed, 8 N. H. 432; Mudd v. Dillon (Mo.) 65 S. W. 973.

The delivery of a deed to a stranger to be delivered to the grantee at the direction of the grantor, or with a reservation of the right in the grantor to countermand it, does not pass the title. Trask v. Trask, 90 Iowa, 318, 57 N. W. 841.

To give effect to a delivery to a third person when the assent of the grantee may be presumed from the beneficial nature of the conveyance, it must be placed beyond the control of the grantor, and not put into the hands of a third person merely to be delivered to the grantee, for then such third person is merely the agent of the grantor, who at any time before actual delivery to the grantee may recall it; but it must be delivered to such third person as agent of the grantee, and received by him in that capacity, and then, if the law will, from the beneficial nature of the conveyance, presume the assent of the grantee, the delivery is complete and the estate passes at once. Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 505.

Where a deed of gift is placed by the donor in the hands of a third person with instructions to hold it for him till he calls for it, there is no delivery, because there is lacking the essential ingredient to a delivery, to wit, the putting the deed out of the possession of the donor without retaining any power or authority to control it. Bailey v. Bailey, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 44.

To make a delivery to the third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death effectual, the grantor must divest himself of all power and dominion over the deed, and if he reserves the right to recall it, there is no valid delivery to the grantee, notwithstanding that after his death the third person places it on record. Prutman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 11 Am. Rep. 592. In this case, it appears that the grantor revoked the deed and requested that it might be returned to him to be destroyed, but the opinion is undoubtedly broad enough to cover the case where such a right of control was reserved, even if never exercised.

Depositing a deed with a third person for safe keeping is not sufficient. Roe v. Lovick, 43 N. C. (8 Ired. Eq.) 88; Morris v. Candie, 178 Ill. 9, 44 L. R. A. 489, 52 N. E. 1036; Barlow v. Hinton, 1 A. K. Marsh. 97; Guest v. Beeson, 2 Houst. (Del.) 246.

The grantor must do some act putting it beyond his power to revoke the deed. Duer v. James, 42 Md. 492; Hammerslough v. Cheatham, 84 Mo. 13.

A deposit of a conveyance with a third person, to be delivered after the grantor's death to the grantee, operates as a delivery of the instrument to the latter, if the grantor intended it as an absolute disposition of the property. Denzler v. Kleckhoff, 97 Iowa, 75, 86 N. W. 147.

Where a grantor parts with the control of the instrument, and places it in the possession of another, with the intent and for the purpose of making it effectual and a binding contract, the delivery will be regarded as binding and conclusive upon the grantor. Crocker v. Lowenthal, 83 Ill. 579.

To constitute a valid delivery of a deed, it must pass into the hands of the grantee, or someone for him, in such a way as to be beyond the legal control of the grantor. If merely placed in the hands of a third person to be by him delivered to the grantee, it is obvious that the grantor may, at any time before the deed is actually delivered, countermand the order and prevent its taking effect. Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 505.

In Prutman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 11 Am. Rep. 592, the court said that whether an instrument delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee was to be regarded as the deed of the grantor presently, or as an escrow, in either case the grantor must have divested himself of all power and dominion over it; in the first case, finally and forever, and in the second, until the time has passed for the performance of the condition, or the happening of the event, on which the second delivery is to be made.

An essential characteristic and indispensable feature of every delivery, whether absolute or conditional, is that there must be a parting with the possession and with the power and control over the deed by the grantor for the benefit of the grantee, at the time of the delivery. Williams v. Daubner, 103 Wis. 521, 79 N. W. 748.

A conditional delivery is, and can only be, made by placing the deed in the hands of a third person, to be kept by him until the happening of the event upon which the deed is to be delivered over by the third person to the grantee. But it is an essential characteristic, and an indispensable feature, of every delivery, whether absolute or conditional, that there must be a parting with the possession of the deed, and with all power and control over it, by the grantor, for the benefit of the grantee, at the time of the delivery. Porter v. Woodhouse, 59 Conn. 568, 13 L. R. A. 64, 22 Atl. 209.

Even in the case of an escrow, the grantor must part with all dominion and control over the deed until the expiration of the time for the performance of the condition, or the occurrence of the event upon which the delivery to the third person is made; and a deed deposited with a third person by the grantor to be delivered to the grantee upon the order of the grantor, is not an escrow, as it is deemed in law to be still in the possession of the grantor. Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 208.

A few cases have denied the necessity of the grantor's parting with all control and dominion over the deed, holding that notwithstanding the reservation by the grantor, at the time of the delivery to the third person, of a right to control or recall the deed, the delivery will nevertheless be effectual if such right is not exercised by the grantor during his lifetime; thus:

If a deed is delivered to a third person, to be by him kept, during the life of the grantor, subject to his order, and at his death, if not previously recalled, to be delivered over to the grantee, and the grantor dies without having recalled the deed, such delivery will become effectual, and the title of the grantee consummated, upon the death of the grantor. Woodward v. Camp, 22 Conn. 457.

In Belden v. Carter, 4 Day, 66, 4 Am. Dec. 185, it was held that where deeds were delivered to a third person with directions to "take these deeds and keep them; if I never call for them, deliver one to . . . [person named], and the other to . . . [person named], after my death; if I call for them, deliver them up to me;" and the grantor died without recalling the deeds,—the legal operation of the delivery was that they became the deeds of the grantor presently; that the third person held them as trustee for the grantees; that the title became consummated in the grantees upon the death of the grantor; and that the deeds took effect by relation, from the time of the first delivery. The court said that the reservation of the power to countermand the deed made no difference, for it was in the nature of a testamentary disposition, and was revocable by the grantor during his life, without any express reservation of power.

Lippold v. Lippold, 112 Iowa, 134, 83 N. W. 800, holds that where a grantor, with intent to make the deed operative as such so as to pass the title, but postponing the time of enjoyment, delivered a deed to a third person to be delivered on the grantor's death to the grantee, and it was so delivered, the grantor never having recalled it, there was a good delivery to the grantee, notwithstanding that the grantor had the power to recall the deed during his lifetime. It does not appear that there was an express reservation of such power. It is apparently the view of the court that such power is necessarily implied. It appeared in this case that the grantee knew of and assented to the deed before the grantor's death.

In Haydon v. Easter, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 597, 24 S. W. 626, where a deed was delivered to a third person to await the grantor's death, the grantor afterwards conveyed a part of the premises, but indicated an intention to give other land, or money in lieu thereof. The controversy was between the grantee in the first deed and the representatives of the grantor, so the question as to whether the second deed was good or not did not arise, but it is apparently assumed that it was good. The court, however, seems to take the view that the reservation of the power to recall, if not exercised, is not fatal to a delivery.

In Shed v. Shed, 3 N. H. 432, where one made an instrument purporting to convey to his sons certain lands, with a reservation of the use of the lands to himself during his life, and delivered the instrument to a third person to be delivered to the grantees, as his deed, after his decease, in case he should not otherwise direct; and the deed was accordingly delivered to the grantees after the grantor's death, he not having given other directions in the meantime.—It was held that the instrument was to be considered as the deed of the grantor from the first delivery; and that the conveyance might operate as a covenant by the grantor to stand seised of the land to his own use during life, remainder to the grantees in fee. It was urged in this case that the grantor having reserved a control over the ultimate disposition of the instrument, it could not be regarded as an escrow; but the court said that if he might legally deliver the writing absolutely to take effect upon his decease, there was no reason why he might not deliver it conditionally, as an escrow, to take effect upon his decease, in case he did not change his mind and revoke it. It was also urged against the validity of the instrument that it required a relation by a fiction of law to the first delivery, but the court held that such fiction might be indulged as against tenants claiming the land in opposition to the intention of the grantor. This case, however, has been overruled by Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460.

In Canning v. Pinkham, 1 N. H. 353, infra, II. b, 2, b, (1), also, it was held that the reservation of the power to recall was not fatal, if not exercised.

Where a deed is delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantees in case the grantor shall die without having made a will, the deed takes effect from the first delivery, if the grantor dies without making a will, whether it is viewed as an escrow or not. Ruggles v. Lawson, 13 Johns. 285, 7 Am. Dec. 375.

In Stephens v. Huss, 54 Pa. 26, the trial court, in answer to a request to charge that if the grantor retained the right of recalling the deed at pleasure there was no delivery, and it was therefore inoperative, said that the retention of such power, if not exercised, and if the deeds were delivered over to the grantees after his death, would not render them inoperative. The supreme court said that the answer was immaterial, since there was no evidence that the grantor retained the right to recall the deeds, but expressed the opinion that the answer was correct in any aspect of the case.

In Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Met. 412, 37 Am. Dec. 154, the court said it was not material to inquire what would have been the effect if the grantor, who had delivered a deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after his (the grantor's) death, had recovered from his sickness and taken back the deed, but expressed the opinion, as the estate did not effectually pass till the second delivery, if that second delivery had been prevented it would probably have been held that the deed was wholly inoperative.

Where a deed is delivered to one in trust for the grantee, to take effect at the grantor's death, unless he shall otherwise direct in his lifetime, and he dies without giving any further direction, the deed at his death takes effect as his deed on the first delivery. Morse v. Slason, 13 Vt. 296.

These cases, as is apparent from the citations previously made, are opposed to the great weight of authority on the point in question. The case of Shed v. Shed, 3 N. H. 432, was expressly overruled in Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460, which holds that, in order to make the delivery of a deed to a third person, to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death, effectual, the depository must have had such a dominion over the deed during the lifetime of the grantor as the latter could not interfere with; and that a delivery to a third person to be delivered to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, provided it is not previously recalled, is not sufficient, though the power to recall the deed is never exercised.

The question whether the grantor parted with all dominion and control over the deed at the time of the delivery to the third person is to be determined by reference to his intention, which is to be ascertained from the facts and circumstances attending the execution of the deed and its delivery to the third person. Alexander v. Alexander, 71 Ala. 295; Weber v. Christen, 121 Ill. 98, 11 N. E. 893; Shults v. Shults, 159 Ill. 654, 43 N. E. 800; Latimer v. Latimer, 174 Ill. 418, 51 N. E. 548; Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338; Trask v. Trask, 90 Iowa, 318, 57 N. W. 841; Davis v. Davis, 92 Iowa, 147, 60 N. W. 507; Jenkinson v. Brooks, 119 Mich. 108, 77 N. W. 640; Babbitt v. Bennett, 68 Minn. 260, 71 N. W. 22; Jones v. Swayze, 42 N. J. L. 279.

The important question in determining whether there has been a delivery is the intent of the grantor that the instrument shall pass out of his control and operate as a conveyance. The existence or nonexistence of this intent, however, must be determined from his acts, and not from some secret state of mind inconsistent with his conduct. This intention may be inferred from a variety of circumstances, but the circumstances must be such as to satisfactorily indicate the grantor's intention to presently part with the property and to put the deed within the control of the grantee. There may be a handing over of the instrument into the manual possession of the grantee without any delivery, and, on the other hand, there may be a delivery, although the actual physical custody of the instrument remains with the grantor. Babbitt v. Bennett, 68 Minn. 260, 71 N. W. 22.

The question as to the existence of such intent is one of fact. Babbitt v. Bennett, 68 Minn. 260, 71 N. W. 22; Jones v. Swayze, 42 N. J. L. 279; Dearmond v. Dearmond, 10 Ind. 191.

Delivery is to a great extent a matter of fact, depending upon intent, and the intent must be found from the circumstances of the transaction, the res gesta; and while some general principles may be, and are, laid down in regard to it to ascertain such intent, the intent must be found as a fact, and cannot always be determined as a matter of law. There are some cases in which the intent is so plainly indicated by the res gesta that but one conclusion can be deduced. Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 56 Am. Rep. 728, 4 Pac. 473, 8 Pac. 46.

In Vaughan v. Godman, 94 Ind. 191, the court held that a complaint by a father against his daughter to set aside a deed and quiet title was not demurrable, notwithstanding that it alleged the making and recording of a deed from him to the defendant, then an infant, without her knowledge, where it also alleged the ultimate fact that the deed was never delivered to her, but always retained by the plaintiff. The court said that the ultimate fact that there was no delivery was properly averred, thus clearly showing that the question of delivery, under such circumstances, is one of fact, and not one of law.

In Rogers v. Carey, 47 Mo. 232, 4 Am. Rep. 822, the court makes the direct statement that when the facts with reference to delivery are undisputed, their legal effect is a question of law. If the court intended to include as one of the undisputed facts the ultimate fact as to the grantor's intention, the statement is undoubtedly correct, but if, as seems to be the case, the court, by "undisputed facts," meant merely what was said or done by the grantor, and intended to lay down, as a general proposition, the rule that such "facts" being undisputed, the inference to be drawn from them with reference to the grantor's intention is a question of law, and not one of fact, the position is opposed to the great weight of authority. It will be observed that in many of the cases cited in the next subdivision, the ultimate question of the grantor's intention is regarded as a question of fact, or at least as a mixed question of law and fact—by which is meant, that the trier of the ultimate fact as to the grantor's intention is to be guided, in drawing the inference with reference to that intention from the admitted or established facts and circumstances, by certain general principles of law, but is to determine for himself whether the facts and circumstances, when ascertained, meet the requirements of those general principles, and is not absolutely bound, as he would be if the question were one of law only, to draw one predetermined inference from one state of facts, and another predetermined inference from another state of facts. It is true that the inference with reference to the grantor's intention that the trier draws from the subordinate facts in the case is subject to review, but the test to be applied on such review is that applied upon the review of an ordinary finding of fact, i. e., whether such inference is so unreasonable that the trier has no right to draw it. This test leaves open a wide field for the exercise of the judgment and discretion of the trier of the facts, even if all the subordinate facts and circumstances from which the ultimate inference as to intention must be drawn are undisputed. In this view, the only value, as precedents, of the cases in which the appellate court upholds the finding of the trial court on the question of delivery, lies in the fact that they present varying sets of circumstances which have been held to be sufficient, or insufficient as the case may be, to support the particular finding of fact upon the question of the grantor's intention. It does not necessarily follow that an exactly contrary finding upon the same evidence would not also have been sustained. If, however, the decision is that the finding of the trial court upon the ultimate question as to the grantor's intention is not justified by the subordinate facts and circumstances, it would seem to be entitled to the same force, as a precedent, as if the inference of intention from that particular state of facts were purely one of law, and would undoubtedly be conclusive if another case should arise presenting exactly the same facts and circumstances.

The law makes a stronger presumption in favor of the delivery of voluntary settlements than in cases of ordinary bargain and sale. Cline v. Jones, 111 Ill. 563; Winterbottom v. Pattison, 152 Ill. 334, 38 N. E. 1050; Miller v. Meers, 155 Ill. 284, 40 N. E. 577; Shults v. Shults, 159 Ill. 654, 43 N. E. 800; Latimer v. Latimer, 174 Ill. 418, 51 N. E. 548; Colee v. Colee, 122 Ind. 109, 23 N. E. 687; Crowder v. Searcy, 103 Mo. 97, 15 S. W. 346; Rumsey v. Otis, 133 Mo. 85, 34 S. W. 551.

Especially when made to infants. Winterbottom v. Pattison, 152 Ill. 334, 38 N. E. 1050; Miller v. Meers, 155 Ill. 284, 40 N. E. 577; Crowder v. Searcy, 103 Mo. 97, 15 S. W. 346. Or to wife, child, or near relative. Rumsey v. Otis, 133 Mo. 85, 34 S. W. 551.

The next case, however, seems to take exactly the contrary view.

The question of delivery of a deed is purely one of intention. With respect to the measure of proof required, a difference is recognized in the cases depending upon the character of the deed, whether it be voluntary, or made to give effect to a sale. In the former case the intention to part with the control of the deed is not presumed, and a delivery must be proved strictly. Jamison v. Craven, 4 Del. Ch. 311.

A delivery of a deed will be presumed from slight circumstances where there is proof of an intention on the part of the grantor to convey to the grantee. Crabtree v. Crabtree, 159 Ill. 342, 42 N. E. 787.

In determining the intention with which the grantor left the deed with a third person evidence of any declarations made, or conversations had, in relation to that subject by the grantor at that or any subsequent time is competent; but it is not competent for the depository to testify as to what he would have done if the deed had afterward been called for by the grantor. Dean v. Parker, 88 Cal. 283, 26 Pac. 91; Corker v. Corker, 95 Cal. 308, 80 Pac. 541.

Where the effect of a delivery of a deed made before the death of the grantor would be partially to revoke his will and change bequests therein, and, while leaving the will operative as to the grantees, would destroy a legacy to another heir, the son and appointed executor of the grantor, who would be left wholly unprovided for, the proof of delivery should be clear and explicit,—especially so where the legal effect of delivery would be to change the whole scheme of the grantor in the distribution of his estate. O'Neal v. Brown, 67 Ga. 707.

If the deed is delivered to the grantee, the natural presumption is that it is for his use, and no words are necessary. But if it is handed to a stranger, there is no such natural presumption; and hence, unless there is something besides the mere act of delivery to evidence the intent it is impossible to say that the grantor designed to part with his title. For the delivery may be by mistake, or for mere safe keeping, or for some other cause wholly independent of a purpose to transfer the estate. Mitchell v. Ryan, 3 Ohio St. 387.

Where the grantor delivers the deed to the wife of the grantee in his absence, with declarations to the effect that it is intended for his benefit, and without any intimation that it is to be retained by her for any purpose, it is presumed to have been delivered to the grantee. Craven v. Winter, 38 Iowa, 471.

a. Delivery without directions to await grantor's death.

(1) When held effective.

See also infra, II. b, 2, d.

The following cases present various combinations of circumstances which have been held either to require, or permit, a finding upholding a delivery made to a stranger without directions to await the grantor's death before delivering to the grantee.

A delivery of a mortgage from a daughter to her father is sufficiently shown where the mortgagor herself testifies that she handed the mortgage to her mother, who occupied rooms in her house with the father, and that she afterwards saw it in the bureau drawer in their room, and it further appears that it reached and was accepted by the mortgagee. Ray v. Hallenbeck, 42 Fed. 381 (decision of trial court).

A delivery of a grant of personal property to a third person, if unconditional, vests the title in the grantee, notwithstanding that the property remains in the grantor's hands until death, and that the deed remains with the third person. Those are circumstances which the jury may take into consideration in inquiring whether or not the delivery was unconditional. McCutchen v. McCutchen, 9 Fort. (Ala.) 650 (sustaining finding below).

Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. 557, makes the criterion of delivery, so far as it depends upon the acts of the grantor, his intention whether to place the deed in the hands of the third person merely as a convenient place of deposit, still intending to retain control over it and deliver it or not as he should subsequently think best, or to part with all dominion and control over it. The fact that at the time a deed from a grandfather to his infant granddaughter was placed in the hands of the latter's father the grantor instructed him to deliver the same to the grantee at his (the father's) pleasure, does not defeat the delivery (sustaining finding below).

In Miller v. Meers, 155 Ill. 284, 40 N. E. 577, the finding by the trial court of the delivery of a deed to the grantees was upheld under the following circumstances: One executed a voluntary deed to his nephews and nieces and handed the same to his partner, instructing the latter to take the deed and take care of it—whether for himself or the grantees he did not say. The partner placed it in a safe, used both for the firm papers and for the private papers of the partners. The grantor exercised no control over it for fifteen years. One of the circumstances which was considerably emphasized as indicating an intent on the part of the grantor to pass the title at the time of the delivery to his partner was that the deed was expressly made subject to a life lease of the property executed contemporaneously, and that such life lease expressly recognized the grantees in the deed as the owners of the property. The controversy in this case was between the grantees on one side and the trustees under the will of the grantor and the depositary of the deed on the other side. Some of the grantees were infants and some were adults (finding below reversed).

A good delivery to the grantees is shown where a father having previously expressed his obligations to his children because of their remaining with him and aiding him to pay for the land, in contemplation of a remarriage executed and acknowledged a deed of land to the children and placed it in the hands of a third person, with the declaration that he never wished to see it again, the deed on his death being delivered to the grantees and recorded. Crabtree v. Crabtree, 159 Ill. 842, 42 N. E. 787 (finding below reversed). In this case, it appeared that the grantees knew before the grantor's death of the execution of the deed, accepted it, and cultivated the land.

There is a good delivery to the wife, where a deed in which she is named as grantee is delivered to the husband, who pays for the property and procures the deed to be made out in her name. Pool v. Phillips, 167 Ill. 432, 47 N. E. 758 (apparently so held as a matter of law).

In Rodemeier v. Brown, 169 Ill. 347, 48 N. E. 468, a delivery was held to have been effected under the following circumstances: A father executed a deed to his son, containing certain conditions. The grantor retained possession of the deed, but the son went into possession of the property and performed the conditions of the deed, and the property was treated as belonging to him. Shortly before the grantor's death, he said to another son in the absence of the grantee: "I will give you charge of Frank's deed; in that drawer (pointing to the drawer) is Frank's deed; take it and give it to him." The drawer referred to was in a bureau in the room where the deceased was lying. The son assented, saying the deed was "now" in his charge, and that he would give it to his brother. He told his mother that the deed was in the drawer, belonged to his brother, and was in his charge, and directed her to keep 54 L. R. A.

it locked up, which she consented to do. The deed remained in the drawer until after the grantor's death, when it was delivered to the grantee, who placed it on record (sustaining finding below).

In Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 96, 48 N. E. 421, it was held that there was no delivery of a voluntary deed where the grantor during his last illness merely informed a third person that the deed was in a box in the adjoining room, and that the grantee, not the third person, could take it and record it (sustaining finding below).

A note and mortgage executed by a banker to replace a note and mortgage which had been left in his custody but had been misappropriated by an employee are sufficiently delivered where the banker hands them to an employee for record, informing the mortgagee thereof, and the latter assents to the arrangement, although they are not in fact recorded and are left in the bank vault until after an assignment for creditors by the mortgagor. Knapstein v. Tinnette, 156 Ill. 322, 40 N. E. 947, Affirming 57 Ill. App. 570 (sustaining finding below).

Where one brother sold land to another, executed a deed thereof, and delivered the same to his sister, there was a good delivery to the grantee, it appearing that the grantor received the purchase price from the latter, and that the latter entered into possession of the land and kept possession up to the time of his death, although the deed was never in his actual possession. McCormick v. McCormick, 71 Iowa, 379, 33 N. W. 648 (sustaining finding below).

The fact that the grantor, after delivery to the third person, expressed regret while on a trip to the place where the grantees resided, that he had not brought the deed along with him and given it to the grantees, does not tend to show that the delivery to the third person was not for their benefit, but rather that he regarded the transfer of the title to them as a fixed fact. 186d.

Sneathen v. Sneathen, 104 Mo. 201, 16 S. W. 497 (reversing finding below), held that there was a good delivery to the grantees where a grandfather executed deeds to his infant grandchildren, reserving a life estate, and delivered them to his wife with directions to give the same to the grantees as soon as she saw them, notwithstanding that they were not handed to the grantees until after the grantor's death, and that the grantees did not know of them until after that event.

Where a man who had for months considered the matter, and consulted with friends, declaring his intention to convey lands to his minor son, executed a deed and delivered it to a neighbor, saying to him: "You take that deed and file it for record," and on the latter's suggestion not to file it just then he responded: "You take that deed and keep it safely," without either adopting the suggestion that the recording should be postponed or intimating any change in his purpose, or any desire that the deed should be held subject to his order or control,—the delivery of the deed must be held to have been absolute at that time, and a subsequent filing for record, whether before or after the father's death, to be merely the consummation of the delivery to the son as of the date of the delivery to the neighbor in trust. Standiford v. Standiford, 97 Mo. 231, 3 L. R. A. 299, 10 S. W. 836 (reversing finding below).

Where one who had partitioned his estate among his children, in order to preserve certain of his grandchildren from want on account of their father's dissipation, voluntarily executed a deed to them, having frequently declared his intention to do so, and handed the same to a third person with money to record it, there was a good delivery of such deed, and the title passed to the grantees notwithstanding that there was a misdescription of the premises intended to be conveyed; and the first deed, on account of such mistake, having been returned to the grantor without being recorded, and a new deed executed to correct the mistake, it was held that the power conferred upon the third person to record the first deed attached to the corrected deed, nothing appearing to show that the grantor had changed his mind, and it appearing that the money which was given to the third person to record the first deed remained in his hands, and that he understood that he was to record the second deed and did so. Crowder v. Searcy, 103 Mo. 97, 15 S. W. 346 (reversing finding below).

In White v. Pollock, 117 Mo. 467, 22 S. W. 1077, the court upheld a declaration of law of the trial court, that if the grantor, after signing and acknowledging a deed from himself to his son, said to his wife, in the grantee's presence: "Here is Dannie's deed. I want you to take it and take care of it for him;" and if, in compliance with such request, the wife took charge and control of the deed at the time,—there was a delivery, and the title passed, by virtue of the deed, to the grantee. The court alluded to the fact that the declaration of law did not expressly require that the grantor shall have parted with all dominion and control over the deed, intending it to take effect and pass the title as a present transfer, but said that the trial court doubtless regarded the language used as conclusive of such intention on the part of the grantor, there being no qualifying facts.

In Frost v. Peacock, 4 Edw. Ch. 678, a deed was executed by a husband and wife, in consideration of the grantee, who was the wife's mother, releasing dower in the daughter's land. The deed was left in the possession of the daughter for the mother; and it was held that the deed must be allowed the same effect as between the grantors and grantee as if it had always been in the actual possession and keeping of the latter (sustaining finding below).

In Messelback v. Norman, 46 Hun, 414, which was an action upon a policy of insurance in which the defense was that the plaintiff had conveyed the property to her husband and children before the property was insured, it was held that a finding by the referee that there was no delivery of the deed was not justified, where it appeared that she took the deed to the county judge and requested him to have it recorded and paid him the fees therefor, and that the deed was duly recorded, notwithstanding her testimony that she thought the deed was a will; that she had been in possession of the property ever since; that she never told her children of the deed; that she thought by making the paper her children would have her property after her death; that she meant to have such a paper drawn.

A delivery of a deed is shown where it was delivered to an employee of the grantee during the latter's absence, it appearing that the employee placed it in the grantee's safe until the latter's return home, when he delivered it to him, and that the latter thereafter kept it in his possession and assumed the management, and obtained and continued in possession of the property conveyed, thereafter. Brown v. Danforth, 29 N. Y. S. R. 420, 9 N. Y. Supp. 19 (sustaining finding below).

There was a good delivery of a deed of gift where the donor handed it to a third person for the use of the donee without any reservation whatever, requesting him to take it to the court-house and have it recorded, notwithstanding that he failed to do so, and that the deed was not registered until after the donor's death. Phillips v. Houston, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 302 54 L. R. A.

(sustaining finding below). The statement that the grantor reserved no control over the deed seems to be a deduction from its delivery to the third person to be recorded. It appeared that such person returned the deed to the donor, who shortly thereafter gave it to another person with the request that it should be taken to the court and recorded. The latter retained the deed until the donor's death, after which it was proved and registered.

Doe ex dem. Garnons v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 671, 8 Dowl. & R. 348, held that the finding of the jury that the mortgagor parted with all power and control over the mortgage was justified by evidence that he put a parcel containing it into the possession of his sister, saying, "Here, Bess, keep this; it belongs to Mr. Garnons" (the mortgagee), notwithstanding that she returned the parcel to her brother a few days later when he asked for it, it being subsequently returned to her and retained by her until after the mortgagor's death.

(2) When held ineffective.

The following cases present various combinations of circumstances which have been held insufficient to uphold a delivery to a stranger, without directions to await the grantor's death before delivering to the grantee:

In Barrows v. Barrows, 138 Ill. 649, 28 N. E. 983, one, in anticipation of his marriage, executed a deed of a house and lot in fee to his intended wife, and left the deed with his attorney to be delivered to the grantee immediately after the marriage. Two days after the marriage the attorney called at the dwelling house where the grantor and grantee had established their residence, and handed the deed back to the grantor, who, after the attorney had gone away, handed it to his wife, saying that whatever might happen the house and lot would be hers. In order to obviate the objection that the homestead character had attached to the property before the wife had acquired title, it was urged that the title passed at the time of the delivery to the attorney, but this contention was denied by the court (sustaining the finding below) upon the ground that, so far as appeared, the attorney held the instrument merely as the agent of the grantor, and his possession was, in law, the possession of the grantor, and that the latter did not part with the instrument with the intention of relinquishing all dominion over it.

In Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456, 6 Am. Dec. 146 (sustaining the finding below), a delivery was denied under the following circumstances. A father executed a deed to his son, telling the magistrate before whom it was acknowledged that he wished to make some provision for his son, and requested the magistrate to take the deed to the register's office and get it recorded. The magistrate did so and informed the grantor thereof, who told him it was right and requested him to keep the deed until it was called for. The son died about a year afterwards, and the grantor then called upon the magistrate for the deed, which was given to him. It appeared that the son never knew of its execution. The court said that the facts testified to by the magistrate left no doubt of the intention of the grantor ultimately to pass the land to his son, but to keep the control over it until he should be more determined upon the subject; and that, whatever may have been his views, he retained an authority over the deed, and, having reclaimed and canceled it, the heirs of the son can claim no title under it.

In Bettinger v. VanAlstine, 79 Hun, 517, 29

N. Y. Supp. 904, it was held that the conclusion of law of the trial court that there was no delivery of deeds executed by a mother to her children was supported by findings of fact to the effect that the deeds were left with a third person in the absence of the grantees, without any intention on the grantor's part to convey a present irrevocable title to the grantees, and without any intention of depriving herself of the power to withdraw, or alter, the deeds at her pleasure. The action was by the grantor herself against the grantees to set aside the deeds. The finding of fact in this case, that the grantor did not intend to convey a present irrevocable title, was held to be justified by evidence that at the time she left the deeds with the third person she said that she might want to make a change, and was assured by the depository that she could change them if she desired, and that they should not go out of his hands.

b. Delivery with directions to await grantor's death.

(1) When held effective.

See also infra, II. b, 2, c.

The following cases present various combinations of circumstances which have been held either to require or permit a finding upholding a delivery made to a stranger with directions, express or implied, to await the grantor's death before delivering to the grantee:

Brown v. Brown, 1 Woodb. & M. 325, Fed. Cas. No. 1,994, held that where a father executes a deed to his son, and the latter executes to the former a life lease of the premises, and the two instruments are lodged with a third person in order that they may not be recorded or come to the notice of the grantor's prospective wife until after his death, there is a good delivery, notwithstanding that, such third person falling sick, the father takes the papers for safe keeping, and they are found among his papers at his death (original finding).

The testimony of a subscribing witness to a deed that immediately after its execution the grantor handed it to the mother of the grantees, who were infants and living with their mother, "and told her to keep it," is at least sufficient to carry the question of delivery to the jury. Gregory v. Walker, 38 Ala. 26.

Arrington v. Arrington, 122 Ala. 510, 26 So. 152, held that where a father executes deeds to his illegitimate children (infants) and delivers them to their mother in a sealed envelope, telling her to take the papers and if he dies first, to look after them for the children, and that if she dies first, he will look after them,—there is a good delivery to the grantees, and the title vests in them eo instante, if the delivery is unconditional, which is a question for the jury on the facts.

In Douglas v. West, 140 Ill. 456, 31 N. E. 403, one executed a deed to his grandchildren, reserving the use of the property during the life of himself and wife. He placed the deed in the hands of a friend, with whom it remained until after his death. He did not expressly instruct the custodian to deliver the deed to the grantees after his death, but it was manifest from the statements he made at the time that the delivery to her was for the grantees. It was held (reversing finding below) that there was a good delivery to the grantees, and that such delivery was not defeated by the fact that the wife of the grantor, after his death, obtained possession of the deed from the custodian and destroyed it.

N. E. 1050 (reversing finding below), a delivery was upheld under the following circumstances: A father, in accordance with his previously expressed intention, and during his last illness, executed a deed conveying a life estate to his daughter, and the remainder to her children. Some days afterward he called for the deed, speaking of it as his daughter's deed, and said to another daughter: "Put it away and give it to Mary [the grantee]; it is hers; I shall never want it any more; I would like to live a few years to see how Mary makes it on the old place, but Jake Williams' [the grantor] doom is sealed." The other daughter took the deed and put it away in a drawer in the grantor's house. She did not tell her father where she put it, and he never asked for it again, nor spoke of it again. She delivered it to the grantee after his death. The latter apparently did not know of the deed until it was handed to her. It was held that there was a good delivery.

The delivery of a deed to the husband of the grantee with the direction, "Give it to someone to keep while I live, then to be recorded,"—is a sufficient delivery. Squires v. Summers, 85 Ind. 252 (affirming finding below).

Where a father, shortly before his death, gave one of his sons a bundle of papers, among which was a sealed envelope containing deeds to his children, and directed him to deliver the deeds to the grantees after his death, which directions were carried out, there was a good delivery, it not appearing that any stranger acquired any right to, or interest in, or lien upon, the land between the dates of the first and second deliveries. Owen v. Williams, 114 Ind. 179, 15 N. E. 678 (sustaining finding below). The court said that the case was a proper one for the application of the doctrine of relation, and that under that doctrine the delivery of the deeds to the grantees after the grantor's death related back to the delivery thereof to the third person for their benefit, and the deeds took effect as of that date.

A delivery was held to have been shown in Hinson v. Bailey, 78 Iowa, 544, 35 N. E. 626 (sustaining finding below), under the following circumstances: A mother had made a will devising the land to her two daughters. Afterwards she concluded to revoke the will and deed the land to the daughters. She went with one of them to a justice of the peace, signed and acknowledged a deed before him, and left the deed in his custody with instructions to keep it until she had died and then to file it for record. The justice told her that she could have the deed whenever she should want it, but she replied: "I don't want it. You must keep it until I die." She told the daughter who accompanied her that she had deeded the land to her. It does not appear that the other daughter knew of the deed.

In Trask v. Trask, 90 Iowa, 318, 57 N. W. 841, a father made a will and also executed a deed of a farm to his son, the wife joining therein. He enclosed both papers in an envelope and delivered the same to the cashier of a bank. Subsequently a misunderstanding arose between the grantor and his wife with respect to the conveyance of the farm, the wife claiming that she had not intended to execute a deed for it. They arranged an amicable settlement, and, in order to remove any question, the envelope containing the deed and will were taken from the bank and the deed was reacquired, after which the will and deed were replaced in the same envelope and returned to the bank. At the time the envelope was first delivered to the cashier the grantor stated the contents thereof to the latter and told him they were for his son if anything happened to him

(the grantor). The court conceded that the fact that the will was placed in the same envelope as the deed militated somewhat against the existence of an intention by the grantor that the title of the property should pass to the son, but held (sustaining the finding below) that the force of that circumstance was overcome by the other circumstances, and that the deed was delivered to the bank as a conveyance in present, and took effect upon the death of the father by relation from the delivery to the cashier.

In Thatcher v. St. Andrew's Church, 87 Mich. 264, the court held (sustaining the finding below) that there was a valid delivery and acceptance of a deed of trust under a finding of fact that the grantor left the deed with the attorney who prepared it, with whom it remained until after her death, when he left it at the register's office for record, at the request of one of the trustees; that during the time between its execution and the grantor's death she remained in possession of the property, exercising exclusive control over the same and conveying a part of the premises to a third person; that she had no conversation with the trustees after the execution of the deed, and that only two of them were aware of its existence before her death, one of them having requested the attorney to retain the deed, as it would probably be safer in his hands than elsewhere; and a further finding that the grantor did or said nothing more in the way of delivering the deed, but that it was her intention to do whatever was necessary to make the deed valid and effectual, and that the delivery to the attorney was intended by her to give the deed effect as a valid instrument.

Haeg v. Haeg, 53 Minn. 83, 55 N. W. 1114, recognizes that it is essential that the deed shall have been placed in the control, custody, or possession of the third person, and sustains a finding of fact that the deeds in question were so placed, where it appeared that the grantor executed deeds dividing the land among his children, and that his friend, who signed them as a witness, went with him and assisted to place them in a box in a safety-deposit vault where he kept his papers, the grantor at that time requesting his friend to see that the deeds were delivered to the children at his death, and the latter promising to do so, such request being repeated just before the grantor's death. Soon after the grantor's decease, the friend went with the widow and took the deeds out of the vault, and delivered them to the grantees as arranged. The court said that it was clear that the arrangement was understood beforehand by all the parties, and that the box in which the deeds were deposited for safe keeping was to be accessible to the third person to enable him to carry out his agreement with the grantor and make final delivery to the grantees. The court also said it was unnecessary to consider what would have been the effect if the grantor had recovered from his sickness and finally taken back the deeds, inasmuch as he did not change his mind. This case seems to go even further than MUNBO V. BOWLES in upholding a delivery.

In Goodell v. Pierce, 2 Hill, 659 (denying new trial), the grantor executed a deed to his grandson, and handed it to the draftsman with instructions to retain it during the grantor's life, and, in case of his death, to deliver it to some person to keep for the grantee. The draftsman accordingly retained it until after the grantor's death, and then went before an officer for the purpose of proving its execution as a subscribing witness, and left it with the officer for the grantee. In an action by the heirs of the grantor against a remote purchaser under the 54 L. R. A.

grantee, it was held that the circumstances were sufficient to show the deed to have come to the hands of the latter in the mode intended by the grantor, and that it was effectual to transfer the title.

In Crain v. Wright, 114 N. Y. 307, 21 N. E. 401, the court said that the question of delivery of a deed from a mother to her daughter was a question for the jury, where the deed was given to the husband of the grantee, with a request that it should be kept secret during the life of the grantor, from all who were not obliged to know of its existence, it further appearing that the grantee was in the house when the deed was prepared and executed, and was present at a conversation shortly before when the grantor announced her intention to convey the property to her. The court said that, in the absence of proof of express disavowance, acceptance would be presumed from such facts.

There is a good delivery to the grantee where a husband executes and acknowledges a deed to his wife and delivers the same to a third person, with instructions to retain it for his wife until after his death, and then have it recorded, in the absence of anything to indicate an intention on the grantor's part not to make the conveyance effectual immediately. Diendorf v. Diendorf, 182 N. Y. 100, 30 N. E. 375 (sustaining finding below).

In Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 341, a delivery of deeds to a third person, to be delivered to the grantees after the grantor's death, or before if he should so direct, was deemed to be an irrevocable and complete delivery for the use of the grantees, so that the deeds took effect immediately, even as against the intervening rights of creditors accruing between the dates of the first and second deliveries, under the following circumstances: A father, while solvent, executed separate deeds to his three daughters of houses and lots owned by him. Two of the houses had been built for, and were occupied by, the daughters, to whom they were respectively conveyed. One of the deeds was delivered directly to the grantee at the time it was executed. After retaining it about a week, she returned it to the grantor, requesting him to keep it for her. The grantor placed that deed, with the other two deeds, in the hands of a third person, taking from the latter receipts therefor, stating that the deeds were received in escrow, and were to be delivered to the respective grantees upon the death of the grantor, or at such earlier period as should be designated by him. The grantees were each informed by the grantor that the deeds had been so deposited for them, and that they could have them whenever they wished. Subsequently, the grantor became insolvent and judgments were recovered against him, and he then procured the depository to deliver the deeds to the grantees. The court said that the statement in the receipts that the deeds were received in escrow was not controlling on the question.

Where one executed a deed to her daughters, and at the same time received from them a lease for the term of her natural life, and deposited both deed and lease with a third person with instructions to deliver the deed to the grantees in the event of her death, there was a valid delivery to the grantees as of the time of the delivery to the third person, notwithstanding that it was never actually delivered to them until after the grantor's death. Martin v. Flaherty, 13 Mont. 96, 19 L. R. A. 242, 32 Pac. 287 (sustaining finding below). In this case it appeared, in addition to the foregoing facts, that the grantor died some months after the delivery of the papers to the depository, without ever having called for them, or attempted, or expressed any desire, to regain possession of them, and that while the papers were with the depository, she spoke of the deed as "the girls' deed."

In Canning v. Pinkham, 1 N. H. 363, a delivery was upheld under the following circumstances: A grantor, desiring to make a final settlement of his estate among his children, executed a deed to them in their absence and made a formal delivery thereof to his brother. The deed was, however, immediately returned by the latter to the grantor's wife, who was requested to keep it safe. The deed, with other papers, was afterwards deposited with a third person, the grantor requesting him to keep the papers and informing him that as soon as he (the grantor) was gone, his wife would give instructions as to the disposition to be made of the papers. The deed was delivered by such third person to the grantees after the grantor's death. It is to be observed in this case that the reservation of the power to recall the deed was not deemed fatal to a delivery, if not exercised.

The delivery to a third person by the grantor, the grantees being present, of a deed bearing an indorsement to the effect that it is to be delivered to the grantee upon the order of the grantor, or at the death of the grantor, is a delivery in present to the grantee. Wright v. Werden, 7 Ohio N. P. 122. The question discussed was simply as to whether the grantor had surrendered all dominion and control over the deed, and it was held that he had, the only right retained by him with respect to it being to order its delivery before his death if he saw fit.

In Gelsinger's Estate, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 168, where the grantor declared in his will that he had deposited certain deeds with his son-in-law to be delivered to the grantees after his death, such declaration was accorded great weight upon the question whether the grantor deposited the deeds during his lifetime without the right to recall or revoke them, and it was held that he did so deposit them, notwithstanding that they were found in a box that belonged to him, which was in a bank vault, it appearing that the depository lived in the same family with the grantor, and that their business relations were very intimate.

(2) When held ineffective.

The following cases present various combinations of circumstances which have been held insufficient to uphold a delivery to a stranger with directions to await the grantor's death before delivering to the grantee.

In Harman v. Harman, 17 C. C. A. 479, 84 U. S. App. 816, 70 Fed. 894, it was held that no delivery of deeds was effected where they were placed in a sealed envelope with other papers of the grantor, and the envelope handed to one of the grantees as executor of the grantor's will, to be opened after his death, and the deeds to be then finally delivered to the proper parties, having been afterwards recalled by the grantor (so held as a matter of law upon the facts).

There was no effectual delivery of a deed to the grantee where the grantor delivered it to a third person upon the condition that he should not deliver it to the grantee until, or unless, the grantor should die from the illness from which he was then suffering, notwithstanding that such third person, in violation of the condition, delivered the deed to the grantee. Klose v. Hillenbrand, 88 Cal. 473, 26 Pac. 352 (sustaining finding below).

In Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 146, 57 Pac. 772 (reversing finding below), a husband and wife executed mutual deeds, and delivered them to a third person with the understanding that if the husband should die before the wife his deed to her should be recorded, and if she died first her deed to him should be recorded. The husband died first, and it was held that the delivery of his deed to the third person was not sufficient to pass the title to the wife. This was upon the ground that it was the intention of the parties that the party surviving should have back his or her deed, and that such reservation was fatal.

In Stinson v. Anderson, 96 Ill. 373 (sustaining finding below), a delivery was denied under the following circumstances: The grantor executed a deed to his minor children, and left the same with the magistrate, saying: "I want you to take it and take care of this deed for me. If I want it, I will call and get it; if I die, or anything serious should happen to me, I want you to deliver it to my children if of age." The grantor afterward mortgaged the land to secure borrowed money. The decision is upon the ground that the grantor did not part with all future control over the deed. The controversy was between the grantor's widow and the grantees. The opinion, however, refers to the execution of the mortgage as a withdrawal of the deed. How much force was accorded to the fact that the deed was drawn is not entirely clear, though it does not appear that the decision was controlled by that fact. The opinion concludes: "All the acts of the grantor are inconsistent with the theory that there had been an absolute delivery of the deed in escrow to take effect upon his death. It was under his control all the time."

No delivery of a deed from a husband to his wife is shown where the husband, when about to start on a journey, gave the deed to a son, in a sealed envelope, saying that it was a deed to his wife, and that if anything happened to him the son should give it to her and have it recorded right away. The son, after keeping it from four to six years, returned it to the grantor at the latter's request, and he retained it until his death, when it was found among his papers, in a box in which were also papers of the wife, but of which he alone kept the key. Fouts v. Bell, 172 Ill. 345, 50 N. E. 198 (sustaining finding below).

In Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 96, 48 N. E. 421 (sustaining finding below), it was held that the following circumstances did not show a delivery of a voluntary deed to the grantee: The grantor after inclosing the deed in an envelope, bearing the indorsement: "I hereby deliver the within deed to . . . [a named third person] and direct that in case of my death . . . [such third person] is to deliver said deed to . . . [the grantee]," placed it in a box in a safety deposit vault, handing one key to the grantee and one to the third person, stating to the latter that in case he, the grantor, should not come back, he should get the deed and deliver it to the grantee. The grantee kept the key delivered to him, but the third person returned his key to the grantor upon the latter's return from a journey. The grantor subsequently surrendered the box and took possession of its contents, including the deed, and placed them in a tin box in the room occupied by him, where they remained until his death.

In Jones v. Loveless, 99 Ind. 317, it was held that a cross complaint, in a proceeding by an administrator to subject certain real property to the debts of the intestate, showed conclusively that the intestate did not deliver a voluntary deed to his children, where it alleged that he placed the deed in the hands of a third person to be held by the latter for the grantees during the grantor's lifetime, and at his death to be delivered to the grantees therein. The decision is upon the ground that the facts alleged show that the intestate authorized the third person, as his agent, to do the things mentioned, and that upon the death of the intestate the authority of such third person was revoked and he ceased to be the intestate's agent for any purpose, and, therefore, could not, for the deceased grantor, deliver the deed. In this case the court also laid considerable stress upon the fact that between the time of the delivery to the third person and the death of the grantor he became insolvent, and held that, that being the case, the doctrine of relation should not be applied.

In Osborne v. Eslinger, 155 Ind. 351, 58 N. E. 439 (sustaining finding below), a delivery was denied under the following circumstances: A mother executed deeds to her children, inclosing them in an envelope indorsed "Deeds to children." She handed the deeds to an aged sister-in-law who made her home with her, saying that she desired the latter "to take care of the papers and keep them until after her . . . [the grantor's] death, and then deliver them to the one who should settle her estate." Subsequently, because of the advanced age of the custodian, the grantor took back the papers and put them in a "press" in her home, and told the former custodian that she had placed them there, adding: "In case I get sick, you take care of these papers, and when I die give them to the one who settles my estate." The grantor subsequently became ill and her sister-in-law took the papers from the "press" and deposited them in a box of her own over which she had exclusive control and so kept them until after the death of the grantor, the latter having been informed of the facts and having expressed her approval. The deeds were delivered to the grantees after the grantor's death. The sister-in-law did not know that the package intrusted to her contained the deeds until after the grantor's death, but did know the person whom the grantor had selected to settle her estate. It further appeared that the will of the grantor was delivered to her sister-in-law at the same time as the deeds. The decision is upon the ground that the grantor never parted with possession and control of the deeds any more than of the will before her death.

In O'Connor v. O'Connor, 100 Iowa, 476, 69 N. W. 676, a father executed a deed to his children and left it with the justice before whom it was acknowledged. The latter forwarded it to the recorder's office for record. The father claimed that he did not instruct the justice to do so, but the court said that it was probable that he did. Before the deed was recorded, it was taken from the recorder's office by the grantor, and kept by him until his wife surreptitiously obtained possession of it and delivered it to the grantees, who, in the meantime, did not know of its existence. It was held (reversing finding below) that there was no delivery by the grantor sufficient to render the deed operative. The court said that the most that could be said in favor of delivery was that the father intended a delivery of the deed, but that before it was accomplished he changed his mind, and that there was nothing in the transaction which prevented his doing so. If the court meant that the grantor in any case may change his mind before acceptance, such holding seems opposed to the entire theory upon which a delivery to a third person is upheld as a delivery to the grantee, since that theory requires, under any circumstances, whether the grantor has attempted to recall the deed or not, that he shall have parted with all dominion and control over the deed at the time of its delivery to the third person.

In Colyer v. Hyden, 94 Ky. 180, 21 S. W. 868, it was held (reversing finding below), that where a grantor handed a deed to his children to his wife, and told her to take care of it or put it away, there being no delivery to the grantees until after the grantor's death, there was no such delivery as to pass the title. The court said that it seems to have been the intention of the grantor to keep control over the instrument until fully determined whether ultimately to deliver it.

There is no delivery of bonds executed by a father in favor of his son where they are left with a third person with directions "to take care of them and deliver them to his son in case he dies without a will." Carey v. Danna, 13 Md. 19 (sustaining finding below).

In Hale v. Joslin, 134 Mass. 310, one executed a deed to his brother, and placed it in the hands of the magistrate who took the acknowledgment, saying: "I want you to take it and keep it as long as I live. Say nothing to Brother Calvin [the grantee] or anybody else about it, and when I am gone, give it to him." The deed remained in the magistrate's custody until the grantor's death. In the meantime, at the request of the grantor, he prepared a will for the latter, which purported to revoke all former writings whether in the shape of will, codicil, "deed," or otherwise, the grantor saying at the time that the word "deed" referred to the deed in the magistrate's custody, and that he meant to revoke and cancel it. The grantor also told the magistrate to hand the deed back to him (the grantor) sometime. The court held (original finding) that there was no delivery sufficient to vest the title in the grantee. It said that the grantor did not intend that the grantee should have any present interest in the deed, but intended to keep in himself the dominion and control of it; that it was in the hands of the magistrate as a depository for the grantor, and not as agent or trustee for the grantee; that the act was intended to be in the nature of a testamentary act which could be revoked at any time; and that as it was in fact revoked it was not necessary to consider what effect it would have had if there had been no revocation. This decision seems to be opposed to the doctrine that a delivery to the grantee may be effected by a delivery of the deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death. It does not appear, from the statement of facts, that there was any reservation of dominion and control over the deed, unless such reservation is necessarily implied from the circumstance that the deed is not to be delivered by the third person to the grantee until after the grantor's death. It may be, however, that the statement in the opinion that the grantor intended to keep in himself the dominion and control of the deed was based on the circumstances of the particular case, including the circumstance that the grantor did afterwards attempt to recall and revoke the deed. In a correct view, it would seem that the latter circumstance would be of no importance except as it bears upon the question of the original intention of the grantor, since, in order to make the delivery to the third person effectual as a delivery to the grantee, even in the absence of any attempt on the grantor's part to recall the deed, the grantor must have parted with all dominion and control over the deed.

In Taft v. Taft, 59 Mich. 185, 60 Am. Rep. 291, 26 N. W. 426, a delivery was denied under the following circumstances: A father, desiring to provide for his sons, executed a deed to them and placed it, together with a note to his daughter, in the hands of a third person to be delivered to the grantees after his death, on condition that they should sign the note. The court said that if the deed had been delivered to the third person irrevocably, on the simple condition that he should transfer it to the grantees on the death of the grantor, it might have been valid upon the authority of previous decisions in the state; but that in the case at bar the delivery was in escrow; and that while the fiction of relation back may be indulged in case of an unintended or unexpected occurrence of some disability, without which the second delivery would have been the act, at its date, of the grantor, yet where, by the very condition of the escrow, the second delivery is not to take effect until after the grantor's death, the fiction cannot be indulged, as it might be in case of the delivery to a third person to await the happening of some inevitable event, without any further condition.

Burk v. Sproat, 96 Mich. 404, 55 N. W. 985, sustained the finding of the trial court from the evidence that a deed which was handed by the grantor to a third person with a statement that he knew what to do with it was never delivered to the grantee, but was intended by the grantor as a testamentary disposition which could be revoked, where the grantor did in fact take back the deed and afterward stated that it was never delivered, and the depository, when called upon to give it back, did so at once and without question, and never made any claim to its possession until after the grantor's death. The court said it was evident, from the whole transaction, that the grantor and the depository both understood that, in order to constitute a delivery, it would be necessary to put the deed into the grantee's hands, and that the grantor, not intending to make a delivery, left it with the depository so that she could recall and revoke it at pleasure.

There is no delivery to the grantee where the grantor, in anticipation of a journey, hands a deed to a third person with directions not to deliver or record the same unless the grantor never returns,—meaning unless he dies. Wellsinger v. Cock, 87 Miss. 511, 7 So. 495, (so held as matter of law). The court said that the facts disclosed no act or purpose of a present delivery, absolute or conditional, but were entirely consistent with the control of the deed by the grantor during his life, and inconsistent with his parting with any power over it.

A voluntary conveyance delivered to a third person with instructions to deliver to the donee in case of the donor's death passes no vested interest; and if, after the danger of the donor's death is passed, the conveyance is put on record by one who wrongfully obtains possession of it, it is not thereby made effectual to pass title, there never having been any delivery. Boyle v. Boyle, 6 Mo. App. 594, Appx.

In Jacobs v. Alexander, 19 Barb. 243 (sustaining a finding below), a deed was held to be inoperative for want of delivery, under the following circumstances: A mother, while sick, prepared two deeds to be executed to her daughters and handed them to a third person with instructions to deliver them to the grantees after her death, but added: "If I recover from my present sickness, I intend to retain the right to control the property myself as long as I live." She recovered, and lived nearly five years. Soon after her recovery, she received back the deeds from the depository, and never delivered the deed in question to the grantee, but the latter obtained possession of it after her death.

There was no delivery of a deed executed by a father to his son where the deed was executed while the grantor was seriously ill and was handed by him to a third person, with the remark: "Take this deed and keep it. If I get well, I will call for it. If I don't, give it to Billy," the grantee,—notwithstanding that the grantor died a few days thereafter of the same illness, without ever having attempted to recall the deed, and that the same was handed to the grantee by the depository after the grantor's death. Williams v. Schatz, 42 Ohio St. 47 (sustaining finding below). The cases of Crooks v. Crooks, 34 Ohio St. 610, and Ball v. Foreman, 37 Ohio St. 132, are distinguished upon the ground that in these cases the grantors had parted absolutely with all dominion over the instruments, while in this case the grantor reserved the right to recall the deed if he recovered.

The delivery by a grantor to his own agent of a deed intended for one who had no knowledge that it was to be made, is not a valid delivery to the latter; and a delivery by the agent to the grantee after the grantor's death is invalid and ineffectual, although the agent was directed to keep the deed until after the grantor's death and then deliver it to the grantee. Peck v. Bepa, 7 Utah, 467, 13 L. B. A. 714, 27 Pac. 581. This is upon the ground that the grantor could have demanded and regained possession of the deed at any time during his lifetime.

Where one, believing herself on her death bed, executed a deed and delivered it to the scrivener, saying that if she recovered she wanted the deed back again, and that if not he should deliver the same to the grantees after her death, there was no valid delivery, although the grantor did not recover, and the deed remained in the hands of the depository up to the time of her death. Williams v. Daubner, 103 Wis. 521, 79 N. W. 748 (reversing finding below).

a. Deed remaining within physical power of grantor.

The position taken in Munro v. Bowles, that the fact that the deed, after its delivery to the third person, remained accessible to the grantor, and that it was within his physical power to have regained possession of it, is not, as a matter of law, fatal to a valid delivery, and that such fact has exhausted its force when, notwithstanding it, the ultimate fact has been found that the grantor intended to part with all dominion and control over the deed, has strong support in the five cases next cited.

The facts attending the delivery to a third person which may pass the title to the grantee are not required to be such as that it is beyond the mental power of the grantor to alter his intention, or that he has not the physical power to regain possession of the deed. The intention of the grantor is the polar star by which courts must be guided in determining the question. Trask v. Trask, 90 Iowa, 318, 57 N. W. 841.

Arnegard v. Arnegard, 7 N. D. 476, 41 L. B. A. 258, 75 N. W. 797, treats the question of the grantor's intent to part with all control over the deed as one of fact. It says that the trial judge found in favor of an actual delivery, and that his finding would not be disturbed unless clearly erroneous. In this case it appeared that after the grantor had delivered the deed to the cashier of a bank to be delivered to the grantee upon his (the grantor's) death, the latter called at the bank for some papers, but whether he called for the deed was not settled by the evidence. The deed, however, was handed to him with other papers, and remained in his possession until his death. The court said that it did not attach much importance to the circumstance. If the deed were once delivered to the third person for the benefit of the grantee, it was beyond the power of the grantor to divest the title of the grantee by regaining possession thereof, or even by destruction of the same.

497, while insisting that the grantor must have parted with all dominion over the deed, said that that requirement did not mean that he must put it out of his physical power to procure possession. It is sufficient that the deed is delivered to the third person for the grantees without reservation, and with the intent that it shall take effect and from that time operate as a transfer of the title. It was held that the fact that the wife placed the deeds in a trunk with the grantor's other papers, where he could repossess himself of them if he so desired, did not prevent a delivery.

In Ham'lon v. Armstrong, 120 Mo. 597, 25 S. W. 545, a delivery of deeds of gift to the husband of one of the grantees was upheld as a delivery to the grantees, notwithstanding that they were placed by the depository in a bureau drawer in the house where the grantor and one of the grantees (not the wife of the depository) resided, and remained there until after the grantor's death, it appearing that after the delivery to the depository the grantor expressed his satisfaction, and never indicated the slightest desire to recall the deeds.

Where a deed of a slave is signed and sealed, but not delivered, in the presence of a subscribing witness, and is afterward delivered to the wife of the grantor for the benefit of the grantee, the delivery is good, and inures to the benefit of the grantee. Gaskill v. King, 84 N. C. (12 Ired. L.) 211. In this case it was urged that the husband had legal dominion over the wife, and might have compelled her to give up the paper, and, therefore, it remained subject to his disposition. The court said: "He might, it is true, by superior strength and his authority over the person of the wife, have forcibly compelled her to part from the paper. But he could not have done so rightfully if he parted from the instrument as his deed for one instant: for he would have no more authority, legal or moral, to take from his wife a deed made by him to his son and in her custody for the son, than he would have to take a deed made by a third person and left with her by the donor or donee to keep for the donee. . . . In this case by the act of delivering the deed to the mother for her son, the husband expressed in the strongest manner he could that she might act on behalf and for the benefit of their child in taking and keeping the deed as the son's; and it became at once as operative as if it had been put into the hands of the infant himself, and could not be recalled."

Warranty deeds made by way of gift, which are in a box with money and bank books, are not delivered by the grantor, when expecting to die, by giving the box to another, and saying: "On the deeds are the names of the persons who are going to have the houses. . . . If I live, I will talk further about the contents of the box. But don't you open it until after my funeral." Porter v. Woodhouse, 59 Conn. 568, 18 L. R. A. 64, 22 Atl. 299. This decision was upon the ground that the grantor never intended to, and never did, part with the legal control over the deeds. The person to whom the box was handed in this case, pursuant to the directions of the grantor, put it back into the closet from which it had been taken, the grantor telling her where the key could be found. The circumstances in this case were somewhat like those in MUNRO V. BOWLES; but it will be observed that there is in this case an important feature that was not present in MUNRO V. BOWLES. In this case, the grantor not only kept the deeds within her physical control, but also expressed an intention to reserve the right to withdraw them if she saw fit. This 54 L. R. A.

element would be undoubtedly sufficient to distinguish the case, but it is questionable, in view of the language of the opinion, whether the result would not have been the same if it had been absent.

In Provart v. Harris, 150 Ill. 40, 36 N. E. 958, the grantor during his last illness called in a scrivener to draw five deeds, one to each of his sons, and a will. After the deeds were drawn and executed, the grantor was too weary to proceed with the will, and the scrivener departed with the intention of returning the next day. Before leaving, he asked the grantor if he should take the deeds, and the latter replied: "No, they are all right; just leave them alone." About the same time, the grantor remarked to his pastor, while the deeds were lying on the table: "I want to make the deeds out to my boys: if I don't get along, I want you to take the deeds and have them recorded; if I get along, I will do that myself." The grantor died shortly afterward, without having done or said anything further with reference to the deeds. It was held that there was no delivery. This was upon the ground that the grantor's dominion and control over the deeds at the time of his death was such that, had he lived, he could have revoked or destroyed them. It will be observed that in this case, also, the grantor not only retained the physical control of the deeds, but his declarations evinced an intention to reserve the right to dispose of them as he saw fit if he recovered.

In Fifer v. Rachels (Ind. App.) 62 N. E. 68, the trial court's finding of a delivery was reversed under the following circumstances: The grantor having previously expressed an intention to give the property to the grantees, executed a deed, and placed it, together with a will, in an envelope bearing an indorsement that the papers belonged to the grantor and were a special deposit and "subject to call or his order." He handed the envelope to his attorney, who took the same to a bank and left it there without any other directions in regard to its keeping or delivery than those appearing on the back of the envelope. The package remained in the bank, sealed, until the death of the grantor, and was then, by the officers of the bank, in such sealed condition, delivered to the person named as executor of the grantor's will. The decision is upon the ground that the package remained subject to the grantor's control.

In Mudd v. Dillon (Mo.) 65 S. W. 973, it was held that the trial court erred in refusing to declare, as the law, that there was no delivery of deeds from a father to son under the following circumstances: The grantor executed a deed to his son and one to his grandchildren, inclosed them, together with his will, in a sealed envelope, bearing his name, which he delivered to a third person with directions to probate the will and deliver the deeds at his death. Afterward he made another deed of other land to the son, and delivered it to the third person with the same instructions as before. It appeared that upon one occasion before his death the grantor asked the depository for "my" papers, and that he then destroyed the deed to his grandchildren and substituted another for it, and that before his death he disposed of part of the land described in one of the deeds to his son. It further appeared that the depository recognized the papers as belonging to the grantor.

Other cases in which the fact that the deed remained within the physical power of the grantor appears, but is not particularly emphasized, will be found in the three preceding subdivisions.

d. Effect of grantor's purpose to avoid his obligations.

See also infra, II. b, 3, b.

In Adams v. Adams, 21 Wall. 185, 22 L. ed. 504, it was held that there was a sufficient delivery of a deed of trust executed by a husband to a third party in favor of his wife, and purporting to convey an estate in present, where it was signed, sealed, and acknowledged by both husband and wife, recorded by him, and afterward spoken of by him to the wife and other persons as a provision that he had made for her and her children against accident, notwithstanding that the husband averred, in an answer to a bill to enforce the trust, that he never "delivered" the deed, and that he caused the deed to be made and partially executed so that upon short notice he could deliver it and make it effectual, retaining in the meantime the control of the title; and that the deed was never out of his possession except for the time necessary to have it recorded.

In Cannon v. Cannon, 26 N. J. Eq. 319, where the grantor himself sought to avoid the deed, the court held that there was no delivery, it appearing that the grantor, with the avowed object of escaping liability to be drafted for military service, executed deeds to infants, one of whom was his cousin and the other a distant relative of his wife, and left them in his house, telling his wife to be careful of them, but without giving her any instructions as to their disposition, or authority to deliver them. The court said there was nothing in the case showing an intention on the part of the grantor to transfer the title, or to deliver the deeds, except that he signed and acknowledged them, delivered them to his wife, with the charge to be careful of them, and then went away.

Where one to whom a husband has conveyed property in order to put it beyond the reach of his creditors executed a deed thereof to the wife, at the husband's request, and delivered it to the latter, thus evidencing his intent that the deed shall take effect from that time as a conveyance, there was a good delivery to the wife, although the deed was made without her knowledge, and was not delivered to her by the husband, but came into her possession some months afterward. Parker v. Parker, 56 Iowa, 111, 8 N. W. 806. This was an action by the husband against the wife to quiet the title.

In Tharp v. Jarrell, 66 Ind. 52, the complainants in an action to recover the possession of land claimed under a deed executed to them by their father while they were minors. The special finding of the jury was to the effect that after the deed was signed and acknowledged the grantor caused it to be recorded without at any time actually delivering the same to the grantees, and without their acceptance or knowledge that the deed was so signed and recorded, with the intention to hinder, delay, cheat, and defraud the grantor's creditors, and not to save the lands for the children. The court held that in the face of such special verdict the complainants had failed to establish their title.

e. Reservation of life estate as illustrating grantor's intent.

The deeds involved in Ball v. Foreman, 37 Ohio St. 132; Sneathen v. Sneathen, 104 Mo. 201, 16 S. W. 497, and Williams v. Latham, 113 Mo. 165, 20 S. W. 99, reserved a life estate in the grantor; and such reservation is accorded considerable weight as an indication of an intent to make a present transfer. In Colyer v. Hyden, 94 Ky. 150, 21 S. W. 868, the court said that it might be inferred from the fact of such reservation that he thought the immediate delivery would be of no service to the grantees, and his intention was clear that they should have the property at his death; and yet (the court said) the fact remains that he did not deliver it, or authorize its delivery.

3. Recording or delivery for record.

a. In general; presumption from record.

It is the purpose in this subdivision to treat of the effect of the act of the grantor in recording the deed, or delivering it for record, as a delivery, so far as delivery depends upon his acts. The question of acceptance by the grantee, when the deed is thus recorded or delivered for record, is treated in another subdivision.

The general rule undoubtedly is that a presumption of delivery arises from the fact that a deed has been recorded. With the presumption arising from the bare fact that the deed has been recorded, when it does not appear at whose instance it was done, or when it appears that it was at the instance of the grantee, this note is not concerned; but treats only of the question presented when it appears that the deed was recorded at the instance of the grantor. The weight of authority establishes that the record of a deed, even when it appears that it was at the instance of the grantor, raises a presumption of delivery, so far as delivery is dependent upon his acts. Bulkeley v. Buffington, 5 McLean, 457, Fed. Cas. No. 2,117; Younge v. Guilbeau, 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262; Lewis v. Watson, 98 Ala. 480, 22 L. R. A. 297, 13 So. 570; Ellis v. Clark, 39 Fla. 714, 23 So. 410; Gordon v. Trimmer, 91 Ga. 472, 18 S. E. 404; Allen v. Hughes, 106 Ga. 786, 32 S. E. 927; Walton v. Burton, 107 Ill. 54; Masterson v. Cheek, 23 Ill. 72; Bovee v. Hinde, 135 Ill. 140, 25 N. E. 694; Vaughan v. Godman, 103 Ind. 499, 3 N. E. 257; Colee v. Colee, 122 Ind. 109, 23 N. E. 687; Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 243; Bremmerman v. Jennings, 101 Ind. 253; Mallett v. Page, 8 Ind. 364; Hutton v. Smith, 88 Iowa, 238, 55 N. W. 326; Davis v. Davis, 92 Iowa, 147, 60 N. W. 507; Bunnell v. Bass, 85 Mo. 654, 55 Am. Rep. 392; Messelback v. Norman, 46 Hun. 414; Ford v. McCarthy, 61 N. Y. S. R. 363, 29 N. Y. Supp. 786; Helms v. Austin, 116 N. C. 751, 21 S. E. 556; Frank v. Heiner, 117 N. C. 79, 23 S. E. 42; Mitchell v. Ryan, 8 Ohio St. 387; Wright v. Werden, 7 Ohio N. P. 122; Davis v. Garrett, 91 Tenn. 147, 18 S. W. 113; Thomason v. Hays (Tenn. Ch. App.) 62 S. W. 336; Swiney v. Swiney, 14 Lea. 816; Thompson v. Jones, 1 Head, 576; Stevens v. Castel, 63 Mich. 111, 29 N. W. 828; Bjmerland v. Eley, 15 Wash. 101, 45 Pac. 730.

Notwithstanding that the grantor himself was the register of deeds. Fenton v. Miller, 94 Mich. 204, 53 N. W. 957.

The fact that a deed from father to son was recorded at the request of the grantor, and is produced upon the trial by the grantee, is sufficient proof of delivery. Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 515.

The delivery of a mortgage to the recorder and subsequent possession by the grantee are evidence of a delivery to him. Foster v. Per- kins, 42 Me. 168; Ornard v. Blake, 45 Me. 602; Kuh v. Garvin, 125 Mo. 547, 28 S. W. 847; Wallis v. Taylor, 87 Tex. 431, 3 S. W. 321; McCourt v. Myers, 8 Wis. 236.

The registration of a voluntary deed from a father to his infant sons, reserving a life estate, is sufficient proof of delivery, though there was no manual delivery to them, where they knew of its existence and registration, and, in a general way, of its contents, and were allowed to occupy and cultivate part of the land free of rent. Horn v. Broyles (Tenn. Ch. App.) 62 S. W. 297.

As a general proposition, the making of a voluntary conveyance absolute in form and beneficial in effect by a father or mother to one who is not sui juris, and placing it upon record, although possibly not effectual without more as a delivery and acceptance between adults, is deemed to evince an unmistakable intention on the part of the grantor to give the deed effect, and pass the title to the grantee, the assent of the latter, if nothing further appears, being presumed from the beneficial character of the transaction. Colee v. Colee, 122 Ind. 100, 23 N. E. 687.

Where a grantee has assumed to convey the property covered by the deed, it is not material that it was recorded by the grantor without his knowledge, and not manually delivered to him. Jackson v. Cleveland, 15 Mich. 94, 50 Am. Dec. 266.

The intentional delivery of a deed to the probate judge for registration, although the grantee may never be in actual possession of the instrument, is a sufficient delivery to the grantee although he was at the time ignorant of its existence. Sheffield Land, Iron & Coal Co. v. Neill, 87 Ala. 158, 6 So. 1.

The recording by a father of a deed to his infant sons, reserving a life estate, is as effectual a delivery to infants as can be made, and no stronger evidence can be had that the father intended to convey an estate in fee to the infant children; and the title in fee, subject to the life estate, passed at once to the grantees. Compton v. White, 86 Mich. 33, 48 N. W. 635.

The delivery of a deed by the grantor for the purpose of having it recorded may, under proper concurring circumstances, be regarded as a delivery to the grantee. Major v. Hill, 13 Mo. 250; Pearce v. Dansforth, 13 Mo. 860.

In Jones v. Swayze, 42 N. J. L. 279, where a chattel mortgage was left with a third person and filed in the clerk's office by the latter without the knowledge of the mortgagee, it was held that it was clear, upon the whole case, that the mortgage was filed for the benefit of the mortgagee, notwithstanding that there was no express instruction to the third person to deliver it to the mortgagee, or to file it.

A deed of gift executed by a father to his infant son and handed by him to a third person, with directions to carry it to the clerk to be recorded, the deed having been actually delivered to the clerk for that purpose, but not recorded, will be regarded as delivered, where the grantor, after withdrawing the deed from the clerk, caused a suit to be commenced in the name of the donees to recover part of the property. Inlow v. Com. 6 T. B. Mon. 75.

But the presumption is not conclusive. Young v. Guilbeau, 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262; Pennel v. Weyant, 2 Harr. (Del.) 501; Ellis v. Clark, 39 Fla. 714, 23 So. 410; Sullivan v. Eddy, 154 Ill. 199, 40 N. E. 482; Vaughan v. Godman, 54 Ind. 191; Hutton v. Smith, 88 Iowa, 238, 55 N. W. 326; Runnell v. Runnell, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 800, 64 S. W. 420; Stevens v. Castel, 63 Mich. 111, 29 N. W. 828; Metcalfe v. Bran- 54 L. R. A.

The registry of a deed by the grantor might, perhaps, in the absence of opposing evidence, justify a presumption of delivery; but such presumption is repelled where the registry was made without the knowledge or assent of the grantee, and the property it purported to convey always remained in the possession and under the control of the grantor. Young v. Guilbeau, 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262. In this case the controversy was between the heir of the grantor and one claiming through the grantee. The grantee testified that he never knew of the deed until after the death of the grantor, among whose papers it was found, and that he never claimed any interest in the property.

The mere act of recording a deed alone is but prima facie evidence of a delivery, and liable to be rebutted; and it is successfully rebutted when it is shown that the deed was not in the nature of a family settlement, or of a gift to a minor, but was intended to confer no benefit upon the grantee, and its execution and recording were wholly unknown to him until after the grantor's death. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 95 Ill. 267, 35 Am. Rep. 166.

When the grantee is sui juris, there is prima facie no presumption of acceptance from unauthorized acts of the grantor. When the deed is for his benefit, under certain circumstances, acceptance may be presumed, but not necessarily. Even in cases which treat the act of recording as prima facie evidence of a delivery, it is held that such evidence is successfully rebutted by showing that the conveyance was intended to confer no benefit upon the grantee. Sullivan v. Eddy, 154 Ill. 199, 40 N. E. 482.

b. Grantor's intent.

Recording, however, does not of itself constitute a delivery. It depends upon the grantor's intention. Humiston v. Preston, 66 Conn. 570, 34 Atl. 544; Moore v. Giles, 49 Conn. 570; Jamison v. Craven, 4 Del. Ch. 311; Mastersson v. Cheek, 23 Ill. 72; Weber v. Christen, 121 Ill. 98, 11 N. E. 893; Hutton v. Smith, 88 Iowa, 238, 55 N. W. 326; Berkshire Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sturgis, 13 Gray, 177; Glaze v. Three Rivers Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Mich. 349, 49 N. W. 310; Babbitt v. Bennett, 68 Minn. 260, 71 N. W. 22; Doorley v. O'Gorman, 6 App. Div. 591, 39 N. Y. Supp. 768; Hayes v. Davis, 18 N. H. 600; Thompson v. Jones, 1 Head, 576; Chess v. Chess, 1 Penn. & W. 32, 21 Am. Dec. 350.

Registration alone is insufficient without evidence showing that it was done with intent that it should operate as a delivery; but the intent may be implied from subsequent admissions or circumstances. Watson v. Ryan, 3 Tenn. Ch. 40.

Where one executes a deed to his brother, and files it for record, not, however, for the benefit of the latter, but with some vague purpose of having the land reconveyed after his (the grantor's) death to his wife and children, and the grantee knows nothing of the recording of the deed, or even of its existence, there is no delivery to him. Sullivan v. Eddy, 154 Ill. 199, 40 N. E. 482.

The fact that the grantor executed the deed and had it recorded does not amount to a delivery where it is proved as a fact that he never intended to make it his deed except under a contingency which never happened. Jones v. Bush, 4 Harr. (Del.) 1.

The registration of a deed by the grantor does not of itself operate as a delivery, nor does it supersede the necessity of proof of a delivery. Hawkes v. Pike, 105 Mass. 500, 7 Am. Rep.

654. In this case the grantor left the deed with the register to be recorded. The register had no authority from the grantee, who was absent, to receive or keep the deed for him, and did not undertake to act for, or to represent, him, and, after recording the deed, gave it back to the grantor at the latter's request. It was held that there was no delivery, apparently upon the ground that the grantor did not intend a delivery.

In Barnes v. Barnes, 161 Mass. 381, 37 N. E. 379, the delivery of a deed was held not to be shown, in a controversy between the grantor and the grantee, under the following circumstances: The plaintiff signed and sealed a deed to the defendant, and caused it to be recorded, intending at the time to pass the title to the defendant, but without doing or saying anything else to manifest that intention. He afterwards received the deed back from the recorder, and it was never in the possession of the defendant, or of anyone representing her, and, when requested by her counsel to surrender the deed, refused to do so. Before such request, but after he had received the deed back from the registry, he communicated its existence to the defendant, and spoke to her of the land described in it as hers, as he then supposed it was. The defendant assented, so far as she could, to the transaction. The ground of the decision is that there was no act or declaration on the part of the grantor manifesting his intention that the recording of the deed should be regarded as a delivery, the court holding that it was necessary that such intention be manifested by some act or declaration, other than the mere recording of the deed itself.

There was no delivery of a deed where it was left by the grantor in the hands of a lawyer with directions to have it recorded at the grantor's expense, but not to deliver it to anyone but the grantor, notwithstanding that, contrary to such direction, it was delivered to the grantee. Armstrong v. Armstrong, 19 N. J. Eq. 357.

In Beckett v. Heston, 49 N. J. Eq. 510, 23 Atl. 1014, where the grantor herself sought to set aside a deed to her son, the court held that there was no delivery, and that she was entitled to the relief sought, notwithstanding that, after having executed the deed in question, she left it with the conveyancer to have it recorded, and that it was recorded accordingly. It appeared in this case that after the deed was recorded it was sent to the grantor, and that, upon receiving it, she informed her son of its execution, but did not part with its possession or control at any time. The court said that when she sent the deed to be recorded it was not with the intention to have the registration operate as a delivery. This statement is clearly an inference of fact from the attending circumstances, including the circumstance that a declaration of trust was drawn up contemporaneously for execution by the grantee, who, however, refused to execute it.

In Rivard v. Walker, 30 Ill. 413, a father, in order to prevent his property from being squandered by his wife, made a deed of certain real estate to his children by a former marriage, and caused the deed to be recorded, but never delivered it to the grantees, or to any person for their use. The recorder testified that when the grantor called to pay the recording fee he told the witness not to deliver the deed to anyone but himself, except in the event of his death, when it was to be delivered to the grantees. His wife afterwards procured a divorce from him, and he brought a bill against the grantees to have the deed set aside as a cloud on the title, alleging, as a ground, that the deed had never been delivered, and that the motive for its delivery no longer existed. It was held that the delivery to the recorder, without any species of reservation, and the direction to the latter to record the deed, constituted an absolute delivery for the benefit of the infant grantees, and the fact that the grantor afterward manifested to the recorder an intent not to part with all control over the deed could not relieve him from the effect of such absolute delivery. In determining the intent of the grantor in delivering the deed for record, considerable importance was attached to the fact that it was only by a transfer of the title to the grantees that the grantor could accomplish his ostensible purpose of preventing his wife from squandering the property.

A good delivery of a mortgage to the mortgagee was effected where the mortgagor, a few hours before killing himself, took the mortgage to the proper office with directions to record the same at his expense, although the mortgagee resided in another state, and did not know of the mortgage or that such a mortgage was contemplated. Lee v. Fletcher, 46 Minn. 49, 12 L. R. A. 171, 48 N. W. 456. The mortgage was in part to secure an indebtedness, and in part a gift. The court held that the intent to put the mortgage beyond control was the criterion; and such intent was inferred from the circumstances above set forth.

The sending of a deed by the grantor to a stranger, or the deposit of it in the clerk's office for record, is not a delivery to the grantee, unless it is so sent or deposited for his use. Eisey v. Metcalf, 1 Denio, 326.

A delivery of a deed is not effected by the fact that the notary before whom it was acknowledged placed it on record by mistake, without the authority, knowledge, or consent of the grantor. Culmore v. Genove (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 83.

When a mortgagor sends the mortgage to the county clerk's office to be recorded, unless he leaves it with the clerk with such directions as would amount to a delivery to the mortgagee, he can at any time take back the mortgage from the clerk, and refuse to deliver it to the mortgagee, even without reason. Commercial Bank v. Reckless, 5 N. J. Eq. 430.

It seems that the fact that the grantor may have been prompted by a desire to put the property beyond the reach of his creditors is not necessarily fatal to a delivery.

In Moore v. Giles, 49 Conn. 570, an action by a father to remove, as a cloud upon his title, a deed executed by him to an infant and placed on record by him, the trial court found as a fact that the grantor, influenced by fear of a creditor, as well as by affection for the grantee, "with the intent and purpose of giving to the said . . . [grantee] his title to said land, . . . executed said deed and caused the same to be recorded." The appellate court held that such finding was determinative of the question of delivery, and that the proved facts that a month elapsed between the execution and delivery of the deed to the town clerk, that the grantor did not place it in the hands of the grantee, and that he retained possession of the land, of necessity exhausted their force upon the minds of the court below, and were not to be considered by the appellate court.

In Stevens v. Castel, 63 Mich. 111, 29 N. W. 528, it was held to be a question for the jury whether the presumption of delivery arising from the recording of deeds from a husband to a third person, and from the latter to the wife, was overcome by the fact that the husband had the deeds executed for the purpose of preventing his creditors from levying on the property; that the deeds were never out of his possession except while they were being recorded, and that at the time he left them for record he stated to the register that they did not amount to anything, and directed the latter not to deliver them to anyone but himself.

But the sending of a deed by the grantor to be recorded does not amount to a delivery where it was coupled with the direct declaration that it was made to prevent the land from being taken to pay an unjust debt. Barns v. Hatch, 3 N. H. 304, 14 Am. Dec. 369.

In Davis v. Davis, 92 Iowa, 147, 60 N. W. 507, the presumption of delivery which the law raises from the act of a husband in filing for record a deed from himself to his wife was held to have been overcome by the facts that the deed itself reserved in itself the agency and control of the land during his lifetime, that, at the time of its execution, he said he had already provided for his wife, and she need know nothing about the matter, and that she would deed the property back to him whenever he wanted it, and that he did not mean they should have any money "on this blackmailing scheme;" that the wife never knew of the deed until after the grantor had taken it from the recorder's office, and had conveyed the property to a third person, the breach of promise suit having been settled in the meantime, notwithstanding that the wife, upon learning of the deed, executed a written acceptance of it.

Where a father executes a voluntary deed to his minor children and has it recorded, and then takes it and keeps it in his possession, there is no delivery to the children, and no estoppel against the father to deny a delivery, where he did not do such acts for the purpose of giving effect to the deed, but to protect himself against a threatened claim for alimony. Koppelman v. Koppelman (Tex.) 57 S. W. 570.

In Elmore v. Marks, 89 Vt. 538, it was held that there was no delivery, where the grantor, without the knowledge of the grantee, took the deed to the clerk's office to be filed, and directed that it should not be recorded, but returned to him when called for. It was, however, recorded by mistake. The grantor subsequently took it away, and it was accidentally destroyed. The grantee did not know of the deed until after it was destroyed, and the grantor then informed him that it had been recorded by mistake. It further appeared that the grantor executed the deed to prevent his creditors from attaching the property.

Where a grantor, pursuant to the grantee's directions, delivers the deed to the auditor for record, the auditor, for the purposes of the delivery, becomes the grantee's agent, and the delivery to him (the auditor) gives the deed full force. Prignon v. Daussat, 4 Wash. 199, 29 Pac. 1046.

In Palmer v. Palmer, 62 Iowa, 204, 17 N. W. 463; Holliday v. White, 38 Tex. 447; Newton v. Emerson, 66 Tex. 147, 18 S. W. 348; Ingram v. Porter, 4 McCord, L. 193; Myrover v. French, 73 N. C. 609; Alrey v. Holmes, 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 142; Ellington v. Currie, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 21; Gorman v. Stanton, 5 Mo. App. 585, Appx.; and M'Neely v. Rucker, 6 Blackf. 301,—the language used is susceptible of an interpretation that the recording by the grantor amounts to, or is equivalent to, a delivery. It is probable, however, that the courts merely meant that it was sufficient in the absence of anything to overcome the presumption of delivery arising from it. It is somewhat more difficult to thus explain the language used in the following cases. If in these cases it is meant to assert that recording by the grantor is conclusive of a delivery so far as it depends upon his acts, they are opposed to the great weight of authority.

The recording of a deed at the instance of the grantor is of itself such a delivery as will enable the grantee to hold the property as against the grantor. Kerr v. Birnie, 25 Ark. 225.

The filing by the grantor of a deed duly signed and attested in the probate office for record constitutes a legal and efficacious delivery, completing the execution of the deed. Elston v. Comer, 108 Ala. 76, 19 So. 324.

Recording a deed is equivalent to a delivery. Levy v. Cox, 22 Fla. 546.

Where the grantor, in the presence of the grantee, hands the deed to the notary who took the acknowledgment, to send it to the county recorder for record, there is a good delivery to the grantee. Adams v. Ryan, 61 Iowa, 738, 17 N. W. 159.

Where a grantor signed and sealed a deed in the presence of witnesses, and it was afterward, at his instance, proved and registered, such facts are conclusive against the grantor, and those claiming under him, that there was a valid delivery, though the execution was in the absence of the grantee, and the instrument was never in his possession. Snider v. Lackenour, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 860, 38 Am. Dec. 683.

The act of the grantor in acknowledging a deed in the county court for the purpose of having it registered amounts to a delivery, making the deed operative as from that time. Doe es dew, Newlin v. Osborne, 49 N. C. (4 Jones, L.) 157, 67 Am. Dec. 269.

A deed is sufficiently delivered where the grantor delivers it, not as an escrow, to the witness for the purpose of recording it. Cloud v. Calhoun, 10 Rich. Eq. 358.

If a deed is made and delivered to the register for registry without more, there is no delivery; but if the grantor directs it to be recorded, or subsequently assents to it, such acts constitute the equivalent of an actual delivery and acceptance. McEwen v. Troost, 1 Sneed, 186.

c. Effect of return of deed to grantor.

The fact that after the deed was recorded it was returned to the grantor and retained by him is not necessarily fatal to a delivery. Lewis v. Watson, 98 Ala. 480, 22 L. B. A. 297, 13 So. 570; Allen v. Hughes, 106 Ga. 786, 32 S. E. 927; Cole v. Cole, 122 Ind. 109, 23 N. E. 687; Vaughan v. Godman, 103 Ind. 499, 3 N. E. 257; Bunnell v. Bunnell, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 800, 64 S. W. 420; Lay v. Lay (Ky.) 66 S. W. 371; Tobin v. Bass, 85 Mo. 654, 55 Am. Rep. 392; Helms v. Austin, 116 N. C. 751, 21 S. E. 556; Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Wheeler, 125 Ala. 538, 28 So. 38; Thompson v. Jones, 1 Head, 576; Dawson v. Dawson, Rice, Eq. 243; Folk v. Varn, 9 Rich. Eq. 303.

The question of delivery of a deed from a husband to his wife, recorded by him, is one of fact, where it appears that he got the deed back after it was recorded, and there is evidence tending to show that he retained it and never delivered it, and that she never knew of it during his lifetime, and denied claiming any interest in it. Hendricks v. Ransom, 53 Mich. 575, 19 N. W. 192.

In Weber v. Christen, 121 Ill. 98, 11 N. E. 893, however, it was held that the prima facie case made by the recording by the grantor, of a deed to his nephews, was overcome by the fact that he took the deed from the recorder's office and never parted with its custody or control, in connection with his declarations showing that the original intention was, not to part with the title, but to place the property beyond the reach of creditors.

There is no delivery where, after executing and having recorded a deed to her daughter, the grantor placed it in a box in her own house from which it was removed without her consent by her son-in-law, there being no arrangement between the grantor and her daughter that the deed should be delivered to the latter unless the former's husband should sign it. Hutton v. Smith, 88 Iowa, 238, 55 N. W. 326.

In Babbitt v. Bennett, 68 Minn. 200, 71 N. W. 22, a finding that there was no delivery of a deed executed by man and wife to the former's sister was held to be justified, notwithstanding that the husband had the deed recorded, where it appeared that he took the deed from the register's office, and ever afterward retained it until it was taken out of his possession surreptitiously by the grantee's husband, and that the grantee did not know of the deed until she was advised of its execution by a letter from her sister, and was willing to reconvey to the grantor, but her husband refused to join with her, and the testimony of the husband that the sole purpose of the deed was to enable him to control the title of the property free from any claim or interest on the part of his wife, it appearing that they anticipated securing a divorce.

There is no presumption of delivery arising from a deed itself, or the record thereof, where it appears that the deed was kept in a locked box in the grantor's house, and that it never came to the possession of the grantee until after the grantor's death. Jourdan v. Patterson, 102 Mich. 602, 61 N. W. 64.

Where a father executed a voluntary deed to his infant daughter, four years of age, and retained possession thereof for a number of years, and then placed the same on record without any agreement that the deed was to be considered as delivered, there was no delivery under N. D. Rev. Code, § 8320, providing that a deed shall be deemed constructively delivered, (1) when the instrument is by agreement of the parties at the time of the execution understood to be delivered, and under such circumstances that the grantee is entitled to an immediate delivery; (2) when it is delivered to a stranger for the benefit of a grantee, and his assent is shown, or may be presumed. McManus v. Commow (N. D.) 87 N. W. 8.

Registration of a deed is prima facie evidence of delivery, but is not conclusive and may be rebutted; and where it appears that it was understood by all parties that the deed was not to be delivered and was not to take effect until after the death of the grantor, and she kept it in her possession from the date of registration until it was filed as an exhibit to her answer in a cause concerning the property, there was no delivery. Thomason v. Hays (Tenn. Ch. App.) 62 S. W. 336.

In Alexander v. Alexander, 71 Ala. 285; Sheffield Land, Iron & Coal Co. v. Neill, 87 Ala. 158, 6 Mo. 1; and Fenton v. Miller, 94 Mich. 204, 53 N. W. 957,—a doubt is expressed as to whether the fact that the deed was returned to, and retained by, the grantor would overcome the presumption.

c. Acceptance: how and when deed takes effect; status of title.

1. Necessity of acceptance.

Acceptance, actual or constructive, is as essential to this method of delivery as to any other. Ferguson v. Miles, 8 Ill. 358, 44 Am. Dec. 702; Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. 557; Hullick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 159; Moore v. Flynn, 135 Ill. 74, 25 N. E. 844; Bullitt v. Taylor, 34 Miss. 741, 69 Am. Dec. 412; Metcalfe v. Brandon, 60 Miss. 685; Rogers v. Carey, 47 Mo. 232, 4 Am. Rep. 322; Fonda v. Sage, 46 Barb. 123; Church 54 L. R. A.

v. Gilman, 15 Wend. 656, 30 Am. Dec. 82; Gatther v. Gibson, 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 530.

Delivery by the grantor and acceptance by the grantee are essential to the validity of a deed; a deed takes effect only from its delivery, and there can be no delivery without acceptance, either express or implied, delivery and acceptance being necessarily simultaneous and correlative acts. Hullick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 159; Church v. Gilman, 15 Wend. 656, 30 Am. Dec. 82.

Dixon, Ch. J., in Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243, dissents from the view that the delivery and acceptance must occur at the same instant of time, and says that every case in which it has been adjudged that there may be a delivery to a stranger, and that subsequent ratification by the grantee will make the instrument effectual for the purposes intended, falsifies such notion, and proves that in every such case there may be, what there is in fact, a delivery by the grantor at one time to a third party, and an acceptance by the grantee from such third party at a subsequent and different time. Such is the common sense of the transaction; and it is better and more rationally disposed of without, than with, the aid of the fiction of relation back. But, he adds, if the fiction must be employed, it will not be allowed to operate when it infringes or violates the rights of strangers.

The act of registering a deed does not amount to a delivery of it where it does not appear that the grantee assented to, or even knew of, the deed. Alexander v. De Kermel, 81 Ky. 345; Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456, 6 Am. Dec. 146.

The filing of a deed for record by the recorder cannot be considered as a delivery unless it was filed in pursuance of a previous agreement. Deere v. Nelson, 73 Iowa, 186, 34 N. W. 809; O'Connor v. O'Connor, 100 Iowa, 476, 69 N. W. 676.

Without such prior agreement, a delivery of a chattel mortgage to the recorder will not vest any title until actual acceptance by the mortgagee. Day v. Griffith, 15 Iowa, 104; Cobb v. Chase, 54 Iowa, 253, 6 N. W. 300; Wadsworth v. Barlow, 68 Iowa, 599, 27 N. W. 775; National State Bank v. Morse, 73 Iowa, 174, 34 N. W. 803.

In Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Campbell, 93 Ill. 267, 35 Am. Rep. 166, a delivery was denied under the following circumstances: The owner of certain real estate, in anticipation of financial embarrassment and desiring to secure the property for the benefit of his family, asked a friend if he might convey the property to him, and the latter assented. Subsequently, the grantor executed a deed to such person, and after his (the grantor's) death it was found in the recorder's office, and it had been recorded, but it did not appear at whose instance. The grantee did not know of the deed until after the grantor's death, after which, at the request of the widow, he conveyed the property to her. The controversy arose between the grantor's heirs and the widow. The decision seems to be put upon the ground that there was no acceptance, but it would seem that it might have been equally well placed upon the ground that there was no intention of the grantor to part with his control over the deed.

In Hill v. Barlow, 6 Rob. (La.) 142, the court said that it was well settled in their jurisprudence that a mortgage executed and recorded by the mortgagor in the absence of the mortgagee has its legal effect, although not accepted by the mortgagee. It was accordingly held that the statute of limitations against an action to set aside such a mortgage began to run at the time the mortgage was recorded, and not at the time of its actual acceptance by the mortgagee.

2. What sufficient to show actual acceptance; effect of assent or dissent.

The recording of a mortgage by the mortgagor is prima facie evidence of a delivery; and the bringing of an action by the mortgagee to foreclose the mortgage is sufficient evidence of acceptance. Ford v. McCarthy, 61 N. Y. S. R. 363, 29 N. Y. Supp. 780.

In Kinney v. Wells, 50 Ill. App. 271, a deed containing a covenant by the grantee to pay a mortgage on the property was recorded without the grantee's knowledge. He afterwards learned of the deed, and subsequently conveyed the estate to another. It was held that by so doing he had ratified the deed, and was bound by the covenant.

There can be no delivery of a deed without a surrender of the instrument, or the right to retain it; but where a deed has been executed and recorded without the knowledge of the grantee, but subsequently, upon the request of the grantor, the grantee executes a reconveyance to a third party, there is such a recognition by both parties of the transfer of the title as constitutes sufficient evidence that the deed has been delivered. Gould v. Day, 94 U. S. 403, 24 L. ed. 232. The court said the question was not as to when the deed was delivered, but as to whether it was delivered at all.

The recording by the grantor, without the knowledge of the grantee, of a deed containing a clause assuming the payment of a mortgage, does not make the deed operative for any purpose, certainly not for the purpose of charging the grantee with the payment of the mortgage, where he dissents and refuses to accept the deed as soon as he learns of it; and the fact that at the request of the grantor he executes a reconveyance to the latter does not put him in the position of having accepted the deed so as thereby to become liable under the assumption clause. Best v. Brown, 25 Hun, 223.

If a grantor, with or without any previous arrangement with the grantee, signs, seals, and acknowledges a deed, places it in the hands of a register to be recorded, notifies the grantee of the act, and the latter assents to receive it, by words only, this would be a good delivery, though the grantee dies before taking it into his actual possession; because the assent is the principal element, and taking the deed into possession is not indispensable, but only evidence of assent and acceptance. Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 310, 11 Am. Rep. 67.

In Walton v. Burton, 107 Ill. 54, one brother, in pursuance of a previous request from another who resided in another state, executed a mortgage to the latter and had it recorded. The mortgagee, upon being notified of such fact, requested the mortgagor to obtain the mortgage from the recorder and hold it for him, which the latter did, the mortgage being subsequently lost before any manual delivery to the mortgagee. It was urged that the proof failed to show that the mortgage was accepted while it was in the hands of the recorder. The court said that, assuming that point to be material, record of the mortgage was prima facie evidence of its delivery, and that the burden of showing that the acceptance came after the recorder had parted with the deed rested on the party denying the delivery.

Where a deed is executed and delivered to even a stranger to be delivered to the grantee without condition, it is a sufficient delivery to pass title; but the execution of a deed, and having it placed on record without the knowledge of the grantee, are not a delivery, though in such a case the subsequent assent of the grantee will be sufficient. Ryars v. Spencer, 101 Ill. 429, 40 Am. Rep. 212. This is obiter, however, as in this case the grantee retained the deed himself.

The execution and recording of a deed by the grantor do not operate to pass the title to the grantee where the latter, upon learning of the deed, refuses to accept it. McClain v. French, 2 T. B. Mon. 148.

The act of the grantor in placing a voluntary deed to his son-in-law on record makes a prima facie case upon the question of delivery, but such prima facie case may be rebutted by showing that the grantee refused to accept. Bremmerman v. Jennings, 101 Ind. 253.

Any presumption of delivery and acceptance of a deed from a husband to his wife, arising from its registration by the former without the latter's knowledge, is overcome where the wife repudiated the deed as soon as she learned of it, preferring to retain her homestead rights in the property, rather than to take the risk of upholding the deed against the attack of the husband's creditors. Stallings v. Newton, 110 Ga. 875, 36 S. E. 227.

Where the grantee in a deed refused to accept it after it had been acknowledged and a certificate to that effect had been placed upon it by a competent officer, a delivery will not be presumed from its subsequent registration by the grantor, but the law will presume that the refusal continues, until it is rebutted by proof, either direct or inferential, of a subsequent acceptance. Galthier v. Gibson, 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 530.

The putting of a deed on record by the grantor is strong presumptive evidence of delivery, and where it confers a substantial right on the grantee acceptance on his part will ordinarily be inferred from very slight evidence; but these are mere presumptions of law, liable to be overthrown by direct negative proof. Metcalfe v. Brandon, 60 Miss. 685. In this case property was conveyed to a certain person subject to a parol trust for the benefit of the grantor's daughter. The grantee in that deed, having become financially involved, for the purpose of saving the property for the beneficiary intended by the original grantor executed a deed in fee simple to a third person, and had it recorded. The latter knew nothing of the deed for several years thereafter, and when she learned of it repudiated the trust. She never had the deed in her possession at any time, and as soon as it was recorded it was returned to the grantor pursuant to his directions. It was held, in a suit by such grantee against the beneficiary to recover the possession of the property, that there had been no delivery.

The delivery of a voluntary deed of trust for the benefit of the grantor's wife and child to a third person, to be proved and recorded, which was done, is a sufficient delivery, though the grantee refused to assent when he heard of it. Withers v. Jenkins, 6 S. C. N. S. 122.

Creditors, on whose behalf their debtors' attorney has, without authority from them, taken a mortgage for their benefit from the debtor, may ratify the mortgage by a subsequent assent, and may enforce it. Brown v. Platt, 8 Bosw. 324.

It is not necessary that a deed be delivered to the grantee in person; it may be delivered to any stranger for and in behalf and to the use of the grantee, although such stranger possesses no authority from the grantee; all that is incumbent on the latter, in order to perfect the delivery, is that he accept or assent to what has been done by the grantor before the latter revokes his intention to convey. Canning v. Pinkham, 1 N. H. 353.

In Davis v. Davis, 92 Iowa, 147, 60 N. W.

507, in which it was held that the grantor, by recording the deed, did not intend to pass the title to the grantee, but that his motive was simply to protect himself against a breach of promise suit, the court said, with reference to a written acceptance by the grantee after the grantor had conveyed the property to a third person, that acceptance, to be valid, must have been of the thing offered, of what the grantor intended to convey, and that, as in this case there was no intention by the deed to pass the title to the grantee, there was nothing to accept; that she could not affect the intention of her husband in the execution of the deed.

3. Different theories with respect to acceptance.

a. In general; their relation to the time when, and manner in which, the deed takes effect.

Indissolubly connected with the question of acceptance, are the questions as to the mode of operation of the deed, and as to the time when it takes effect. When the requisites on the part of the grantor, explained in I. b, 2, c, and d, supra, have been performed so as to create the conditions upon which an acceptance may operate, and the grantee has learned of, and either expressly or presumptively expressed his assent to it, all of the elements of a complete delivery are present, and the question of acceptance presents no further difficulty. When, however, the question as to the status of the title between the time of the delivery of the deed to the third person and the time the grantee learns of, and accepts it, arises, it is apparent that a difficulty is encountered. There are two theories with reference to acceptance, which, though not always clearly differentiated by the courts, seem entirely distinct. One is that the actual acceptance by the grantee, even if not made until after the grantor's death, relates back to the time of the delivery to the depositary. The other is that immediately upon the delivery to the depositary of a deed, wholly beneficial to the grantee, a presumption of acceptance arises, even if he does not know of the existence of the deed. When the question of delivery arises between the grantee or his privies, and the grantor, his widow, heirs, personal representatives, or others whose rights depend upon the question whether the grantor was seized of the property at the time of his death, it is not a matter of practical concern which view is adopted. If the actual acceptance does not take place until after the grantor's death, the first view by the fiction of relation back avoids the objection that the delivery was not completed during the grantor's lifetime. From a theoretical point of view, however, this view seems inadequate in one respect. As was shown in I. b, 2, c, and d, it is essential that the grantor shall have parted with all dominion and control over the deed at the time of the delivery to the third person, otherwise the delivery is ineffectual, although he may have died without ever having exercised his power to recall the deed. Under the theory of relation back of the acceptance, it is difficult to see how this requisite that the deed shall be placed beyond the dominion and control of the grantor at the time of its delivery to the third person, can exist in case the deed is a purely voluntary one, and the grantee does not learn of or accept it until after the grantor's death. What is there, under such theory, to deprive the grantor of his right to recall the deed? The mere fact that when he deposited it with the third person he intended to part with all dominion and control over it can scarcely bind him, or prevent him from changing his mind until the grantee, or someone for him, has either actually, or presumptively, accepted it. To say that the depositary holds the deed as the agent or the representative of the grantee, when the latter knows nothing about the transaction, is as difficult as to say that the grantee's acceptance is presumed. Possibly the depositary, by reason of the trouble to which he has been put by the grantor, and the embarrassment to which he might be subjected by surrendering the deed to the latter, would have a sufficient personal interest to resist the latter's demand for a return of the deed. But even in that case he might voluntarily surrender the deed; and the rule seems to require that it must have been put beyond the power of anyone but the grantee, himself, to surrender it to the grantor. The difficulty of reconciling the idea that the grantor parts with all dominion and control over the deed when he delivers it to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death, with the theory that the acceptance after the grantor's death relates back to the original delivery, seems to have been felt by the courts in Wellborn v. Weaver, 17 Ga. 267, 63 Am. Dec. 235; Gilmore v. Whitesides, Dud. Eq. 14, 31 Am. Dec. 563. This difficulty, however, instead of driving those courts to the adoption of the theory of presumed acceptance, drove them, as has already been shown, II. a, 2, supra, to the position that such a delivery cannot be upheld because the deed necessarily remains subject to the control of the grantor during his lifetime.

The theory of presumed acceptance had its origin in an opinion of Justice Ventris in the common pleas in the case of Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 198. In that case a tenant for life (remainder to his first son, remainder in tail to a third person), before the birth of his first son, sealed and delivered to the use of such third person (but in his absence and without his knowledge) a deed surrendering his estate to the latter. The grantor continued in possession until after the birth of his son. The grantee did not know of the deed until after the latter event, after which he agreed to the surrender. The question was whether the deed could be taken as a good and effectual surrender before the birth of the son. If so, it seems to have been conceded that it would be good as against the son, for in that case there would be no estate left in the father to support the contingent remainder to him. Pollexfen, Ch. J., Powell and Rokeby, were of the opinion that there was no surrender until such time as the grantee had notice of the deed of surrender and agreed to it, and, so, held that the remainder was vested in the son, and was not defeated by the grantee's assent to the surrender after the birth of the son. Ventris, J., however, was of a different opinion. After holding that the surrender could not be upheld as against the son upon the theory of relation back of the acceptance, after the birth of the son to the time of the sealing of the deed, he took the position that upon the sealing of the deed of surrender the estate immediately passed to the grantee, and that the remainder, therefore, could not vest in the afterborn son, there being no estate left in his father to support it. In support of this position, he said that a surrender was a particular sort of conveyance that worked by the common law, and that at the common law a conveyance immediately, upon its execution on the grantor's part, divests the estate out of him, and puts it in the party to whom the conveyance is made, though in his absence and without his notice, till some disagreement to such estate appears. In reply to the argument that an assent is necessary to the operation of a surrender, he said: "An assent is not only a circumstance, but 'tis essential to all conveyances; for they are contracts, actus contra actum, which necessarily suppose the assent of all parties. But this is not all to be compared with such collateral acts or circumstances that by the positive law are made the effectual parts of a conveyance, as attornment, livery, or the like, for the assent of the party that takes is implied in all conveyances, and this is by intendment of law, which is as strong as the expression of the party, till the contrary appears; stabit presumptio donec probetur in contrarium." He gives three reasons why a conveyance divests the estate out of the grantor before any express assent by, or notice to, the grantee: (1) Because there is a strong intendment of law for a man to take an estate that is for his benefit, and no man can be supposed to be unwilling to do that which is for his advantage; (2) because it would seem incongruous and absurd that when a conveyance is completely executed on the grantor's part, yet, notwithstanding, the estate should continue in him; (3) because the law will not suffer the operation of a conveyance to be in suspense. The judgment of the majority in this case was affirmed by the King's Bench, 3 Mod. 296, but was reversed by the House of Lords, Show. P. C. 150, for the reasons given in the argument of Justice Ventris. The reversal, however, was contrary to the opinions of all the judges except Ventris, Ch. J., and Atkins, Chief Baron. In the report of the case in 3 Lev. 284, it is said that Justice Ventris held that the estate vested immediately by the making of the deed of surrender, to be divested by the surrenderee's refusal to accept it afterward, but that until such refusal the estate was in the surrenderee.

The question as to the effect of a delivery of a deed to a third person, not previously authorized by the grantee to receive it, without the knowledge of the grantee, is discussed in Holcombe v. Richards, 38 Minn. 38, 35 N. W. 714. The court says: There is much conflict of opinion upon the question as to when the deed takes effect under such circumstances; some of the authorities adopt the rule announced in Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 198, that the deed takes effect and vests title the instant it is delivered to the third person, and that the subsequent rejection of it by the grantee reinvests the title in the grantor; some of the authorities, while admitting that an acceptance by the grantee is necessary, hold that such acceptance will be presumed from the beneficial nature of the grant, and that it is not a presumption of evidence that may be rebutted by merely showing that the grantee never in fact knew of the deed, but a presumption of law that cannot be overthrown except by affirmative proof that he did know of and reject it. On the other hand, many cases combat the doctrine that the deed takes effect immediately upon delivery to the third person, holding that an actual acceptance is essential to a delivery, and that the deed only takes effect as a grant from the date of such acceptance, until which the estate remains in the grantor, and is subject to his disposal; that while, when the deed is finally accepted, it may in some cases, in order to uphold it, be deemed, as between the parties, to have taken effect, by relation, as of the date of the first delivery, yet this can never be done where the rights of third parties have intervened.

As is shown by some of the cases hereafter cited, there are very serious, if not insuperable, objections to the adoption of the theory of presumed acceptance. It seems to the annotator, however, that it is the only theory that is reconcilable with the requirement that the grantor must, on the delivery of the deed to the third person, part with all dominion and control over it. Under this theory, the title immediately passes to the grantee, and for that reason the deed is beyond the grantor's recall.

b. Theory of relation back.

In the following cases the theory of relation back is expressly applied:

A deed can only take effect at and from its delivery, if at all, and consequently delivery and acceptance must be mutual and concurrent acts. Hence, proof of an acceptance subsequent to the delivery is not sufficient to give validity to the deed, and therefore, in such cases, judicial construction has sometimes been invoked to extend such subsequent acceptance by relation back to the date of delivery. Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 159.

Where a grantor deposits a deed with a third person to be delivered by him to the grantee at the death of the grantor, without reserving to himself any right to control or recall the instrument, and the same is afterwards delivered to the grantee, the title passes and the deed ordinarily takes effect by relation as of the date of the first delivery. Goodpastor v. Leathers, 128 Ind. 121, 23 N. E. 1090.

Where one executes and acknowledges a deed, and delivers it to a third person, with the request that he shall deliver it to the grantee after his (the grantor's) decease, which the third person does, the deed upon relation takes effect as at the time of the first delivery, and divests the estate of the grantor as from that time. Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Met. 412, 37 Am. Dec. 154.

A deed delivered by the grantor to any person in his lifetime, to be delivered to the grantee after his decease, is a good delivery upon the happening of the contingency, and relates back so as to divest the title of the grantor by relation from the first delivery. O'Kelly v. O'Kelly, 8 Met. 436.

Where a deed is delivered to a third person in the lifetime of the grantor to be delivered after his death to the grantee, it is a good delivery upon the happening of the contingency, and relates back so as to divest the title of the grantor by relation from the first delivery. Haag v. Haag, 53 Minn. 38, 55 N. W. 1114.

When a grantor delivers a deed to a third person without reserving any right to recall, or indicating any intention to reserve such right, there is a good delivery to the grantees, even if a third person was directed not to deliver it to the grantees until after the grantor's death. In such case the intention to pass title as a present transfer is evident. The third person immediately becomes a trustee for the grantees, and when she discharges the trust by delivering the deed to the grantees, such second delivery relates back to the time of the first and is a good delivery in the lifetime of the grantor. Williams v. Latham, 113 Mo. 165, 20 S. W. 99.

As between the parties to a deed beneficial to the grantee, it will be presumed to be delivered to the latter when the grantor has parted with it and all dominion over it, intending that it shall operate as a conveyance to the grantee, notwithstanding that the grantee has no knowledge of the transaction. The actual knowledge and acceptance of the deed will, as between the parties and their privies, relate back to the time of the act of the grantor, and the title will be in the grantee from that time. Fischer Leaf Co. v. Whipple, 51 Mo. App. 135.

Where a father executes a deed to his son, and places it in the hands of a third person with instructions to deliver it after the father's death but not before unless both parties call for it, and the deed is accordingly delivered after the father's death, the title of the son takes effect by relation from the time the deed is left with the third person; and a quitclaim deed executed by the son, intermediate the leaving of the deed with the third person and the father's death, though importing a mere conveyance of "the son's right of expectancy," passes his title. Tooley v. Dibble, 2 Ill. 641.

The legal effect of a delivery of a deed to a third person for the grantee is to divest the grantor of her title, and transfer it to the grantee by relation, as of the date of the delivery to such third person. Rousseau v. Bleau, 131 N. Y. 177, 30 N. E. 56.

A deed may be delivered by a grantor to a stranger to be delivered to the grantee after the death of the grantor, such second delivery relating back to the first delivery. Campbell v. Morgan, 68 Hun, 490, 22 N. Y. Supp. 1001.

Where one executes, acknowledges, and delivers to the county clerk for record and for the use of the grantee, a deed unconditional in terms, and without any condition annexed to its delivery, there is a good delivery to the grantee, and upon acceptance by the latter the deed takes effect from the time of the delivery to the clerk. Rathbun v. Rathbun, 6 Barb. 98.

Where the grantor, without reserving, or intending to reserve, any control over the deed, delivers it to a third person, to be by him delivered to the grantee at the death of the grantor, and the depository accepts the deed for the grantee, and delivers it to him at the death of the grantor, there is a good delivery, and the title passes by relation as of the date when the deed was delivered to the depository. Crooks v. Crooks, 34 Ohio St. 610; Bail v. Foreman, 37 Ohio St. 132.

Where a deed is delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death, and is so delivered by the third person, it takes effect by relation to the first delivery. Stephens v. Rhehart, 72 Pa. 434.

If the grantor delivers a deed to a third person with an absolute condition to hold it until his death and then deliver it to the grantee, the delivery from the third person to the grantee after the grantor's death relates back, as between the grantee and a purchaser from the heirs of the grantor, to the time of the delivery to the third person, and is equivalent to a delivery by the grantor directly to the grantee at that time. Gish v. Brown, 171 Pa. 479, 33 Atl. 60.

Where a grantee accepts and claims title under a deed acknowledged in open court by the grantor, such acceptance will relate back to the acknowledgment as against the heirs of the grantor or the state, seeking to have the land declared escheated upon the supposed failure of the heirs of the grantor. Com. v. Seiden, 5 Munf. 160.

When a mortgage is executed by the mortgagor and delivered to a third person, or the recording officer, for the mortgagee, and is subsequently adopted by the latter, it may be that such adoption will, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, relate back to the delivery to the third person or the recorder; but the principle does not apply where the mortgagee, upon learning of the mortgage, refuses to accept it. Foley v. Howard, 8 Iowa, 56.

c. Presumption of acceptance.

(1) In general.

See also Crain v. Wright, 114 N. Y. 307, 21 N. E. 401, and Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 341,—supra, II. b. 2, b (1).

While few, if any, of the authorities refuse altogether to indulge the presumption of acceptance by the grantee of a deed beneficial to, and imposing no burdens upon, him, delivered to a third person for his benefit, yet widely different views have been taken of the nature of the presumption and the circumstances under which it will be indulged. In one view, as shown, in II. c. 3, a, supra, the presumption obtains, even when the grantee does not know of the deed, and operates to complete the act of delivery so that the title vests immediately in the grantee, though subject to be divested out of him and reinvested in the grantor, if, upon learning of the deed, he refuses to accept it. In the other view, the presumption does not obtain, or is rebutted, if it appears that the grantee does not know of the deed. When the court merely states that acceptance will be presumed from the beneficial character of the deed, and it does not expressly appear that the grantee did not know of the deed, it is often difficult to determine which view of the presumption the court takes. It is probably safer, however, in such a case to attribute to it the second and narrower view. In the two cases next cited, it is clear that that view was taken.

In respect to a grantee who is not under legal disability, the rule is that when he is aware of the conveyance and does not dissent, and the conveyance is beneficial to him or her, acceptance will be presumed; but no such presumption will arise so long as the grantee is ignorant of the conveyance. Moore v. Flynn, 135 Ill. 74, 25 N. E. 844.

Ordinarily when a grantor makes a deed to a grantee which is plainly for the grantee's benefit, and puts it out of his control—loses dominion over it—by delivering it for record to the recorder of deeds, intending that it shall take immediate effect as a conveyance, there will arise, in the absence of intervening rights of third parties, a presumption of acceptance by the grantee. Such presumption may, however, be overcome by evidence showing no acceptance, and there is no room for the operation of presumption where the facts themselves are known. Brownlow v. Wollard, 61 Mo. App. 124.

Robinson v. Gould, 26 Iowa, 93, refrained from expressing an opinion whether the presumption could be indulged where it appeared that the grantee did not know of the deed, but held that it would, at least, be presumed in the first instance that he knew of and accepted the deed.

In the following cases in which it is stated generally that acceptance will be presumed from the beneficial nature of the deed, it is not clear which view the court took: DeLevilain v. Evans, 39 Cal. 120; Ferguson v. Miles, 8 Ill. 368, 44 Am. Dec. 702; Thompson v. Candor, 60 Ill. 244; Rivard v. Walker, 39 Ill. 413; Haenni v. Bleisch, 146 Ill. 262, 34 N. E. 153; Crabtree v. Crabtree, 159 Ill. 342, 42 N. E. 787; Ward v. Small, 90 Ky. 198, 13 S. W. 1070; Holmes v. McDonald, 119 Mich. 563, 78 N. W. 647; Wall v. Wall, 30 Miss. 91, 64 Am. Dec. 147; Rose v. Baker, 13 Barb. 233; Munoz v. Wilson, 111 N. Y. 303, 18 N. E. 855.

The first view of the presumption, i. e., that it obtains even when the grantee is not aware of the deed, is ably supported in Mitchell v. Ryan, 3 Ohio St. 387. In that case a father executed and recorded a deed to his infant daughter. The deed was returned to him from the recorder's office, and he subsequently undertook to convey the property to a third person by a warranty deed. The daughter died without ever having learned of the deed to her. It was nevertheless held, in a controversy between her husband and the grantee in a subsequent deed from the grantor, that there was a good delivery of the first deed, and that the title immediately passed to the daughter. The opinion carefully distinguishes between the two elements of delivery, viz., the acts on the grantor's part indicating an intention to pass the title, and acceptance by the grantee. After holding that the existence of the first element had been established, it takes up the question as to the effect of the want of actual acceptance, and holds that the presumption of acceptance supplies the want. In reply to the argument that the presumption of acceptance is merely a rule of evidence, and is rebutted when it appears that the grantee never had any knowledge of the conveyance, it is said that if the argument were limited to cases in which an acceptance of the grant would impose some obligation upon the grantee, it might be admitted, even if the obligation fell far short of the value of the grant; but that where the grant was a pure, unqualified gift, the true rule was that the presumption of acceptance can only be rebutted by proof of dissent; and it matters not that the grantee never knew of the conveyance, for, as his assent is presumed from its beneficial character, the presumption can be overthrown only by proof that he did know of and reject it. While the grantee in this case was an infant, the opinion does not limit the doctrine of presumed acceptance to infants, although it does, in support of the doctrine, argue that its adoption is essential in order to make a deed to an infant effectual. In reply to the argument that one cannot have an estate thrust upon him against his will, the opinion says that estates are every day thrust upon people by last will and testament.

So, also, Gibson, Ch. J., in Read v. Robinson, 6 Watts & S. 329, adopted the doctrine of Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 201, that a common-law conveyance put in the hands of a third person for transmission to the grantee takes effect the instant it is parted with, and vests the title, though the grantee is ignorant of the transaction; and that the rejection of such a grant has the effect of revesting the title in the grantor by a species of remitter. He said that the difficulty was to comprehend how the remitter can take effect without replacing intermediate interests springing from the rejected deed, but that the authorities conclusively prove that it may. He applied the doctrine to an assignment for creditors which the assignor handed to his son to deliver to a third person. The latter called with it on the assignee named therein, and desired him to take it, but he refused to have anything to do with it. Subsequently a new assignee was appointed by the court, and he brought an action of trover and conversion against the executor of the assignor. The opinion says that the ordinary power of a chancellor extends no further than the execution of a trust sufficiently formed to put the legal title out of the grantor, or the execution of an agreement for a trust founded on a valuable consideration, and that equity cannot execute the assignment as an agreement because the creditors are volunteers; but the right of the assignee to maintain the action was sustained under the doctrine already alluded to. The opinion says that, by the transmission of the deed for acceptance to the assignee, the title instantly passed at law, and the trust took effect, and that, having once taken effect, equity would see to it that it did not fall for want of a trustee.

The following cases also adopt the view that acceptance will be presumed, even when the grantee is ignorant of the deed:

A deed is sufficiently delivered to the vendee who has paid the purchase price, as between the vendor and vendee, where, in her absence, it is left with the attorney who drew it, for the purpose of registration, or where the vendor himself takes it for the purpose of having it registered, notwithstanding that it is never recorded. Burt v. Cassety, 12 Ala. 734. The court says that the grantee is presumed to assent to the deed as it is for her benefit.

When a deed is for the benefit of the grantee, imposing on him no burdens or duties, the presumption is of his acceptance. If it is duly acknowledged and recorded, the presumption of delivery attaches, which can be repelled only by evidence of the actual dissent of the grantee. Eisberry v. Boykin, 65 Ala. 336.

Arrington v. Arrington, 122 Ala. 510, 26 So. 152, admits that there is a conflict among the authorities upon the question whether when a deed is made to an adult without his knowledge and assent, and delivered to a stranger, the title passes at once as an effectual delivery; but says that the rule in Alabama is: "When a deed is for the benefit of the grantee, imposing on him no burdens or duties, the presumption of delivery attaches, which can be repelled only by evidence of the actual dissent of the grantee." This is obiter, as in this case the grantees were infants.

Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, which holds that the grantor, having delivered a deed to a third person with directions to deliver it to the grantee after his (the grantor's) death, at that time parting with all dominion and control over the deed (so found as a fact) could not recall it, said that the views of the courts are not uniform as to how and when the deed takes effect. Some hold that the title passes full and complete upon the first delivery, and that the depositary becomes the trustee of the grantee, and that the grantor holds a life estate in the property. Others hold that the deed becomes operative upon the delivery by the depositary after the death of the grantor, and that such delivery relates back to the first delivery. The court favored the former view.

When a deed beneficial to the grantee is made and placed on record by the grantor without the grantee's knowledge, the law presumes his assent, and the title will be deemed to have passed to him. Treadway v. Hamilton Mut. Ins. Co. 20 Conn. 71. In this case the deed was relied upon by an insurance company as falsifying a statement by the grantor, in an application for insurance on the property, that he was the owner of the same. The court says that the grantee ultimately assented to receive and hold the title to the property and reconvey it when the grantor should desire, the object being to put the property beyond the reach of the grantor's creditors. It does not appear whether such assent was before or after the application for the insurance was made.

It is essential to the validity of a deed that it should be delivered by the grantor and accepted by the grantee; but neither the presence of the latter, nor his previous authority to a third person to receive it on his behalf, nor his subsequent express assent to it, is necessary to make the delivery valid. When there is no such previous authority to receive, the law presumes his assent whenever the deed is beneficial to him, but his dissent may be proved. Moore v. Giles, 49 Conn. 570. The grantee in this case was an infant; but the decision does not seem to be limited to cases of infant grantees.

An actual delivery of a deed to a third person for the use and benefit of the grantee, and so declared to be, if intended by the grantor to take effect as a conveyance of the land presently, that is immediately, so as to divest his title, would be a sufficient delivery, inasmuch as the grantee is presumed to assent to that which is for his own benefit. But if the grantor did not mean or intend that the deed should take effect immediately, so as to divest the estate, but delivered it to such third person merely for safe custody and subject to his future control and disposition, there is no delivery. Doe ex dem. Guest v. Beeson, 2 Houst. (Del.) 246.

It is not indispensable that the delivery be made to the grantee, or even to any person authorized by the latter to accept the deed, for if the deed is made to a stranger, for and in behalf of the grantee and to his use, it is a good delivery, although the grantee may in truth be entirely ignorant of the conveyance, for if the delivery is absolute, the assent of the grantee is presumed from the fact that the conveyance is beneficial to him. In such case, however, the delivery must be unconditional and for the express purpose of vesting the title in the grantee. Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. 567.

A deed may operate by a presumed assent until a dissent appears, and then it becomes inoperative on the principle that a person cannot be made a grantee against his will and without his agreement. Dale v. Lincoln, 62 Ill. 22, citing 4 Kent, Com. 447.

In Dale v. Lincoln, 62 Ill. 22, where a husband, having enlisted in the army, executed a deed to his wife to enable her to dispose of the property in case he should not return from the service, and caused the same to be recorded, the court said the assent of the wife must be presumed in the absence of proof of her dissent, it appearing that though she never saw the deed until after his death, she knew that a deed was to be made to her, and the deed was found among the grantor's papers which he had left in her possession, and she had received rents of the property and authorized an agent to sell it for her.

Where one purchases land and procures the deed to be made out to his daughter, and receives it from the grantor, the latter intending to part with all dominion and control over the deed, the title immediately vests in the grantee, her acceptance being presumed from the beneficial nature of the transaction. Stewart v. Weed, 11 Ind. 92. The grantee in this case was apparently an adult. At least, she was a married woman at the time the deed was executed. It appeared in this case that the grantee and her husband took possession of and improved and cultivated the land, claiming the deed as their own. The court, however, seems to have been of the opinion that acceptance might be presumed from the beneficial nature of the transaction alone, citing Guard v. Bradley, 7 Ind. 600, to that effect. It will be observed, however, that in the latter case the grantee was an infant.

An acceptance of a deed may be inferred from circumstances; indeed, may be presumed from the beneficial character of the grant. Henry v. Anderson, 77 Ind. 361. In this case, however, the facts disclose an actual acceptance.

Where the grant is clearly beneficial to the grantee, his acceptance of it is to be presumed in the absence of proof to the contrary; and it has been held that this presumption is not overcome by anything short of the grantee's actual dissent. Wuester v. Folin, 60 Kan. 334, 56 Pac. 490.

When a deed to a wife and beneficial to her is delivered to her husband and accepted by him for her, the law will presume an acceptance by her because of the beneficial character of the deed, and because the husband occupies a relation to her that would authorize him to accept the deed for her. McGehee v. White, 31 Miss. 41. In this case, however, the acceptance by the husband was held ineffectual because he did not know of the nature and extent of the deed.

In Renfro v. Harrison, 10 Mo. 411, the trial court charged the jury that a deed relinquishing a life estate being beneficial, the law would presume that the grantees accepted it, although ignorant of it, unless a dissent was proved. The 54 L. R. A.

supreme court said that if it could be shown that the relinquishment of the life estate would, under all circumstances, be beneficial to the grantees, there would be no objection to the instruction, but it was held erroneous, because the deed was not certainly beneficial to them and might prove unbeneficial.

A delivery of a deed for record by the grantor will be deemed a delivery to the grantee, and will operate by a presumed assent until a dissent is shown. Eau Claire Lumber Co. v. Anderson, 13 Mo. App. 429. The question in this case arose between the grantee and the predecessor of the grantor in an action on the latter's covenant of warranty.

A deed may be effectually delivered to a third party for the use of him who is to take under it; and it takes effect from such delivery, without awaiting the subsequent delivery to the grantee, and without any agency whatever of his. Peavey v. Tilton, 18 N. H. 151, 45 Am. Dec. 365.

The court in this case expressly adopts the doctrine that the acceptance of a voluntary deed will be presumed until the contrary appears, although the grantee does not know of it. It was held that the objection to a deposition upon the ground that the witness was interested in the estate which was a party to the litigation was removed by a quitclaim deed of his interest in the estate, delivered by the witness to the plaintiff for his (witness's) mother, although she did not know of the deed.

If a grantor executes and acknowledges a deed, and delivers it to the register to be recorded, intending thereby to part with his dominion over it, and that the title and the deed shall pass to the grantees, and the grantees assent, there is a sufficient delivery. Boody v. Davis, 20 N. H. 140, 51 Am. Dec. 210. The court said that the deed was delivered to the register for the benefit of the grantees, and that their assent to it, which was a legal presumption at that moment, had been established as a fact by their subsequent acts.

Delivery of a deed to a third person for the grantee, if the grantor parts with all control over it, makes it effectual from the instant of such delivery, even though the grantee is ignorant of its existence, for the law will presume, if nothing appears to the contrary, that a man will accept what is for his benefit. Vreeland v. Vreeland, 48 N. J. Eq. 56, 21 Atl. 627.

The court in Jones v. Swayze, 42 N. J. L. 279, said that in the English law, when a deed is delivered to a third person for the benefit of the grantee, even if the latter does not know thereof, there is a presumption of acceptance until it is rebutted by proof of refusal to accept, but that in this country there is some diversity of view upon the question whether the delivery takes effect until an actual acceptance by the grantee. The cases of Church v. Gilman, 15 Wend. 856, 30 Am. Dec. 82; Ernst v. Reed, 49 Barb. 367; and Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 342,—are cited as authority for the position adopted by the court that the deed takes effect immediately on the delivery to the third person, the assent of the grantee being presumed from the fact that the deed is beneficial to him.

Lady Superior of Cong. Nunnery v. McNamara, 3 Barb. Ch. 375, 49 Am. Dec. 184, adopts the doctrine that a delivery of a deed to a stranger for the grantee, without any special authority from the latter to receive it, is valid from the time of the original delivery, the grantee's assent being presumed from the beneficial character of the deed, unless a dissent is proved, although he may not know of the deed.

Where a deed is delivered to a third person absolutely, for the grantee, the grantor not reserving any future control over it, the estate passes, the assent of the grantee to accept the conveyance being presumed from the fact that the conveyance is beneficial to him. Church v. Gilman, 15 Wend. 656, 30 Am. Dec. 82. In this case, however, as was said in the opinion, it was not necessary to presume assent, for it appeared that the deed was drawn by the grantee's agent and executed at his solicitation, and delivered to a third person to be transmitted to the grantee.

Where a deed is plainly beneficial to the grantee, accompanied by no trust imposed on him, his acceptance is to be presumed until dissent is shown. Messelback v. Norman, 46 Hun. 414. In this case the grantor testified that she did not inform the grantees of the deed, and it does not appear that they knew of it at the time the question as to delivery arose. The court says, however, in this connection that they may have known of the deed, although the grantor did not tell them of it.

There may be cases where a deed of property delivered to a third person for the grantee is so far encumbered with trusts or other obligations that the grantee would be injured by the transfer, and in such case there would be no presumption of his acceptance; but where the transfer is free from such conditions, and is manifestly in the interest of the grantee, something more than a mere lack of knowledge of the transfer on his part is necessary to overcome the presumption. National Bank v. Bonnell, 46 App. Div. 302, 61 N. Y. Supp. 521. So far as appears, the grantee in this case was an adult: at least, the statement with reference to presumption of acceptance, even when the grantee is ignorant of the existence of the deed, is not limited to deeds to infants.

A deed may be delivered to a stranger for the use of the grantee, or bargainee, and, as it may be to his advantage, his acceptance of it will be presumed until the contrary appears; but as it may also be to his prejudice, or whether to his prejudice or not, he is not bound to accept it; he may disagree to it and then it will become inoperative. Baxter v. Baxter, 44 N. C. (Busbee, L.) 341. This statement is clearly made upon the assumption that the grantee does not know of the deed.

The delivery of a deed is in fact its tradition from the maker to the person to whom it is made, or to some person for his use, and if the person receiving it for another is authorized to do so, it is not only immediately the maker's deed, but it cannot be rejected by the grantee. If he has not authorized the person to receive it, yet it is the maker's deed, until he for whose benefit it is made rejects it; it does not wait for the acceptance of this person before it becomes a deed, for his acceptance is presumed until the contrary is shown. It being for his interest, the presumption is, not that he will accept, but that he does accept. Kirk v. Turner, 16 N. C. (1 Dev. Eq.) 14.

When one delivers a deed to a third person in the absence of the grantee, the latter is presumed to accept it, so that it forthwith becomes a deed, and the legal effect is to pass the property. This presumption may, of course, be rebutted by proving that the party refused to accept it; but, until he refuses, his assent is presumed, for the purpose of giving effect to the instrument as a deed; ut res magis valeat, quam pereat. McLean v. Nelson, 46 N. C. (1 Jones, L.) 396. In this case it was urged that the presumption did not apply because the grantee, by the terms of the deed, was merely a trustee, and had no beneficial interest, but, on the contrary, was to be burdened with a trust. The court refrained from expressing an opinion upon the question whether the presumption rests upon the ground of a personal benefit to the grantee, or upon the maxim, Ut res valeat, but said in either view the presumption could be given effect as the action was in a court of law, and such a court does not take notice of a trust.

As between the parties a deed will take effect from its delivery by the grantor to the town clerk for record, without a previous contract, or even the knowledge of the grantee. Merrill v. Meachum, 5 Day, 346. This decision is upon the ground that though it is necessary to give a deed validity that the grantee shall assent to it, yet the law will presume assent until the contrary appears.

In Smith v. Bank of Washington, 5 Serg. & R. 318, it was held that a stockholder of a bank made himself a competent witness for the bank by executing a transfer of his stock to his daughter without her knowledge, and delivering it to a third person for her use. Gibson, J., said that, the grant being beneficial to her, her assent would be presumed. It does not appear that the daughter was an infant.

Acceptance by the grantee of a deed of gift recorded at the instance of the grantor will be presumed from the beneficial character of the deed. Boardman v. Dean, 34 Pa. 252 (editor).

When a conveyance is made to any person, his assent to it is presumed because there is a strong intendment of law that it is for his benefit to take, and no one can be supposed to be unwilling to do that which is for his advantage; and because it would seem incongruous and absurd that when a conveyance is completely executed on the part of the grantor the estate should continue in him; and because it is contrary to the policy of the law to permit a freehold to remain in suspense and uncertainty. Dikes v. Miller, 24 Tex. 417.

No person can be made a grantee against his will; but a deed may operate by a presumed assent, until a dissent or disclaimer appears. Ibid.

A delivery always implies an acceptance by the person to whom the delivery is made; and although where a deed, or mortgage, or an instrument purporting to be such, is properly acknowledged and recorded, the presumption is that it has been duly delivered to the grantee or mortgagee, and that it is, in legal effect, what by the record it purports to be, yet such presumption is only prima facie, and may be rebutted by parol or other evidence, and shown never to have been delivered. Wilsey v. Dennis, 44 Barb. 359.

When a grantor causes an acknowledged deed, conferring substantial benefits on the grantee, to be recorded, there can be no doubt that it will afford prima facie evidence, and even strong presumptive evidence, of a delivery to and acceptance by the grantee; but such presumption can be overcome by evidence that no delivery in fact was intended, and none made. Ellis v. Clark, 39 Fla. 714, 23 So. 410.

Dixon, Ch. J., in Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243, indulges in an extended criticism of the doctrine as declared by Justice Ventris in Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 198. One point of criticism is that the presumption is drawn from a state of facts which absolutely negative the reality of the thing presumed. Another point of criticism is directed against what is characterized as the absurd result that follows from indulging such a presumption, namely, that in the event of the actual disaffirmance of the deed by the grantee when he learns of it the title, which, by reason of the presumption of acceptance, has passed to the grantee in the meantime, will be reinvested in the grantor by means of such disaffirmance, without any reconveyance. These criticisms are difficult to answer. It is to be said, however, that the facts of the case were not such as to call upon the learned chief justice to explain how, if the theory of presumed acceptance when the grantee is not aware of the deed is repudiated, a grantor can effectually part with all dominion and control over the deed so as to support the delivery where the grantee does not learn of the deed until after the grantor's death. This case merely involved the question whether the property covered by a chattel mortgage was subject to the lien of an attachment levied upon it after it was delivered to a third person, but before it was actually accepted by the mortgagee. The validity of the mortgage as between the mortgagor and mortgagee was not questioned. It was said in the opinion, however, that by the delivery to the third person the mortgage passed beyond the reach and control of the mortgagor for a reasonable time within which to allow the mortgagee to assent to it. It is not explained why, the giving of the mortgage being a purely voluntary act, the mortgagor might not have effectually withdrawn it before acceptance by the grantee. As long as the mortgage remained in the hands of the third person unrevoked, it might undoubtedly be regarded that there was a continuing offer of it, and that, as soon as the mortgagee accepted it, it was binding as between the parties. But in such case the validity of the delivery does not depend upon the mortgagor's having parted with all dominion and control over the mortgage at the time of its delivery to the third person. See also supra, II. c. 3, § 6, for further discussion of this point.

In Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 159, the defendant in an ejectment action sought to show title out of the plaintiff by virtue of an auditor's deed to a third person, which the defendant's attorney, without authority from the grantee in such deed, and without even knowing who the grantee was, procured to be delivered to himself, concededly for the benefit of his client. It was not shown that the grantee ever accepted, or even knew of the deed. The court held that the defendant could not rely upon the deed: First, because it did not appear that it was the intention of the grantor to deliver the deed for and in behalf of the grantee; and secondly, even if he did deliver it with such intention, the deed would be inoperative for want of acceptance by the grantee, either express or implied. The court discusses at length the theory of presumed acceptance by the grantee of a beneficial deed delivered to an unauthorized third person for his benefit, and holds that there are four requisites of a presumption of acceptance by the grantee at the time of delivery: (1) That the deed be upon its face beneficial to the grantee; (2) that the grantor part entirely with all control over the deed; (3) that the grantor (except in case of an escrow) can deliver by a declaration, intention, or intimation, that the deed is delivered for and in behalf and to the use of the grantee; (4) that the grantee has eventually accepted the deed and claimed under it. It says that the presumption that the grantee will accept the deed because he is to be benefited thereby is never carried so far as to consider him as having accepted. This view of the presumption seems to strip it of any effect, except to support the fiction of the relation back of the actual acceptance to the time of the delivery; and that the court took this view of it is indicated by the ground upon which it distinguishes some of the cases upholding a delivery to a third person, namely, that in such cases the grantee had actually assented to, or accepted, the deed, and that he, or someone claiming under him, had been a party to the proceeding questioning its validity. Purple and 64 L. R. A.

Koerner, JJ., dissented from the opinion of the majority in Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 159, and expressed the opinion that when a deed has once been delivered to a stranger, and the grantor has relinquished all control over it, the grantee's acceptance will be presumed from the beneficial nature of the grant.

Where a grantee, who is under no disability, is aware of a conveyance positively beneficial to him, and does not dissent, acceptance will be presumed; but no such presumption will arise so long as he is ignorant of the conveyance. Moore v. Flynn, 135 Ill. 74, 25 N. E. 844.

The filing of a deed by the grantor for record does not of itself constitute a delivery. If the recorder is the agent of the grantee to receive the deed, his acceptance will be the act of his principal; but where the latter has no knowledge that such an instrument was contemplated, or that it was made, he can have no agent to receive it; and until after acquiring knowledge of its existence, he in some way signifies his approval of the act, there is no delivery of the deed.

The court in McFadden v. Ross, 14 Ind. App. 312, 41 N. E. 607, said that in some instances the law will presume an acceptance from the fact that the grantor has caused the deed to be recorded, where the grantees are infants or persons under legal disabilities; but such instances are exceptions to the general rule.

While, as to minors and others incapable of accepting a conveyance, the law will presume an acceptance, yet in case of an adult grantee who rests under no legal disability, the general rule is that there must be, not only delivery, but an acceptance of the deed. Davis v. Davis, 92 Iowa, 147, 60 N. W. 507.

If a grant is made to an adult without his knowledge or consent, it is no grant, because he cannot be made a grantee without his knowledge and consent, and when the knowledge is brought home to him, he may reject the grant. Owings v. Tucker, 90 Ky. 297, 13 S. W. 1078.

In Watson v. Hillman, 57 Mich. 607, 24 N. W. 663, it was held that where a husband conveyed property to a third person, under an arrangement that was subsequently abandoned, and procured such third person to reconvey the property to his (the first grantor's) wife, the deed could not be operative on behalf of her heirs after her death, without some evidence that she was cognizant of, and a party to, the delivery, by some act of approval.

In Cravens v. Rosstter, 116 Mo. 338, 22 S. W. 736 (record of deed), the court apparently adopts the view that the presumption of acceptance does not obtain where the facts with reference to acceptance are disclosed, but that the question must be determined from those facts. It also points out that in this case the deed was given in payment of a debt, and that it was for the grantee to say whether he would accept the deed on such terms.

An acceptance of a deed will not be presumed from its being made and recorded by others, without the sanction of the grantee. Day v. Mooney, 4 Hun, 134.

It is essential to the validity of a deed, if not actually delivered to the grantee or his agent authorized to receive it, to prove notice to him of its existence, and such additional circumstances as will afford a reasonable presumption of his acceptance of it. The presumption that a party will accept a deed because it is beneficial to him will never be carried so far as to consider him as having accepted it. Bell v. Farmers' Bank, 11 Bush, 34, 21 Am. Rep. 205.

A deed takes effect only from the date of its delivery, which may be either actual or constructive. It is essential to the operative force and validity of a deed, if not actually delivered to the grantee, or his agent authorized to receive it, to prove notice to him of its execution, and such additional circumstances as will afford a reasonable presumption of his acceptance of it. The presumption that a party will accept a deed because it is beneficial to him will never be carried so far as to consider him as having accepted it. Tuttle v. Turner, 28 Tex. 773.

The following cases, while not denying that the presumption of acceptance may be indulged even when the grantee is ignorant of the deed, do not go the full length of the doctrine of Thompson v. Leach, but hold that if the grantee ultimately dissents, the title has never been out of the grantor:

"However true it may be, that when a deed is made to an infant or lunatic, incapable of an actual assent, or to any person who does not know that a deed has been executed to him, the law presumes an assent, yet this, in the last case, is the presumption of a fact liable to be removed out of the way, like all other presumptions; and when there has been proof introduced for the purpose of showing that there was no assent, which in itself implies a dissent, the jury only are the competent forum to decide this question." Treadwell v. Bulkley, 4 Day, 395, 4 Am. Dec. 225.

Even if while the grantee in a deed remains ignorant of the intended grant, or is incapable of binding himself to his own act or assent, his acceptance may be presumed for his benefit, still if, upon being apprised of it, or becoming capable of acting for himself, he dissents from and repudiates it, the same result follows, that there never was a grantee, nor a grant, and that the title never passed from the grantor. The presumption of acceptance does not operate to make the title pass by the deed until it is rejected, but only as evidence that it did pass by reason of the acceptance of the deed. And when the presumption is disproved and the nonacceptance of the deed established, then it is proved that the title did not pass by the deed because it was not accepted, and because, therefore, it could not vest anything in the grantee. Davenport v. Prewett, 9 B. Mon. 98.

While the delivery of a deed or mortgage by the grantor or the mortgagor, or by his direction, for record, is sufficient, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to justify a finding of its delivery by the mortgagor and acceptance by the mortgagee, yet the presumption of delivery and acceptance is not a conclusive one, but is prima facie only. It may be shown, if such be the fact, that the grantee, or mortgagee never accepted the instrument, but rejected it when apprised of its existence. Possibly upon the delivery of a deed or mortgage to a stranger for the use and benefit of the grantee or mortgagee, but without authority from him to receive it, acceptance of the mortgage may be presumed, where the grantor or mortgagor has parted entirely with all control over the instrument. There are authorities which so hold, but even in such case the presumption of acceptance, as of the date of delivery to the third person, may be rebutted. Rogers v. Heads Iron Foundry, 51 Neb. 52, 37 L. R. A. 433, 70 N. W. 527.

(2) Deed to person non sui juris.

In case of a beneficial deed to a person non sui juris, it is generally admitted that acceptance will be presumed, and it does not seem to make any difference whether the grantee actually knows of it or not.

Where nothing appears to show a contrary intention, if the grantor places the deed upon record without the knowledge of the grantee, the title will nevertheless pass, if the latter, on 54 L. R. A.

being informed of the transaction, assents to it; and where the conveyance is to one who is not sui juris, a formal assent need not be shown, as it will, if nothing further appears, be presumed. Weber v. Christen, 121 Ill. 98, 11 N. E. 893.

In Vaughan v. Godman, 94 Ind. 191, the court quotes from Mitchell v. Ryan, 3 Ohio St. 377, to the effect that acceptance will be presumed from the beneficial nature of the deed, and says: "It is not necessary for us, in this case, to express an opinion as to the correctness of the doctrine announced by the learned judge, so far as it may be applicable to adult grantees. So far as it applies to infant grantees, it commends itself to our judgment."

In the following cases, where a deed to an infant had been delivered to a third person or placed on record, it was held that the grantee's acceptance would be presumed from the beneficial nature of the deed: Rhea v. Bagley, 63 Ark. 374, 36 L. R. A. 86, 38 S. W. 1039; Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 159; Winterbottom v. Pattison, 152 Ill. 334, 38 N. E. 1050; Masteron v. Cheek, 23 Ill. 72; Guard v. Bradley, 7 Ind. 600; Miller v. Meers, 155 Ill. 285, 40 N. E. 577; Vaughan v. Godman, 94 Ind. 191; Colee v. Colee, 122 Ind. 109, 23 N. E. 687; Owings v. Tucker, 90 Ky. 297, 13 S. W. 1078; Hacker v. Hoover (Ky.) 66 S. W. 382; Hall v. Hall, 107 Mo. 101, 17 S. W. 811; Bjmerland v. Eley, 15 Wash. 101, 45 Pac. 730.

So where the grantee is an imbecile, acceptance will be presumed. Eastham v. Powell, 51 Ark. 530, 11 S. W. 823; Tate v. Tate, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 22; Davis v. Garrett, 91 Tenn. 147, 18 S. W. 113.

The presumption is a rule of law. Eastham v. Powell, 51 Ark. 530, 11 S. W. 823.

When a deed to a child is absolute in form and beneficial in effect, and the grantor and father voluntarily causes the same to be recorded, there is in law a sufficient delivery to the infant, and the title to the lands conveyed will pass thereby. In such case actual manual delivery and a formal acceptance are not necessary. Cecil v. Beaver, 28 Iowa, 241, 4 Am. Rep. 174.

The presumption, however, cannot avail where the infant upon attaining majority refuses to accept. Owings v. Tucker, 90 Ky. 297, 13 S. W. 1078. The court in the latter case does not say where the title was in the meantime. It appears in this case that there was a reconveyance.

In Davenport v. Prewett, 9 B. Mon. 98, it was held that if the infant upon attaining his majority refused to accept, the title must be regarded as having remained in the grantor during the whole time.

Strong circumstances are required to rebut the presumption. Davis v. Garrett, 91 Tenn. 147, 18 S. W. 113.

(3) Trust deeds.

Deeds creating a trust, delivered to a third person or recorded by the grantor, have been upheld although there was no actual acceptance by the trustee.

In Adams v. Adams, 21 Wall. 185, 22 L. ed. 504, the person named as trustee never heard of or saw the deed until long after it was recorded, and then refused to accept the trust or in any way to act upon it. The court held that his refusal was immaterial, saying: "Although a trustee may never have heard of the deed, the title vests in him, subject to a disclaimer on his part. Such disclaimer will not, however, defeat the conveyance as a transfer of the equitable interest to a third person. A trust cannot fail for want of a trustee, or by the refusal of all the trustees to accept the trust. The court of chancery will appoint new trustees.

It is not necessary that a deed of trust should be actually delivered to the grantee. A delivery to a third person for and on behalf of the grantee, for the benefit of and with the intent to protect and secure the creditors therein named, is sufficient. Gunnell v. Cockerill, 79 Ill. 79. It is not expressly so stated, but the circumstances indicate that the grantee knew that the deed was to be delivered to the third person.

In Myrover v. French, 78 N. C. 609, a debtor executed to one of his creditors a deed of land in trust for the equal benefit of himself and another creditor. At the time the deed was executed the trustee was absent and had no knowledge of it, and died without ever having learned of it. The grantor had the deed attested and delivered to one of the witnesses, whom he directed to prove it and have it registered, which was accordingly done. It was held that there was a delivery. The decision is upon the ground that the acceptance of the trust would be presumed as being made for the benefit of the creditor and trustee.

In Wilt v. Franklin, 1 Blinn. 502, 2 Am. Dec. 474, in which it was held that a deed of trust for creditors would take precedence of an execution levied upon the property between the time of the execution of the deed and the time the trustee learned thereof and accepted the same, the court said it was rightfully conceded that where the deed is for the benefit of the grantee it is reasonable that his assent should be presumed, and added that it was reasonable to make the same presumption where the grantee is required by the deed to do an act useful to his neighbor, and not injurious to himself. The presumption is liable to be rebutted by showing an express dissent; but in the present case the presumption was confirmed by subsequent assent of the grantee. The trustee in this case was not himself a creditor.

A trustee is presumed to have accepted the instrument creating the trust until the fact is disproved. Kyrick v. Hetrick, 13 Pa. 488.

A conveyance to a lunatic trustee for the life of another, and after his decease to the heirs of the cestui que use, is not void for want of mental capacity to accept the trust. In such a case where the acceptance of the trust is not injurious to the trustee, a conclusive presumption of acceptance by him may be indulged. Ibid.

The moment an assignment for the benefit of creditors is placed by the assignor, or anyone interested, in the office of the recorder of deeds of the proper county and within the prescribed time, the beneficial interests of the creditors, the cestui que trust, are certainly and completely vested, and it is immaterial when the assignee accepts the trust, or whether he ever accepts it at all. Marks's Appeal, 85 Pa. 231. In this case it was held that the assignment took precedence of an attachment levied upon the property between the time it was recorded and the time it was accepted by the assignee. The opinion cites and relies on Read v. Robinson, 6 Watts & S. 329, and the decision is apparently based on the same ground as the decision in that case.

A deed of trust need not be delivered to the trustee. A delivery to a third person for him will be good at all events until he shall dissent; but he will not be allowed to dissent to the injury of the cestui que trust. Dawson v. Dawson, Rice, Eq. 243.

In Cloud v. Calhoun, 10 Rich. Eq. 358, a deed of gift of slaves to a trustee for the benefit of certain persons was upheld notwithstanding that the trustee never accepted and never even heard of the deed. This decision is not, however, expressly put upon the ground of a presumed acceptance, but upon the ground that equity never permits a trust to fail for lack of a trustee. It will be observed, however, that it was held in Read v. Robinson, 6 Watts & S. 329, supra, that this principle does not apply until the trust has been so far executed as to put the legal title out of the grantor; and to accomplish that result it is necessary to indulge the presumption of assent.

(4) Deed not beneficial to grantee.

Except in the cases of deeds of trust, the presumption of acceptance is never indulged where the deed imposes a burden upon the grantee.

In respect to persona sui juris, acceptance, as well as delivery, is a matter of intention. Acceptance will not be lightly presumed where the grant imposes a burden or obligation upon the grantee, and the recording of a deed by the grantor without the direction or knowledge of the grantee is not of itself to be regarded as evidence of acceptance. Rittmaster v. Brisbane, 19 Colo. 371, 35 Pac. 736.

The recording alone of a deed containing a clause assuming a mortgage cannot be held sufficient to prove a delivery of the deed, and thus establish a contract against the grantee, binding him to pay the mortgage. Thompson v. Dearborn, 107 Ill. 87.

Until the fact that the conveyance is for the interest of the grantee is established either by the instrument itself or other proof, his acceptance will not be presumed. And, therefore, it is not correct to say, in all cases, that a deed delivered to a third person, or to the recorder for the benefit of the grantee but without his knowledge, immediately divests the estate out of the grantor and casts it upon the grantee, in his absence and without his knowledge. Day v. Griffith, 15 Iowa, 104.

The mere fact that one executed and caused a deed to be recorded does not raise any presumption of acceptance in the absence of any fact showing that the deed was beneficial to the grantee, or that it was to his interest to accept it. Jefferson County Bldg. Assn. v. Hell, 81 Ky. 513.

The recording of a deed by the grantor does not raise a presumption of acceptance by the grantee save where a clearly beneficial interest is conferred. Bunnell v. Bunnell, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 800, 64 S. W. 420.

In Derry Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 268, it is said that while the assent of the grantee to a deed recorded by the grantor, or delivered by him to a third person without the grantee's knowledge, will be presumed from the beneficial nature of the grant, such presumption cannot be indulged where the acceptance of the deed would be attended with an obligation to pay the price of the land.

The mere sending of a deed to the registry for record, without the knowledge of the grantee, is not a delivery,—at least if it is not certainly beneficial to the grantee, even though the grantor intended it to take effect; for an acceptance by the grantee, express or implied, is necessary. Ibid.

If in any case there can be a valid delivery to a third person for the use of the grantee, when the latter has no knowledge of it and has given such third person no actual authority to receive it, it must be in cases where the law will pronounce the conveyance to be purely beneficial to the grantee, and, therefore, presume his assent to it. Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 505.

It is essential to the validity of a deed that the grantee is willing to accept it; and while acceptance will be presumed from the beneficial nature of the transaction, when the grant is not absolute, yet this presumption is very slight where the grantee derives no benefit under the deed, but is subjected to a duty or the performance of a trust. Jackson ex dem. Pintard v. Bodie, 20 Johns. 187.

d. Cases illustrative of the nature of the instrument and of the time when it takes effect.

The time when the deed takes effect—whether when it is delivered to the third person or placed on record, or when it is actually accepted—would seem to depend upon whether the court adopts the theory of presumed acceptance, or that of relation back. If the former theory is adopted, it would seem that the deed must be regarded as taking effect immediately; if the latter theory is adopted, it would seem that the deed cannot be regarded as taking effect until actual acceptance, though such acceptance will then relate back to the time of the original delivery. In the meantime, however, the title must actually have been in the grantor. In this connection confusion is likely to arise by reason of the distinction usually observed between “deeds presently” and “escrows,” and the view usually taken of the mode in which those instruments respectively operate. Chief Justice Shaw, in Foster v. Mansfield, 3 Met. 412, 37 Am. Dec. 154, makes the following distinction between a deed presently and an escrow: “Where the future delivery of a deed is to depend upon the payment of money or the performance of some other condition, it will be deemed an escrow. Where it is merely to await the lapse of time, or the happening of some contingency, and not the performance of any condition, it will be deemed the grantor’s deed presently. Still it will not take effect as a deed until the second delivery; but when thus delivered it will take effect by relation from the first delivery.” This distinction seems to be well established; and, according to it, the instruments of the class to which this note is confined are “deeds presently,” and not escrows. Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92, explains the difference in the mode of operation of a deed presently and an escrow, as follows: In case of the delivery of a deed to a third person as an escrow, a second delivery is generally required before the title passes, but in the case of a delivery of a deed to a third person as the deed of the grantor presently, to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor’s death, the title passes at the instant of delivering the deed to the third person. The last statement seems to embody the view generally taken of the mode of operation of these two classes of instruments. As applied to a deed, the delivery of which, with the aid of the presumption of acceptance, is regarded as complete at the time of its delivery to the third person, this language can be accepted in its full force. But as applied to a deed, the complete delivery of which is deferred until actual acceptance by the grantee, the language needs some modification or explanation. The most that can be said of such deeds is that, after acceptance, the title will be deemed to have passed immediately upon the delivery to the third person; it cannot be said that it actually did pass at that time, or that it could have been so regarded if the question had arisen at any time before actual acceptance. It appears from other parts of the opinion in Foster v. Mansfield that the chief justice did not regard the deed as taking effect, or the title as passing, at the time of the delivery to the third person. After stating that where the deed is merely to await the happening of some contingency, and not the performance of any condition, it will be deemed the grantor’s deed presently, he says: “Still it will not take effect as a deed until the second delivery; but when thus delivered, it will take effect by relation from the first delivery.” Again, speaking of a deed which came clearly within his definition of deeds presently, he says: “As the estate did not effectually pass till the second delivery, if that second delivery had been prevented, it would probably have been held that it was wholly inoperative.” According to this opinion, the only vital difference in the operation of a deed presently and an escrow is that the former will ordinarily, as between the parties, or persons having no rights superior to those of the parties, take effect by virtue of relation back to the time of the original delivery, while the fiction of relation back will not ordinarily be applied to escrows, though it may be so applied to avoid the effect of some unforeseen occurrence. This explanation of the sense in which the terms “deed presently” and “escrow” are used, and of the difference in their operation, is made in order to explain the apparent inconsistency of some of the courts in treating an instrument as a deed presently, and at the same time denying that the requisite element of acceptance (which is necessary to actually vest the title as of the time of the delivery to the third person) may be supplied by a presumption of acceptance. This apparent inconsistency is even more obvious when the court substitutes for the expression “deed presently” phrases expressive of the operation of a deed presently, such as “the deed takes effect and title passes immediately upon the delivery to the third person.” Unless such expressions are understood to mean merely that the deed will, after actual acceptance, be deemed, by virtue of the doctrine of relation, to have taken effect, and the title to have passed, immediately, and not that the deed did actually take effect, and the title did actually pass, immediately, they are inconsistent with the position that there can be no presumption of acceptance at the time of the delivery to the third person. In the case of Stone v. Duvall, 77 Ill. 476, infra, the court, evidently because it was not prepared to adopt the position that the deed actually takes effect, and that the title actually passes at the time of the delivery to the third person, treated an instrument delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor’s death, not as a deed presently, but as an escrow. For the same reason, apparently, 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 280 says: “A delivery . . . [of a deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantees after the grantor’s death] may be considered in effect an escrow, but differs from that in the fact that a delivery in escrow is dependent upon the performance of some event, and not upon the lapse of time.”

The following cases are illustrative of the views that have been taken with reference to the nature of the instrument, and of the time when it takes effect:

A deed may be delivered to a third person as a deed, to be delivered to the grantee on the happening of some future event, e. g., the death of the grantor. In such case the writing is a valid deed from the beginning, and the third person is the trustee of the grantee. The delivery to the third person for the grantee must be absolute, and no future control of the instrument can be reserved. McCalla v. Bane, 45 Fed. 828.

A deed left by grantor with a third person without authority, express or implied, to deliver it to the grantee, is not presently the deed of the grantor. Carr v. Hoxie, 5 Mason, 60, Fed. Cas. No. 2,438.

The delivery of a deed or mortgage may be to a third person for the grantee, and he will hold it in trust for the latter, and in such case the deed is operative from the delivery to the third person, though it does not come to the knowledge or possession of the grantee until after the grantor's death. Elisberry v. Boykin, 65 Ala. 336.

The delivery of a deed may be absolute,—that is, to the grantee himself, or to a third person for him; or it may be conditional,—that is, to a third person, with directions to keep it till some condition is performed by the grantee. In the first case, the title presently passes, but in the second case, the instrument is an escrow, and no title passes until the condition is performed, and, generally, until the second delivery of the deed. Fitch v. Bunch, 30 Cal. 208.

Where one executes a deed conveying all his real estate to his children, and puts it into the hands of a third person to be delivered to them on his death, and the deed is so delivered after his death, the instrument is a deed taking effect from its delivery to the depositary, and not a testamentary disposition. The court said that it was not meant that the deed was consummate, but that it was efficacious to the passage of the interests conveyed where it was delivered to the trustee or agent. It was held that the deed was good as against the claim of dower of the widow of the grantor. Stewart v. Stewart, 5 Conn. 320.

The delivery of a deed, in a legal sense, consists in the transfer of the possession and dominion, and it is complete at the moment when the deed is in the hands, or power, of the grantee, with the consent of the grantor, and with his intent that it shall operate and inure as a muniment of title to the grantee. The grantee's presence is not necessary. It is sufficient that the deed goes out of the hands, or control, of the grantor, with his intent that it shall go to those of the grantee, and that it ultimately does so. It matters not though the grantor be dead at the time when the deed reaches the hands of the grantee, if it was previously left with a third person for his use. O'Neal v. Brown, 67 Ga. 707.

Bryan v. Wash, 7 Ill. 557, referring to Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 536; Belden v. Carter, 4 Day, 66, 4 Am. Dec. 185; Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 447, 3 Am. Dec. 66, and other cases, says, with apparent approval of the position, these cases show that the deed takes effect from the first delivery, no matter when it comes to the hands of the grantee, or even if it never does.

Where a grantor delivers a deed to a stranger with instructions to the latter to deliver it to the grantee, thus putting it beyond his control, for the express purpose of having it take effect as a deed, and the grantee, when apprised of the arrangement, approves of and sanctions it by promising soon to call for the deed,—this constitutes in law a delivery and acceptance of the deed, and from that time the title is vested in the grantee. Thenceforth the stranger holds the deed, not as agent of the grantor, but of the grantee alone. Bennett v. Waller, 23 Ill. 97.

In Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 810, 11 Am. Rep. 67, the grantors, after executing the deed, sent it to a stranger, without the knowledge or assent of the grantee, with the simple direction to have it recorded. It was placed on file and there remained until after the death of the grantee. The grantee learned of the deed before his death and accepted it. The question as to the time the deed became effective, however, was important, it appearing that, under the circumstances, if the deed did not take effect until the time of the actual acceptance, it 54 L. R. A.

would be subject to a trust in favor of one of the grantors, but that if it went into effect as soon as it was delivered to the third person, or as soon as it was recorded, it would not be subject to the trust. The court held that it did not become effective until actual acceptance. The delivery to the third person was disposed of upon the ground that he was a mere medium through which the deed was to pass to the hands of the recorder. With reference to the recording, it is said that the act of recording a deed cannot amount to a delivery when there does not appear to be an assent or knowledge by the grantee of the act.

The delivery of a deed to a third party, to be retained until the death of the grantor and then to be delivered to the grantee, is not an absolute delivery, and will not operate to give to the grantee any immediate rights or interests in the premises, but will be good to pass the title, at the grantor's death, to the grantee or her heirs. Stone v. Duvall, 77 Ill. 475. This case regards an instrument delivered under such circumstances as an escrow, which will not take effect until the grantor's death. The controversy was between the grantor who sought to set aside the deed, and the heirs of the grantee. The court said that the grantee was probably not aware of the existence of the deed for a considerable time after its delivery to the third person, if it ever came to her knowledge.

Where a grantor makes a deed and delivers it to a third person to hold until his death, and then delivers it to the grantee, and parts with all control over it, and reserves no right to recall the deed or alter its provisions, the delivery will be effective, and the grantee, on the death of the grantor, will succeed to the title. Although the delivery of the deed to such third person to be retained until the death of the grantor, and then to be delivered to the grantee, is not an absolute delivery so as to vest an immediate estate in the land, yet it will be good to pass the title at the grantor's death to the grantee, or his heirs. Walter v. Way, 170 Ill. 90, 48 N. E. 421.

In Hockett v. Jones, 70 Ind. 227, it was held that an agreement by a discharged bankrupt, binding himself and his personal representatives to pay a creditor an indebtedness barred by his discharge, was sufficiently delivered, it appearing that it was given to a third person with directions to hold the same until the maker's death, and then to be delivered to the creditor, notwithstanding that the latter had no knowledge of the existence of the agreement until after the maker's death and the delivery of the agreement to him. The court said that it did not regard the depositary as the agent of the maker, but rather as the agent of the creditor, and that when he consented to receive the instrument and deliver it to the latter upon the death of the maker, he undertook to act in that behalf as trustee for the creditor, and that the latter ratified the agency by receiving the instrument from him. The controversy in this case arose between the creditor and the personal representatives of the maker of the instrument.

In Squires v. Summers, 85 Ind. 252, the court says, citing Stewart v. Weed, 11 Ind. 92, that when a deed is delivered to a third person for the use of the grantee, it will take effect from the instant of such delivery, if the grantor parts with all control over the instrument. In this case, however, as to the time when the deed took effect was not important, as the controversy was between the heirs and the grantee.

In Smiley v. Smiley, 114 Ind. 268, 16 N. E. 585, the doctrine that a deed delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death takes effect as of the date of the first delivery was applied for the purpose of defeating a claim of dower in the property conveyed, made by the grantor's widow, whom he married between the dates of the first and second delivery. In this case the court attached importance to the fact that the widow was advised before the marriage that the grantor did not own the land in question, though it was not decided that the result would have been otherwise if she had not been so informed.

Where a grantor executes a deed and delivers it to a third person, parting with all dominion over it, and reserving no right to recall it or alter its provisions, to hold until his death and then deliver the same to the grantee, the delivery is effectual, and the grantee, on the death of the grantor, succeeds to the title. Stout v. Rayl, 146 Ind. 379, 45 N. E. 515.

In Wuester v. Folin, 60 Kan. 334, 56 Pac. 490, a delivery of a deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantee, who was the grantor's niece, after his death, was upheld as against a devisee of the property under a will executed by the grantor after such delivery to the third person, but before knowledge or acceptance of the deed by the grantee. In this case the grantee did not know of the deed until after the grantor's death. The court said the delivery was deemed to be complete, and the acceptance to take effect from the original delivery to the third person for the use of the grantee.

Where a debtor executes and records chattel mortgages to different creditors at the same time, they will rank, as between themselves, in the order in which they are accepted by the several mortgagees. Oxnard v. Blake, 45 Me. 602.

If a grantor delivers any writing as his deed to a third person, to be delivered over by him to the grantee on some future event, it is the grantor's deed presently, and the third person is a trustee of it for the grantee; and if the latter obtains the writing from the trustee before the event happens, it is the deed of the grantor and he cannot avoid it by plea of non est factum, whether generally or specially pleaded. But if the grantor makes a writing, and seals it and delivers it to a third person as his writing or escrow, to be by him delivered to the grantee, upon some future event, as his, the grantor's, deed, and it be delivered to the grantee accordingly, it is not the grantor's deed until the second delivery; and if the grantee obtains possession of it before the event happens, yet it is not the grantor's deed, and he may avoid it by pleading non est factum. Wheelwright v. Wheelwright, 2 Mass. 452, 3 Am. Dec. 66.

A writing delivered to a stranger for the use and benefit of the grantee, to have effect after a certain event, or the performance of some condition, may be delivered either as a deed or as an escrow. Hatch v. Hatch, 9 Mass. 307, 6 Am. Dec. 67.

A covenant by a resident of one state to convey certain lands in that state to a resident of another state before a day named, is sufficiently performed where, in pursuance of a verbal agreement of the parties that the covenantor should record the deed before sending it to the covenantee, but so as to have it in the city of the latter's residence before the day named in the covenant, the former recorded the deed before that day, notwithstanding that it did not reach the latter's residence until after that day. Shaw v. Hayward, 7 Cush. 170. The decision is on the ground that the delivery was complete, and that the title passed as soon as the deed was delivered for record; and that the agreement with reference to transmission to the residence of the covenantee was separate and collateral, and its violation was no breach of the covenant.

eral, and its violation was no breach of the covenant.

Until a deed is accepted by the grantee, the title to the estate does not pass out of the grantor, for no man can make another his grantee without his consent, and a deed made to a man with all requisite formalities, and even entered in the public registry, will be null if not afterwards accepted by the grantee. But if the latter afterwards assents to the conveyance, it will be good to pass the title to him unless some other circumstances shall be shown to render it invalid. Harrison v. Phillips Academy, 12 Mass. 456.

A delivery of a deed by the grantor to the register of deeds to be recorded for the use of the grantee, and the grantee's subsequent assent to the same, constitute a sufficient delivery from the time of such assent. Cowell v. Daggett, 97 Mass. 434.

Where the facts show that it was the intention of a grantor, at the time he delivered a deed to a third person, to deliver it for the grantees absolutely, and not as an escrow, and the third person so received it and kept it till delivered by him to the grantees, though the grantor had died in the meantime, the deed took effect and vested the estate thereby conveyed in the grantees from the delivery to the third person; and the grantees may maintain an action against the executor of the grantor upon a covenant contained in the deed. Mather v. Corliss, 103 Mass. 568. In this case the grantees knew that a deed was contemplated, but did not know that it had been executed until after the grantor's death.

A deed which is put into the hands of a third person to be delivered to the grantee upon the happening of some future event, but where no conditions are to be performed, is not an escrow or conditional deed. Its delivery is not dependent upon any condition to be performed, but it is a valid deed from the beginning, and the holder is but a trustee or agent for the grantee. In such a case the grantor has parted with all control over the deed. Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 460.

In Hathaway v. Payne, 34 N. Y. 92, the question as to when a deed delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death took effect became involved in determining the validity of a reservation of certain timber rights in a reconveyance from such grantee to the grantor during the latter's lifetime, it being contended that, unless the title had passed to the grantee at the time of the reconveyance by him, the reservation was invalid. The opinion of Potter, J., takes the view that the title passed to the grantee as soon as the deed was delivered to the third person. The opinion of Denio, Ch. J., while it admits that a deed may be delivered to a third person with instructions to be finally delivered to the grantee after the death of the grantor, holds that no title passes until the final delivery, and that then and thereafter the title is, by relation, deemed to have vested as of the time of the first delivery to the third person. It is difficult to determine from the report of the case whether the majority of the court concurred with the former, or with the latter, opinion on this point. In preparing the headnotes, it was evidently assumed that the majority concurred with the former opinion.

If a deed is delivered to a third person with instructions to be finally delivered to the grantee upon the grantor's death, the title will be deemed to have vested in the grantee at the time of the original delivery to the third person, and the deed will take precedence of a will executed by the grantor after such delivery to the third person, if the grantor intended to part with all control over the deed at the time of delivery to such third person. Ranken v. Donovan, 46 App. Div. 225, 61 N. Y. Supp. 542, Affirmed in 60 N. E. 1119.

Where a deed conveying real property in present is executed and delivered to a third party in escrow, with intent that it shall be delivered to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, it is a valid and effectual conveyance, taking effect from the time of such death. Nottbeck v. Wilks, 4 Abb. Pr. 315.

A delivery of a deed to a third person for the use of the grantee makes it effectual from the instant of such delivery, although the person is not the agent of, but a stranger to, the grantee, provided the grantee assents to it. Wesson v. Stephens, 87 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 557.

Where a deed is delivered to a third person with the express and unqualified direction to keep it in his possession as long as the grantor lives, and to deliver it to the grantee after the grantor's death, the deed operates as a deed in present, and vests the title in the grantee, as of the date of the delivery to the third person; and if the grantee dies before the grantor, the title vested in him will pass to his heirs. Pence v. Blackford, 11 Ohio C. C. 204.

When a deed is delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantees after the grantor's death, the second delivery relates back to the first, and an award of damages for the condemnation of a part of the land, after the execution of the deeds, but before the grantor's death, belongs to the grantees, rather than to the personal relatives of the grantor. Geisinger's Estate, 11 Pa. Co. Ct. 168.

In Morrow v. Alexander, 24 N. C. (2 Ired. L.) 388, a deed of gift of a slave was executed by a father in South Carolina to his daughter in North Carolina, and delivered to a third person with directions to deliver it to the donee. The latter delivered it to the donee at her residence in North Carolina. It was held that the instrument was executed and delivered in South Carolina so as to become a complete deed there, and was accordingly governed by the laws of that state. The donee in this case was an adult. It does not appear whether or not she knew of the deed before its delivery to her in North Carolina.

Where the grantor, with the intention of parting with all control and dominion over the deed, places it in the hands of a third person to be recorded after his death, it is a good delivery, and the deed takes effect as of the time of the delivery to the third person. Payne v. Hallgarth, 33 Or. 430, 54 Pac. 162.

In Kemp v. Walker, 16 Ohio, 118, it was held that where a deed was executed and placed on record by the grantor, and was subsequently delivered to the grantee by the recorder at the direction of the grantor, there was an actual delivery of the deed so that it would take effect at least from the time of such actual delivery, whether it would take effect from delivery to the recorder or not.

Where a grantor delivers a writing as his deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantee at his death, or on some other future event, it is the grantor's deed presently, and the depositary becomes a trustee of the grantee. Ball v. Foreman, 37 Ohio St. 132.

A delivery of a bond to a stranger for the use of the obligee, who afterwards manifests his acceptance of it by maintaining an action thereon, takes effect from the time of the delivery to the stranger. Goodrum v. Carroll, 2 Humph. 490 87 Am. Dec. 564.

Delivery of a deed to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death is a sufficient delivery,—at least for the purpose of making the deed operative upon the grantor's 54 L. R. A.

death, if not before. Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Hunt (Tex. Civ. App.) 38 S. W. 1134.

An obvious distinction exists between the case of delivering a deed to a third person without restrictions and simply for the use of the grantee, and a delivery to such third person upon some condition or with restrictions. In the former case, the depositary will be deemed a trustee or agent for the grantee alone; and as the assent of the grantee will be presumed until he dissents, the deed takes full effect between the parties immediately. But in the latter case, the operation of the deed is usually suspended until the condition is performed, or the restriction removed. Ladd v. Ladd, 14 Vt. 185. In this case the deed was delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death. The court held that the case fell within the latter category, and that, in the absence of any express declaration indicating an intention on the part of the grantor that the instrument should take immediate effect as a deed, or at least importing a waiver of all right or design to control its operation, it would not take effect until the grantor's death. It was then held that, as against the heirs, the action of a relation back to the first delivery would be indulged, but not as against the wife's claim of dower.

When a deed is delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee upon the happening of an event which is sure to occur, e. g., the grantor's death, without any reservation by the grantor of the right to control it, the assent of the grantee having been given, the grantor's authority over the deed and all his right to possess or control it, are forever gone the moment the first delivery is made, or when the deed is placed in the hands of the third person. As to the grantor, the delivery is absolute and final, and so is his conveyance of the land, the title to which passes at once to the grantee, qualified only by the right of the grantor to use and occupy, or take and receive the rents and profits during his life, or until the event shall have happened upon which the second delivery is to be made. The grantor in such a case converts his estate into a life tenancy, and makes himself the tenant of the grantee. These conclusions result unavoidably from the certainty of the event upon which the second delivery is made to depend, and from the impossibility, under the circumstances, that the grantor will ever be able to recall or repossess himself of the deed. He delivers the writing, therefore, as his deed, always so to remain and never to return to him, and it becomes presently operative, and the title vests immediately in the grantee. Prutsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 11 Am. Rep. 592. It will be observed that the statement that the grantor's authority over the deed is gone the moment delivery is made to the third person, is made on the assumption that the grantee has assented (meaning undoubtedly actual assent). The opinion unfortunately does not discuss the question on the assumption that the grantee remains in ignorance of the deed until after the grantor's death.

Where a deed is duly executed and delivered by the grantor to a depositary in the presence of the grantee and without any reservation of control, with the intention and understanding that such depositary is to retain the custody thereof until the grantor's death, and then deliver the same to the grantee, it is such grantor's deed in present from the time of such deposit, and such depositary thereby becomes the trustee of the grantee. Albright v. Albright, 70 Wis. 533, 36 N. W. 254.

In Alford v. Lea, 2 Leon. 111, Cro. Ellis. pt. 1, p. 54, it was held that the condition of an award requiring a release to be delivered before the feast of St. Peter was sufficiently complied with by a delivery to a third person to the use of the releasee without the latter's assent or knowledge, on the eve of the feast day, notwithstanding that the releasee, when he heard of it, disagreed to it.

If A makes an obligation to B, and delivers it to C to the use of B, this is a deed of A presently; but if C offers it to B, B may refuse it in pais, and thereby the obligation will lose its force (but perhaps in such case, A in an action brought on this obligation, cannot plead non est factum because it was once his deed). Butler & Baker's Case, 3 Coke, 26b.

In Taw v. Bury, And. 4, 2 Dyer, 167b, it was held that where A delivers a bond to B to deliver as his deed to C, and C refuses to receive it, but B leaves it, a plea of non est factum in an action on the bond is bad. The decision is upon the ground that by the first delivery the bond was good, and was in law the bond of A before any delivery over to C, and that the refusal of C could not undo it as the bond of A from the beginning.

If a bond is delivered to another for the use of the obligee, and it is tendered to him and he refuses it, the delivery has lost its force, and the obligee can never after agree to it, and, therefore, the obligor may say it is not his deed. Whelpdale's Case, 5 Coke, 119 b.

e. Right of the grantor to revoke.

See also Hale v. Joslin, 134 Mass. 310, supra, II. b, 2, b, (2).

It having been shown in I. b, 2, a, and b, that the parting by the grantor with all dominion and control over the deed is a requisite of this mode of delivery, it follows that if the conditions are such as to uphold a delivery, in the absence of any attempt by the grantor to revoke the instrument, no such attempt can operate to defeat a delivery; and it has been so held.

Arrington v. Arrington, 122 Ala. 510, 26 So. 152, did not expressly involve the question of the grantor's right to recall; but the court said that it would be beyond the grantor's power to recall.

Where one executes a deed, and delivers it to third person with instructions not to record it, but to deliver it to the grantees upon his (the grantor's) death, delivery to the grantees is effected; and the grantor cannot recall the deed, nor alter its provisions during his lifetime. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338.

In Issitt v. Dewey, 47 Neb. 196, 66 N. W. 288, a mother, after executing a deed to her son, and voluntarily placing the same upon record for the purpose and with the intent of passing title to the grantee, brought an action to have the same canceled and set aside, but such relief was denied upon the ground that the title had passed to the grantee.

Where a mother executed a deed of property to her minor daughter, and delivered the same to a third person for the use and benefit of the grantee, without any reservation of control, with instructions to keep it until after the grantor's death, and then to place it upon record, the delivery to the third person was sufficient to pass the title to the property to the grantee as of the date of such delivery; and the fact that after such delivery the custodian took the deed to the grantor and put it in a box where she kept her papers, but not with the intention of surrendering the deed, did not defeat the delivery. The title having once passed, it could not be divested in that way. Brown v. Westerfield, 47 Neb. 399, 66 N. W. 439.

Where a purchaser of land, having procured the execution of a deed to his son, has the deed delivered to himself, and retains it, the title 54 L. R. A.

passes immediately from the grantor to the grantee, notwithstanding that the latter is ignorant of its existence; and the purchaser cannot, after the death of the son without ever having known of the deed, affect the title by destroying the deed and procuring the execution of a new one by the vendor to a third person. Everett v. Everett, 48 N. Y. 218.

If a grantor delivers deeds to third persons with instructions to deliver the same to the grantees after his (the grantor's) death, or sooner if the latter should so direct, with the intention that the deed shall take effect and operate as his deed presently and irrevocably, he cannot revoke or reclaim the deed without the consent of the grantee. Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 341.

In Ellington v. Currie, 40 N. C. (5 Ired. Eq.) 21, it was held that a delivery of a deed of gift of slaves from a father to his infant children was shown by a bill by the donor's heirs seeking to recover the slaves from the donees, alleging that the father executed the deeds by signing and sealing them, and had them attested and caused them to be registered, notwithstanding that it also alleges that the deeds were not intended to operate between the parties, but only to hinder creditors, and that neither of the deeds has been found among the papers of the donor, or elsewhere, since his death. The court says that the subsequent loss or destruction of the deeds did not affect their operation so as to vest the slaves again in the father, and that a deed to hinder creditors will only be declared invalid at the instance of creditors, and is good as against the grantor and those claiming under him.

The principle is that when the maker of a deed delivers it to some third party for the grantee, parting with the possession of it, without any condition or any direction to hold it for him, and without in any way reserving the right to repossess it, the delivery is complete and the title passes at once, although the grantee may be ignorant of the facts, and no subsequent act of the grantor, or anyone else, can defeat the effect of such delivery. Robbins v. Rascoe, 120 N. C. 79, 38 L. R. A. 238, 26 S. E. 807.

Where one executes a deed of gift to his daughter, and delivers it to a third person to be delivered to the grantee thirty days after his death, and receives from the depository a receipt to that effect, which receipt is delivered to the grantee, who accepts it, the depository becomes the trustee of the grantee, and the estate passes at once to her, and the subsequent destruction of the deed by the grantor, without her knowledge and consent, is wrongful, and does not have the effect of reinvesting the title in him, or of defeating the title in her. Chambers v. Stewart, 2 Ohio N. P. 287.

In Meeks v. Stillwell, 54 Ohio St. 541, 44 N. E. 267, a husband joined with his wife in the execution, to an infant child, of the deed of a homestead, the title to which was in the wife. The wife subsequently, during her last illness, handed the deed to her attorney, with directions to place it on record for the grantee. A few days afterward, and while the deed was still in the hands of the attorney, she inserted therein a reservation of a homestead right in favor of her husband. The court held that even on the assumption that the delivery to the attorney was for the benefit of the infant, and that the wife had no power to recall or revoke the deed, yet the donee, in face of the reservation appearing in the deed, could not prevail without a reformation of the instrument, and that a court of equity would not, under the circumstances, reform the deed so as to make it operate contrary to the intention of the donor.

1. Rights of third persons.

See also Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 841, supra, II. b, 2, b, (1).

It would seem that the right of third persons (except persons whose rights are not superior to those of the grantor, e. g., non-lien creditors, personal representatives, heirs or devisees of the grantor) intervening between the time the deed was delivered to the third person, or was recorded, and the time it actually came to the knowledge of the grantee and was accepted by him, should depend upon which of the two theories, relation back or presumed acceptance, the court adopts. If the theory of presumed acceptance is adopted in its full force, as declared in Thompson v. Leach, 2 Vent. 198, supra, II. c, 2, c, (1), it would seem, since that theory places the title immediately in the grantee, the logical consequence would be that the deed would be superior to all such intervening rights. While, on the other hand, if the theory of relation back is adopted, such intervening rights should prevail, because, relation back being a mere fiction, it will not be indulged for the purpose of defeating the rights of third persons which have vested before the event (actual acceptance) upon which it is based. On the other hand, according to the theory of presumed acceptance, the title vests in the grantee before the rights of the third person have attached, and it is, therefore, not a matter of disturbing vested rights. Practically, however, the majority of the cases, without reference to which of these two theories is adopted, hold that the deed is subordinate to such intervening rights of third persons as are superior to those of the grantor himself. In some cases the courts seem to confuse the two theories, apparently treating them as but different statements of the same thing. Thus, the court in Bell v. Farmers' Bank, 11 Bush, 84, 21 Am. Rep. 205, says: "A deed delivered to the registering officer, or to an unauthorized third person, and subsequently accepted by the grantee, will take effect as between the grantor and the grantee from the time of the first delivery; and in such cases volunteers claiming under and through the grantor, and ordinary creditors who have acquired no lien upon nor interest in the estate conveyed, are entitled to no greater consideration than the grantor. Yet, until the grantee is informed of the execution of the deed, and does some act equivalent to an acceptance of it, it is manifest he may refuse to accept it, notwithstanding the fact that by a fiction of law the presumption of an actual acceptance had all the while existed for his benefit as against the grantor, his heirs, devisees, and ordinary creditors. But this fiction will not be allowed to prevail to the prejudice of persons who have acquired title to, and interest in, or a lien upon, the property before the date of the actual acceptance. As in the case of an escrow, whenever it becomes necessary for the purposes of justice that the true time of acceptance of a deed so delivered shall be ascertained, the legal fiction will be disregarded, and the intervening claimant, or lien holder, allowed to show the actual facts of the transaction."

There are authorities which hold that there is an absolute presumption of acceptance by the grantee of a deed delivered to a third person to be delivered to him, placing the title in him for all purposes, though he was an adult and had no knowledge of the deed at the time; and that if he rejects the deed after coming to a knowledge of it, the title is then, ipso facto, re-vested in the grantor. Placing the title in the grantee as of the time the grantor parted with the deed, under the circumstances mentioned, the grantee being ignorant of the transaction, is one of the results of the doctrine of relation, and is founded on a fiction of the law. But it is well settled that the doctrine of relation should not cut out intervening rights. So that the true rule ought to be that this presumption of delivery and acceptance of a deed beneficial to the grantee ought not to, and will not, obtain, where the right of a third party has intervened between the time when the grantor acted and the time of the actual acceptance by the grantee. Fischer Leaf Co. v. Whipple, 51 Mo. App. 185.

A few cases, however, accept the logical consequences of the theory of presumed acceptance, and hold that the deed is superior to intervening rights of third persons; thus:

Delivery of a deed to a third party for the use of the grantee, if the grantor parts with all control over it, makes it effectual from the instant of such delivery, although the person to whom it was so delivered was not the agent of the grantee, and the latter did not know of the deed until after the grantor's death. Doe ex dem. Garbons v. Knight, 5 Barn. & C. 671, 8 Dowl. & R. 348. This was ejectment by a mortgagee in a mortgage delivered to a third person for his benefit, but which did not come to his knowledge until after the mortgagor's death. The defendant claimed under a mortgage given by the same mortgagor after the delivery of the first mortgage to the third person, but before the mortgagee in that mortgage had learned of it. It was held that the first mortgage was good as against the second mortgage unless the latter could show that it was void as against creditors, or purchasers under the statute of Elizabeth. The court said the law would presume, if nothing appears to the contrary, that a man will accept what is for his benefit, and that in this case there was the strongest ground for presuming the mortgagee's consent because of his declaration to the mortgagor that he expected the latter would secure him and the latter's answer importing that he would.

The recording by a guardian of a mortgage executed by him to his ward to secure his indebtedness to the latter, and a subsequent delivery of the same to the ward's mother for him, constitute a sufficient delivery to uphold the mortgage as against a mortgage subsequently executed by him to a third person. Jennings v. Jennings, 104 Cal. 150, 37 Pac. 794.

A mortgage deed executed by the grantor and lodged with the town clerk for record, without the knowledge of the grantee, is good until dissented to by the latter, and is superior to the lien of an attachment taken out against the grantor after delivery of the deed for record and before the grantee knew of it. Hallock v. Bush, 2 Root, 28, 1 Am. Dec. 60.

A delivery of a mortgage to a third person with instructions to record it for the mortgagee is a good delivery to the mortgagee as of the time of the original delivery to such third person so as to cut off an attachment intervening between such delivery and the actual acceptance by the mortgagee. Merrill v. Swift, 18 Conn. 257, 48 Am. Dec. 315. The court adopts the view that the grantee's assent will be presumed where the deed is beneficial, although his dissent may be disproved and the deed thereby rendered ineffectual. The court says if the deed had been delivered as an escrow, a different question would have been presented.

Neither the presence of the grantee nor his previous authority to the third person to receive the deed on his behalf, nor even his subsequent assent to it, is necessary to make a delivery of a deed to a third person for the benefit of the grantee valid; but where the deed is beneficial to him, his assent will be presumed unless it appears that he dissented. Tibbals v. Jacobs, 31 Conn. 428. In this case the delivery was upheld as against an execution under a judgment against the grantor. It does not appear when, with reference to the delivery to the third person and the subsequent acceptance by the grantees, the execution was levied; but the opinion seems to be broad enough to uphold the delivery as against an execution levied in the interval between the delivery to the third person and the time the grantees learned of and accepted it.

A delivery of a deed to a third person for the use of the grantee, if the grantor parts with all control over it, makes it effective from the instant of such delivery. Its acceptance by the grantee, if beneficial to him, will be presumed if nothing appears to the contrary, even before he knows of it. Jones v. Swayze, 42 N. J. L. 279. The doctrine was here applied to a case where a chattel mortgage to secure an existing debt was executed without the mortgagee's knowledge, and left with a third person to be filed in the clerk's office, and filed accordingly. Before the mortgagee learned of the mortgage, a new mortgage was executed to a third person. It was held that the first mortgage was superior to the second.

Where the grantor, in performance of a contract to convey property, delivers the deed to a third person, with instructions to deliver it to the grantee, the title passes as between the parties at the time of the delivery to the third person, and a mechanic's lien for work under a contract with the grantor, filed in the interval between the first and second delivery, will not attach to the property since such a lien attaches only to the legal right of the owner. Ernst v. Reed, 49 Barb. 367.

If the delivery of a deed to a third person for the grantee is absolute, the grantor not reserving any future control over it, the estate passes immediately to the grantee, notwithstanding that she is ignorant of its existence, her assent to accept the conveyance being presumed from the fact that the conveyance is beneficial to her; and the lien of a judgment recovered in the interval between the delivery to a third person and the time when the grantee became aware of the deed will not attach to the property. National Bank v. Bonnell, 46 App. Div. 302, 61 N. Y. Supp. 521.

The general rule is that where an instrument is executed in favor of a party for his interest, he will be presumed to assent thereto until he manifests his dissent, after being duly notified. Ensworth v. King, 50 Mo. 477. In this case a mortgage on real estate to secure an existing debt was executed and placed on record by the mortgagor without the knowledge of the mortgagee. The latter assented to it after learning of it, but in the mean time the property had been attached for a debt of the mortgagor. It appears to be held that the mortgage was superior to the attachment. This case, however, was overruled by Kuh v. Garvin, 125 Mo. 563, 28 S. W. 847, infra.

Some of the cases, like Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243, supra, II. c. 2, o. (1), while holding that the intervening rights will prevail over the theory of presumed acceptance would lead to a different result, and therefore combat and repudiate that doctrine.

In the following cases, the lien of an attachment or judgment for a debt of the grantor, or mortgagor, levied after a deed or mortgage of real property had been delivered to a third person or recorded, but before the grantee or mortgagee had learned of or accepted it, was held superior to the rights of the latter. Parmelee v. Simpson, 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 56 Am. Rep. 726, 4 Pac. 473, 8 Pac. 46; Knox v. Clark (Colo. App.) 62 Pac. 334; Loubat v. Kipp, 9 Fla. 60; Goodsell v. Stinson, 7 Blackf. 439; Woodbury v. Fisher, 20 Ind. 387; Deere v. Nelson, 73 Iowa, 186, 34 N. W. 809 (attachment levied after deed recorded and mailed to grantee, but before he received same); Com. v. Jackson, 10 Bush, 424; Bell v. Farmers' Bank, 11 Bush, 34, 21 Am. Rep. 205; Derry Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 268; Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 503; Russ v. Stratton, 11 Misc. 565, 32 N. Y. Supp. 767; McKwen v. Bamberger, 3 Lea, 576; Kempner v. Rosenthal, 81 Tex. 12, 16 S. W. 639; Denton v. Perry, 5 Vt. 382.

Where, in pursuance of an agreement for the sale of land at a certain sum per rod, a deed was signed but not acknowledged or delivered because the land had not been measured, and the owner afterward acknowledged the deed and sent it to the registry without the knowledge of the grantee, an execution against the grantor levied upon the land after the registry, but before actual acceptance by the grantee, will be a paramount lien. Samson v. Thornton, 3 Met. 275, 37 Am. Dec. 136. The court distinguishes Hedge v. Drew, 12 Pick. 141, 22 Am. Dec. 416, upon the ground that in that case the grantee expressed her assent, and thereby made the register her agent to receive the deed, whereas in the case at bar there was no agent to accept the deed, no delivery to give the deed effect as a conveyance, and no ratification until long after the attachment was made.

A delivery of a deed or mortgage to a county clerk, for the use of the grantee or mortgagee, to be recorded, and the subsequent assent to the same by the grantee or mortgagee, are equivalent to an actual delivery to the latter, and will prevail against a subsequent deed made after such assent, but not against one made before such assent. Foster v. Beardsley Scythe Co. 47 Barb. 513.

In Brown v. Austen, 35 Barb. 341, a father, while solvent, executed deeds, for the consideration of love and affection, to his daughters, and delivered them to a third person to be delivered to the grantees after the death of the grantor and his wife, or at such earlier periods as should be by either of them designated. After the grantor had become insolvent and judgments had been recovered against him, he procured the depositary to deliver the deeds to the grantees. The action was by the judgment creditors to have their judgments declared a lien on the premises. The court took the position that the determining question was whether the grantor, at the time of the delivery of the deeds to the depositary, intended that they should take effect and operate presently and irrevocably, or whether he intended to deliver the deeds in escrow, to be delivered by him to the grantees as his deeds on the death of the grantor and his wife, or upon their previous direction to deliver the deeds. If the former was his intention, it was held that the deeds took effect immediately upon their delivery to the depositary, and if the latter was his intention, the deeds could not take effect until the second delivery; and that while, in the absence of the intervening rights of third persons, the fiction of relation back may be indulged, even in case of a delivery in escrow, such fiction cannot be indulged to the prejudice of the rights of judgment creditors.

Of the foregoing cases, Parmelee v. Simpson, 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542; Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 56 Am. Rep. 726, 4 Pac. 473, 8 Pac. 46; Knox v. Clark (Colo. App.) 62 Pac. 334; Goodsell v. Stinson, 7 Blackf. 439; Derry Bank v. Webster, 44 N. H. 268; and Kempner v. Rosenthal, 81 Tex. 12, 16 S. W. 639,—put the decision upon the ground that the fiction of relation back will not be indulged so as to cut off the vested rights of third persons. None of the cases expressly repudiate the doctrine of presumed acceptance. Com. v. Jackson, 10 Bush, 424, however, quotes with approval the statement in Tuttle v. Turner, 28 Tex. 773, supra, II. c. 2, c. (1), that "the presumption a party will accept a deed because it is beneficial to him . . . will never be carried so far as to consider him as having accepted it;" and McEwen v. Bamberger, 8 Lea, 576, said that the presumption of acceptance was overcome by the fact that the grantee was not aware of the existence of the deed until after the attachment. Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 605, puts the decision upon the ground that the mortgage not being clearly beneficial, its acceptance could not be presumed, thus apparently recognizing the necessity of eliminating the presumption of acceptance. The decision in Loubat v. Kipp, 9 Fla. 60, is upon the ground that the delivery to the third person was subject to the orders of the mortgagor.

The delivery of a deed of trust by the grantor to the county recorder for record, for the grantees as their deed, is a sufficient delivery where the grantees, before the execution of the deed, had agreed to accept; and such deed, whether a deed of trust absolute, or in the nature of a mortgage, takes effect as from the time of such delivery to the recorder, and is superior to a judgment recovered against the grantor in the interval between the time the deed was delivered to the recorder and the time it was delivered by the latter to the grantees and trustees. Hoffman v. Mackall, 5 Ohio St. 124, 64 Am. Dec. 637.

In the following case, the lien of an attachment or execution accruing in the interval between the delivery of a chattel mortgage to a third person, or the filing of the same by the mortgagor, and the time it came to the knowledge of the mortgagee and was accepted by him, was held superior to the mortgage.

When a bona fide mortgage is executed without the knowledge of the mortgagee, who, however, subsequently ratifies it, the ratification generally relates back to the execution of the mortgage; but if between the execution of the mortgage and the ratification thereof other creditors obtain judgments against the mortgagor, the liens of such judgments will take precedence of the mortgage lien. Evans v. Coleman, 101 Ga. 152, 28 S. E. 645.

The acceptance by the mortgagee of a chattel mortgage recorded without his knowledge will not relate back so as to affect an intervening purchaser at a sale under an execution against the mortgagor. McFadden v. Ross, 14 Ind. App. 312, 41 N. E. 607. It was admitted in this case that a delivery may be made to the third person for the grantee or mortgagee without the knowledge of the latter, and, when accepted by the mortgagee, it becomes valid.

Where a debtor executes a chattel mortgage, and files it for record without the mortgagee's knowledge, and the latter, upon learning of it, subsequently accepts it, such acceptance relates back to the filing of the mortgage as between the parties, but not as between the mortgagee and third persons whose rights have intervened. Fleld v. Fisher, 65 Mich. 606, 32 N. W. 838.

Where a chattel mortgagor, without the mortgagee's knowledge, files the mortgage for record in the recorder's office, its execution, so far as he is concerned, is complete, and nothing that he can thereafter do, without the consent of the mortgagee, can in any manner affect its validity; and the fact that the mortgagor was not a resident of the state, and, therefore the mortgage was not entitled to record, and that the mortgage was subsequently returned to him, does not affect the result. Kuh v. Garvin, 125 Mo. 563, 28 S. W. 847. The requisite of acceptance in this case, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, was supplied by the presumption of acceptance. The court held, however, that, as against attaching creditors, something more than a delivery to a third person for the benefit of the mortgagee and the presumption of acceptance by him because of its beneficial provisions, was required, and that, in order to cut off the lien of an attachment after the delivery of the mortgage to the recorder, it must be shown that such delivery had been assented to by the mortgagee, and that he had done something equivalent to an acceptance of it before the attachment. The case of Ensworth v. King, 50 Mo. 477, holding that the presumed acceptance of a deed by the grantee, because it is beneficial to him, will defeat the lien of an attaching creditor, was expressly overruled.

The recording of a chattel mortgage by the mortgagor without the knowledge of the mortgagee, though sufficient, when aided by the presumption of acceptance from the beneficial character of the mortgage, to effect a present delivery as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, is not sufficient to cut off the lien of an attachment accruing between the time the mortgage is recorded and the time the mortgagee learns of and accepts the same; but the mortgagee's acceptance of the mortgage as of the time he learned of it will be presumed, in the absence of anything indicating a contrary intention. Fischer Leaf Co. v. Whipple, 51 Mo. App. 185.

A chattel mortgage delivered by the mortgagor unconditionally to an unauthorized third person, by whom, under the directions of the mortgagor, it was filed for record, and subsequently accepted by the mortgagee, takes effect, as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, from the time of the first delivery, but not so as to persons who have acquired title to, and interest in, or a lien upon, the property, before the actual acceptance by the mortgagee. Rogers v. Heads Iron Foundry, 51 Neb. 52, 37 L. R. A. 433, 70 N. W. 527. The opinion in this case quotes, with approval, part of the criticism of Dixon, Ch. J., in Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 244, of the theory of presumed acceptance.

The delivery by the mortgagor to the register of a chattel mortgage which he had executed in performance of a promise to give his creditors some security, the exact character of which was not indicated, does not constitute a delivery to the mortgagee as against execution creditors whose lien accrued before the mortgage was in fact accepted, but the mortgage is good as against an attachment levied after the mortgagor had learned of and accepted the security. Keith v. Haggart, 2 N. D. 18, 48 N. W. 482.

When a chattel mortgage is executed in the absence, and without the knowledge, of the mortgagee, and delivered to a stranger for the latter's use, the title to the mortgaged premises does not vest in the mortgagee as between him and another creditor of the mortgagor, who acquired an interest in it by attachment between the time of the delivery to the stranger and the time when the mortgagee received actual notice of, and accepted, it, until the latter date. Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243, supra, II. c. 2, c. (1).

The lien of an attachment is superior to a chattel mortgage executed before the levy where the mortgagee did not assent to or accept such mortgage until after the levy. Griswold v. Case, 18 Wash. 623, 43 Pac. 876.

In the following case, it will be observed that priority was awarded to the attachment lien although the mortgagee knew of the mortgage before the levy:

An attachment levied on live stock after the filing of a chattel mortgage thereon, and after the mortgagee had learned of the mortgage but before he had accepted it, takes precedence of the mortgage, notwithstanding that the mortgage was executed in pursuance of a previous agreement by the mortgagor to execute a mortgage on some of his stock without, however, pointing out the particular stock. Cobb v. Chase, 54 Iowa, 253, 6 N. W. 300. The court said the mere knowledge of the mortgage could not be regarded as an acceptance of it; that acceptance involves the exercise of volition upon the part of the acceptor, and that mere knowledge does not involve the exercise of volition.

In Wadsworth v. Barlow, 68 Iowa, 599, 27 N. W. 775, an attachment levied upon a stock of goods after the execution and filing of a chattel mortgage thereon from the debtor to his wife, and after the latter had learned of the mortgage, was awarded priority over the mortgage. The decision was upon the ground that there was no declaration at the time the mortgage was recorded, that it was to be delivered to the mortgagee, or was for her use, and that such a purpose could not be presumed from the mere delivery of the mortgage for record. The court, while stating that the decisions were not uniform upon the point, conceded, for the sake of the argument, that where a mortgage beneficial to the mortgagee is left with the recorder or other person, with a declaration that it is to be delivered to the mortgagee, or is for the mortgagee's use, and the facts come to the mortgagee's knowledge, acceptance from that time may be presumed.

In National State Bank v. Morse, 73 Iowa, 174, 34 N. W. 803, the debtor, without the knowledge of the creditors, executed new notes extending the time of payment for one year, and executed and filed chattel mortgages to secure the same. After the mortgagees had learned of the mortgages, and had assented thereto, but before they knew of the new notes extending the time of payment, the property was attached by other creditors of the mortgagor. It was held that such attachment would take precedence of the mortgages. The decision is upon the ground that the assent of the mortgagees in ignorance of the facts in reference to the notes could not be regarded as an acceptance.

If, however, the mortgagee learns of and accepts the mortgage before the levy, the mortgage is superior. Wittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 1, 42 Pac. 300; Hedge v. Drew, 12 Pick. 141, 22 Am. Dec. 416; Louden v. Vinton, 108 Mich. 313, 66 N. W. 222; Buffum v. Green, 5 N. H. 71, 20 Am. Dec. 562; Keith v. Haggart, 2 N. D. 18, 48 N. W. 432; Brown v. Platt, 8 Bosw. 324.

A mortgage in favor of an absent person, executed by the mortgagor, although not accepted by the mortgagee, takes precedence of a posterior mortgage duly accepted and registered. Millaudon v. Aillard, 2 La. 551.

The assent of the mortgagees to a mortgage executed to secure pre-existing debts will be presumed from the beneficial character of the mortgage. Kennaird v. Adams, 11 B. Mon. 102. This case involved the conflicting rights of the mortgagees and creditors who had attached the property. The case does not, however, decide that the acceptance will be presumed in case of an intervening attachment, as the court had decided the attachment had failed for other reasons, and that the mortgagees were entitled 54 L. R. A.

to the property in pursuance of the mortgage, whether it was executed before or after the levy of attachment.

A chattel mortgage will take precedence of an attachment levied upon the property after the same was filed for record but before the mortgagee learned of the same, where it was given in pursuance of a previous agreement between the mortgagor and mortgagee that the former should secure the payment of the debt either by personal security or by a mortgage upon personal property to be selected by the former, and that, if a mortgage was executed, it should be delivered to the recorder. Everett v. Whitney, 55 Iowa, 146, 7 N. W. 487. The case was distinguished from Day v. Griffith, 15 Iowa, 104, and Cobb v. Chase, 54 Iowa, 253, 6 N. W. 300, by reason of the previous agreement that the mortgagor should deliver the mortgage to the recorder, and the agreement that the debtor should select the property to be included in the mortgage.

In Sargeant v. Solberg, 22 Wis. 132, it was held that a chattel mortgage filed by the mortgagor without the knowledge of the mortgagee was superior to an execution levied after the mortgage was filed, but before it was known to the mortgagee. The decision, however, is upon the ground that the mortgagor was the mortgagee's agent to accept the mortgage and file it in the clerk's office, it appearing that the mortgagee had sent money to the mortgagor to be invested at the latter's discretion, and that the mortgagor had used the money himself and executed the mortgage to secure its repayment. Harrington v. Brittan, 23 Wis. 541, is to the same effect.

In McCourt v. Myers, 8 Wis. 236, a debtor without any arrangement or understanding with or knowledge by the mortgagees, executed a chattel mortgage and placed it on file in the city clerk's office, without, however, declaring or intimating to the clerk that the mortgage was to remain under his charge for the use and benefit of the mortgagees, or doing anything to show that he regarded the filing of the mortgage as a delivery to the mortgagees, and that by that act he intended to part with possession and all power and control over the instrument. The mortgagees did not know that the mortgage had been filed until after it had been withdrawn from the files by the mortgagor, and the property had been sold to a third person, between whom and the mortgagees the question of delivery arose. The decision, however, is not put upon the ground of want of acceptance, but upon the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to authorize the conclusion that the mortgagor, by placing the mortgage on file, intended to part with all control and power over it. The court said that if such intention could have been established the case would have come within the doctrine of Cooper v. Jackson, 4 Wis. 537, supra, I.

In Mull v. Dooley, 89 Iowa, 312, 56 N. W. 513, a debtor had agreed to secure a creditor by executing a chattel mortgage, and to have the same filed for record. The mortgagee procured a notary to draft the mortgage and leave it with the mortgagor after it was executed. There had been no previous understanding as to what property the mortgage was to cover. The mortgage was executed, but the debtor neglected to file it, and the mortgagee did not know of its execution until it was delivered to him some time afterwards. It was held that the mortgage took effect only from the time of such delivery.

In Jordan v. Farnsworth, 15 Gray, 517, it was held error to charge, as a matter of law, that the delivery to the town clerk of a chattel mortgage by the mortgagor, who had agreed more than a year before with the mortgagee to execute a mortgage on the property in question, amounted to a valid delivery to the mortgagee, so as to give the mortgage precedence over the lien of an attachment levied after such delivery to the town clerk, but before the mortgage had come to the knowledge of the mortgagee. The court said that it was for the jury, under proper instructions, to say whether, upon the evidence as to the previous agreement and the acts of the parties, they were satisfied that the making and delivery of the mortgage were authorized by the mortgagee, and were done in pursuance of a previous agreement and authority so to do.

In Capital City Bank v. Hodgkin, 24 Fed. 1, a debtor, in pursuance of a previous understanding with the mortgagees, executed two mortgages to different creditors. In order that one mortgage should have a preference over the other, he had it first recorded. The mortgagee named in that mortgage, however, did not learn of her mortgage or accept it until after the other mortgage had learned of and accepted its mortgage. It was held that the mortgage first recorded was entitled to priority over the other. This decision, however, seems to be upon the ground that at the time the other mortgage was accepted, the mortgagee knew of the first mortgage and of the intention of the mortgagor to give it a preference. The court says had the creditor refused to accept the second mortgage, and obtained a lien by attachment or execution on the property, it could then have presented the claim of its rights as against the other mortgage upon the theory that it had acquired a lien upon the property before a complete delivery of the first mortgage.

A chattel mortgage executed without the knowledge of the mortgagee, and kept by the mortgagor for a number of days, after which he put it on file and informed the mortgagee thereof, who accepted the same, does not take effect until acceptance by the mortgagee. Merrill v. Denton, 73 Mich. 628, 41 N. W. 823. In this case, the mortgagee was insisting on the later date in order to bring within the lien of the mortgage, which was on a stock of goods, property added to the stock in the interval between the execution of the mortgage and its acceptance.

A chattel mortgage is not valid as against a purchaser of the property under execution against the mortgagor if not accepted until after the levy under the execution. Hemstreet v. Kutzner, 58 Ind. 319.

In Day v. Griffith, 15 Iowa, 104, a debtor executed a bill of sale to secure a creditor, and filed the same for record without the knowledge of the creditor. The property was attached by another creditor in the interval between its recording and its acceptance by the creditor. It was held that the attachment was a prior lien. The decision seems to rest ultimately upon the point that a delivery to a third person, or to the recorder, is not sufficient unless such delivery was intended by the grantor to be for the benefit of the grantee, and that such intent could not be implied from the mere delivery of the bill to the recorder. The court, however, said that it was at least doubtful, when a deed was thus delivered to a third person for the use of the grantee but without his knowledge, whether his subsequent assent would relate back to the original deposit so far as to defeat intervening rights.

A bill of sale executed without the knowledge of the buyer and deposited in the postoffice directed to the latter is subject to an attachment levied upon the property before the bill of sale reached the buyer. McCutchin v. Platt, 22 Wis. 561.

insurance for the purpose of securing a claim against the insured, delivered by him to a third person, not the agent of the assignee for any purpose, and accepted by the latter as soon as he learned of it, though good as between the assignor and assignee, is not good as against a garnishment served upon the insurance company by another creditor of the assignor in the interval between the delivery to a third person and its acceptance by the assignee. Hart v. Forbes, 60 Miss. 749.

The ratification by the principal of the unauthorized act of his agent in purchasing a stock of goods, partly in consideration of an indebtedness from the seller to the principal, and partly in consideration of a cash payment, does not relate back so as to cut off an attachment levied by a creditor of the seller between the time of the sale to the agent and its ratification by the principal. Pollock v. Cohen, 32 Ohio St. 525.

Rittmaster v. Brisbane, 19 Colo. 371, 35 Pac. 786, holds that the recording of a deed by the grantor without the knowledge of the grantee did not raise a presumption of acceptance so as to pass the title as against one claiming through a deed executed between the time of such record and the time the grantee expressed his intention to accept.

In Davis v. Cross, 14 Lea, 637, 52 Am. Rep. 177, a deed of gift of real and personal property containing the clause: "This deed will be delivered to a friend for safe keeping, with directions to deliver at such time as I may direct,"—was acknowledged for registration and delivered to a third person, inclosed in a sealed envelope, with a direction indorsed thereon to record the deed immediately after the grantor's death. The grantor subsequently, by a deed of gift, conveyed a portion of the premises to other persons. It was held that the delivery was not complete until the registration of the deed after the grantor's death, and that the subsequent conveyance was, therefore, valid.

The act of the grantor in recording a deed does not amount to a delivery where the grantee did not know of such recording, or even of the existence of the deed until after the death of the grantor. Doe ex dem. Herbert v. Herbert, Breese (Ill.) 278, 12 Am. Dec. 192. In this case the deed was found among the grantor's papers at his death. The decision, however, seems to be on the ground that there was no acceptance by the grantee during the lifetime of the grantor, and that he could not accept after the grantor's death. The controversy in this case was between the grantee and one who purchased the property at a sale by the administrator of the grantor.

In Merritt v. Temple, 155 Ind. 497, 58 N. E. 609, the maker of a promissory note which was about to become due authorized the holder to procure a loan for her from a certain person, and agreed to give her mortgage to secure the same, the proceeds of the loan to be retained by the holder of the note as a part payment thereon. She accordingly, a few days later, executed a mortgage to such person and delivered the same to the holder of the note, who thereupon entered a credit on the note for the amount of the mortgage. Immediately after executing the mortgage, and before it had been actually delivered to the mortgagee, the mortgagor executed a deed of the property to a person who knew of the mortgage. It was held that the mortgage would take precedence of the deed. It does not appear whether the holder of the note had been authorized by the mortgagee to receive the mortgage. Probably not, however, as in that case it would seem there could have been no question as to the priority of the mortgage. The court, however, does not deal specifically with the question of acceptance of the mortgage by the mortgagee. It says that the transaction was not different in legal effect than if the holder of the note, in anticipation that the mortgagee would refund the money, had in the first instance advanced the money on the mortgage to the mortgagor, and she, in turn, had given it back to him in payment of her note.

In Jackson ex dem. Eames v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 418, it was held that there was no delivery of a deed under the following circumstances: The grantor residing in New York state, agreed with the grantee in Massachusetts, to give the latter a deed of the former's farm as a security for a debt, and upon the former's return home he executed and acknowledged a deed, and left it in the clerk's office on the same day to be recorded, neither the grantee, nor any person in his behalf, being present to receive the deed; the grantee died without having received the deed, and afterward the grantor sent the deed to the grantee's son and heir. The decision is upon the ground that acceptance is essential to the delivery of a deed, and that in this case there was no acceptance by, or for, the grantee during his lifetime. The court admitted that a deed may be delivered to a stranger for, and in behalf, and to the use of, the grantee, without authority, saying, however, that if it is delivered to a stranger without any declaration that it is for the use of the grantee, it is not a sufficient delivery unless delivered as an escrow. The controversy was, in this case, between the heir of the grantee and one claiming under a mortgage executed between the time the deed was recorded and the time of the grantee's death.

In Verplank v. Sterry, 12 Johns. 536, 7 Am. Dec. 348, the grantor, after the delivery of a deed in trust to one of the cestui que trust, deeded the property to a third person. The contest was between the grantor and such third person on one side, and the cestui que trust on the other. It was held that the deed of trust was in consideration of marriage, and was good as against a subsequent purchaser.

In Partridge v. Chapman, 81 Ill. 187, where the question was as to the relative rank of a deed and mortgage, the mortgage having been recorded by the mortgagor without the mortgagee's knowledge, and afterward sent to and accepted by the mortgagee, the court held that there was no delivery until the mortgagee received the mortgage through the mail and accepted it.

In Grugeon v. Gerrard, 4 Younge & C. Exch. 119, a debtor executed a mortgage to a creditor and delivered it to his own attorney, who retained it in his possession till after the mortgagor's bankruptcy, which occurred about a month afterward. The attorney then delivered it to the mortgagees. It was held that there was a good delivery by the mortgagor to the mortgagees as against the assignees in bankruptcy.

The execution and filing of a chattel mortgage by the mortgagor pursuant to an agreement with the mortgagees to give them a mortgage whenever it became necessary to protect their interests, constitute a delivery, the consent of the mortgagees being presumed. The mortgage was upheld as against an assignment for creditors by the mortgagor, which was not effectively delivered until after the mortgage was filed. Day v. Sines, 15 Wash. 525, 46 Pac. 1048.

In Re Guyer, 69 Iowa, 585, 29 N. W. 826, a merchant, having previously agreed with one of his creditors to give him a chattel mortgage on the stock in case of financial embarrassment, executed such a mortgage and delivered it to a third person, not the agent of the mortgagee, who caused it to be recorded the day of its execution. The next day the mortgagor made an assignment for creditors. It was held that the mortgage was good as against the assignee. The court said that the law would presume that the mortgagee assented to the mortgage, but that the agreement established the assent without the aid of the presumption; that the assent expressed in the agreement was intended to and did continue up to the execution of the mortgage.

The ratification of a mortgage made and filed without the knowledge of the mortgagee will not avail against an intervening assignee of the mortgagor. Dole v. Bodman, 3 Met. 139.

Where a grantor delivers the deed to the officer, taking the acknowledgment, with unqualified instructions to deliver it to the grantee whenever he calls for it, and the grantee is informed of the deed and accepts it, but allows it to remain in the hands of the officer, the legal title vests in him, and the dower right of the widow of the grantor whom he subsequently married will not attach to the property. Black v. Hoyt, 33 Ohio St. 203. In this case the court said that the title vested in the grantee on the day the deed was delivered to the third person. It appears, however, that the grantee learned of and accepted the deed the next day, and that the marriage did not take place until some three months thereafter, so that it was immaterial whether the deed took effect on the day of its delivery to the third person, or the day of its actual acceptance by the grantee.

G. Grantor's interest in, and rights respecting, the property.

See also Prutsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, 11 Am. Rep. 592, supra, II. d.

In Loudon v. Todd, 5 J. J. Marsh. 182, the grantor, after executing the deed and forwarding it to the grantee for acceptance, but before the latter had accepted it, instituted a bill to enjoin a tenant from removing wood, etc. The court held that he could not maintain the bill because, it appearing that the grantee had finally accepted the deed, the title had already passed out of the grantor before the suit was instituted.

In Parker v. Dustin, 22 N. H. 424, a grantor executed a deed to his son, and delivered it to a third person to be delivered to the grantee after the grantor's death. The grantor afterward informed the grantee of the deed, and the latter, with his permission, took possession of the property. Subsequently the grantor agreed with a neighbor upon a boundary line. After the grantor's death the deed was delivered to the grantee as directed. The question involved was as to whether the agreement of the grantor as to the boundary line was binding upon the grantee. The following instructions were held to be correct: If it was the intention and understanding of the grantor to deposit the deed in the hands of the third person to be delivered to the grantee at his decease without any condition, and without reserving any control of the deed, or of the property during his life, the property passed at once to the grantee, and he was not bound by the agreement; but if it was the intention of the grantor to reserve control over the deed and the property during his life, the deed did not, so far as the point in question was concerned, take effect during his life, and, therefore, his agreement would be binding upon the grantee.

When a deed is delivered to a third person with instructions to deliver it to the grantee after the grantor's death, the grantor parting with all control over it, the grantee does not take a present fee in possession, but only a fee in remainder after the life estate of the grantor, which, by implication, is carved out of the fee, has terminated. Some of the cases proceed on the theory that the fee does not pass to the grantee until the delivery of the deed to him, and that his title then relates back to the original delivery. But the better rule is that the deed is immediately operative as against the grantor, and that the condition that the delivery to the grantee shall not be made until after the grantor's death is equivalent to reservation of a life estate in his favor in the land itself. The distinction, however, is not important for the purposes. Arnegaard v. Arnegaard, 7 N. D. 476, 41 L. R. A. 258, 75 N. W. 797.

A deed of conveyance in present terms is inconsistent with the retention of a life estate, and from the time when a deed is delivered as a conveyance the whole title goes with it and becomes irrevocable. Taft v. Taft, 59 Mich. 155, 60 Am. Rep. 291, 26 N. W. 426.

III. Summary.

The foregoing review of the authorities seems to warrant the following propositions: That delivery to a person previously authorized or designated by the grantee is equivalent to a delivery to the grantee himself (I.); that a valid delivery may be made by delivering the deed to a third person for the grantee with (II. a, 2) or without (II. a, 1) directions to deliver the deed to the grantee after the grantor's death, if the grantor parts with all dominion and control over the deed at the time of its delivery to the third person (II. b, 1 and 2); that the recording of a deed by the grantor, or its delivery for record by him, while not in itself the equivalent of a delivery (II. b, 3, b) will nevertheless raise a presumption of delivery (II. b, 3, a) which will prevail in the absence of evidence showing that the grantor did not intend a delivery; that the return of the deed to, and its retention by, the grantor after record, is not necessarily fatal to the presumption of delivery from the record (II. b, 3, c). The courts, while insisting upon the necessity of acceptance (II. c, 1), adopt different theories with reference thereto (II. c, 3). Each theory, however, seems to be regarded by the courts which adopt it as sufficient to uphold the delivery as between the grantee, or his privies, on the one side, and the grantor, or persons having no rights superior to his, on the other (II. c, 3, a). The majority of the cases, however, without reference to which theory as to acceptance is adopted, seem to hold, when the express question is presented, that the rights of third persons, if superior to those of the grantor, e. g., subsequent grantees or lien creditors, intervening between the delivery to the third person and actual acceptance by the grantee, are paramount to the deed (II. f).

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Kansas

v.

Balfe H. STARK, Appt.

(.....Kan.....)

- *1. All places where intoxicating liquors are sold or kept for sale, or places where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking the same, are declared by statute to be common nuisances. This fact, however, does not justify their abatement by any person or persons without process of law. They can be abated only by a prosecution instituted in behalf of the public by the proper officer. The destruction or injury to property used in aid of the maintenance of such nuisances, except in the manner provided by the statute, is a trespass.
2. A change of venue in a criminal prosecution is a wrong to the public unless the necessities of justice to the accused require it. Prejudice on the part of a judge must clearly appear. A prima facie showing of prejudice is insufficient. The case of Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622, followed.
3. In the commission of a misdemeanor there are no accessories. All persons aiding or counseling are principals.

NOTE.—The above case denying the right of private persons to destroy the property of another merely because it is used in aid of a public nuisance seems to be a novel one so far as it relates to the right to destroy such property summarily without any process of law.

That private persons have no standing to maintain an action to abate a merely public nuisance, see Innis v. Cedar Rapids, 1 F. & N. W. R. Co. (Iowa) 2 L. R. A. 282; Henry v. Newburyport (Mass.) 5 L. R. A. 179; Swan

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Shawnee County convicting him of malicious trespass. Affirmed.

Statement by Smith, J.:

The appellant, with Carrie Nation and six others, was charged by information with malicious trespass, under § 2053 of the General Statutes of 1899. The offense alleged was that defendants did, on or about the 17th day of February, 1901, wilfully, unlawfully, and maliciously break, destroy, and injure the door and windows of a building at No. 111 East Sixth street, in the city of Topeka, used as a cigar store and billiard hall by F. H. Murphy. Having obtained a separate trial, the appellant moved the court for a change of venue on the ground of the prejudice of the presiding judge against him. This application was based on language used by the judge towards Carrie Nation and three others, who were brought before him upon proceedings wherein they were held to give bond to keep the peace, the charges against them being substantially the same as those contained in the information against the appellant, to wit, the destruction of property. The latter, however, was not a party to that prosecution. In addressing Mrs. Nation and the three others, the judge stated that the action of the parties was wholly unwarranted by any construction to be placed on the law, and further said: "I want to say to you people who appear charged with having aided and abetted her, that this is a court of law, and not one of sentiment. Having broken the law, you have no more rights in this court than the jointist. Your contempt of the law is as great as his. Mrs. Nation and her followers made an attack Sunday upon a perfectly legitimate business in which $100,000 is invested. They have repeatedly broken the law, and destroyed property, and gone unhindered and unpunished. The time has come in this community when people are demanding that something be done. I want to say to you that this unwarranted destruction of property must stop. Have people no rights that a crazy woman and her deluded followers are bound to respect? There is not a lawyer in this room who will not tell you that you have no right under the law to do these things. . . . You have no right to attempt to abate a nuisance except through the regular channels. Reputable men in this community have given sanction to a movement that has led to riot, and may lead to bloodshed. I want to say to you people who have been placed under bond that if you go out on any more raids your bondsmen will be compelled to forfeit the amount to the last penny. I want to make this proposition clear to you. Property must and will be defended." The information was filed February 17th, and the case called for hearing February 20th, and thereon passed until February 25th. A motion was then made by appellant for a postponement on account of the sickness of Mr. Stone, one of his counsel, and for the reason that Mr. Martin, his other attorney, had been unable to prepare for trial. The application was made by Mr. Troutman and Mr. Bain, who appeared on behalf of the appellant, and showed that they had made no preparation for the trial. The application was overruled, a jury impaneled, and a verdict of guilty returned, followed by a fine imposed on the defendant of $25, with the costs of the prosecution.

A. 410; Mahler v. Brumder (Wis.) 31 L. R. A. 693; South Carolina S. B. Co. v. Wilmington, C. & A. R. Co. (S. C.) 83 L. R. A. 541; Miller v. Hare (W. Va.) 39 L. R. A. 491; and Griffith v. Holman (Wash.) 54 L. R. A. 178, and footnote thereto.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court did not err in overruling the application for a change of venue. The remarks of the judge were made to Carrie Nation and others in a proceeding to which the appellant was not a party. No personal prejudice towards Stark was shown. From all that appears, the judge might have been kindly disposed towards the defendant. The attack on Sunday, referred to by the judge, related to the conduct of other parties, with whom the appellant was not connected. Had the language coming from the bench been directed to Stark, he might have had reason to complain. His case was not, however, before the court at that time. It has been held that a change of venue is a wrong to the public unless the interests of justice to the defendant require it, and that prejudice on the part of a judge towards a defendant must clearly appear. It is not sufficient that a prima facie case only be shown. Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622, 627. The record shows that the district judge tried the case with fairness, and the punishment imposed was exceedingly moderate, considering that the maximum for such offenses is imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, and by fine not exceeding $500, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The granting a continuance was largely a matter within the discretion of the court. The offense charged was a misdemeanor. We do not think any of the rights of the defendant were prejudicially affected by the absence of attorneys who had prepared for the trial. He was represented by counsel of high standing and ability, and we find nothing in the record to indicate that any point favorable to him was overlooked.

There was some confusion in the answers made by the juror Hale Ritchie touching his opinion of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, but his whole examination, taken together, does not show him to have been disqualified.

Complaint is made that several of defendant's witnesses on cross-examination were subjected to rigid inquiries as to the existence of a certain organization formed for the purpose of destroying property. Nothing more was extracted by the state from such witnesses than the defendant himself confessed concerning such organization. He admitted that he was a member of a company which assembled on the state house steps, and from there moved to the place where the property in question was injured, and that he took an ax along because he thought he might be called on to use it.

There was no error in the instruction that, if the defendant was present, advising counseling, or encouraging the breaking of the doors and windows, he was equally as guilty with those actually committing the offense, although he may not in person have injured said property. In misdemeanors all concerned, if guilty at all, are principals. State v. Gurnee, 14 Kan. 111; Sharpe v. Williams, 41 Kan. 56, 20 Pac. 497.

The appellant offered to prove that the prosecuting witness, at the time the trespass was committed and his property injured and destroyed, was the keeper of a place where intoxicating liquors were sold as a beverage in violation of law, and that the property in question was unlawfully used as an accessory thereto. This offer was rejected by the court, and the testimony excluded. Upon this ruling the question arises whether, the owner of the property having employed it as an aid to the maintenance of a common nuisance, the appellant was justified in being a party to its destruction without process of law. Under our statutes all places where intoxicating liquors are sold, or where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage, or where such liquors are kept for sale, barter, or delivery in violation of the prohibitory liquor law, are declared to be common nuisances; and upon the judgment of a court having jurisdiction that such places are nuisances the sheriff or constable or marshal of any city where the same are located shall be directed to shut up and abate such places by taking possession thereof, and of all intoxicating liquors found therein, together with all signs, screens, bars, bottles, glasses, and other property used in keeping and maintaining said nuisances, and the same shall be forthwith publicly destroyed by such officer. It is further provided that the attorney general, county attorney, or any citizen of the county where such a nuisance exists may maintain an action in the name of the state to abate and perpetually enjoin it. Here is a complete legal remedy, easy to obtain, which was open to the appellant or any of his associates. Indeed, we believe it to be more drastic and summary in its application to the subject than the law of any other state in the Union. The existence of such common or public nuisance as appellant offered to show was kept by the prosecuting witness, in violation of law, injuriously affected all other persons in the city of Topeka equally with himself. It is not claimed that he was specially injured, or peculiarly or individually hurt, in any other manner or degree than in common with all others in the community. He could not have maintained an action in his own name to abate the nuisance. Jones v. Chanute (Kan.) 65 Pac. 243. In the case of Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 89, the supreme court of Massachusetts had before it a similar question. In an action of tort for breaking and entering the plaintiff's shop and carrying away and destroying a barrel of vinegar and other goods, the answer of the defendant alleged that the building was kept for the sale of intoxicating liquors, and was a public nuisance; that a large number of persons assembled to abate the same, and destroyed or injured no article of merchandise, but only spirituous liquor, unlawfully kept for sale, and did no other act and used no more force than was necessary to abate such nuisance. By statute in force in Massachusetts at that time all intoxicating liquors kept for sale, and the vessels and implements actually used in selling and keeping the same, were declared to be common nuisances, and were to be regarded and treated as such. By another statute all buildings or tenements used for the illegal keeping or sale of intoxicating liquors were declared to be common nuisances. The trial court instructed the jury that intoxicating liquors kept for sale, with the vessels containing them and articles used in their sale, being declared by law to be a common nuisance, it was lawful for any person to destroy them by way of abatement, and that such action would be the exercise of a common and lawful right. This instruction was held to be erroneous. The opinion was delivered by Shaw, Ch. J., one of the ablest of American jurists, and we extract from it such portions as are most pertinent to the question before us: "It is not lawful by the common law for any and all persons to abate a common nuisance merely because it is a common nuisance, though the doctrine may have been sometimes stated in terms so general as to give countenance to this supposition. This right and power is never intrusted to individuals in general, without process of law, by way of vindicating the public right, but solely for the relief of a party whose right is obstructed by such nuisance." Page 101. "The true theory of abatement of nuisance is that an individual citizen may abate a private nuisance injurious to him when he could also bring an action; and also, when a common nuisance obstructs his individual right, he may remove it to enable him to enjoy that right, and he cannot be called in question for so doing. As in the case of the obstruction across a highway, and an unauthorized bridge over a navigable water-course, if he has occasion to use it, he may remove it by way of abatement. But this would not justify strangers, being inhabitants of other parts of the commonwealth, having no such occasion to use it, to do the same. Some of the earlier cases, perhaps, in laying down the general proposition that private subjects may abate a common nuisance, did not expressly mark this distinction; but we think, upon the authority of modern cases, where the distinctions are more accurately made, and upon principle, this is the true rule of law." Pages 101, 102. "The keeping of a building for the sale of intoxicating liquors, if a nuisance at all, is exclusively a common nuisance; and the fact that the husbands, wives, children, or servants of any person do frequent such a place, and get intoxicating liquor there, does not make it a special nuisance or injury to their private rights, so as to authorize and justify such persons in breaking into the shop or building where it is thus sold, and destroying the liquor there found, and the vessels in which it may be kept; but it can only be prosecuted as a public or common nuisance in the mode prescribed by law." Page 102. The enunciation of the law finds approval in all the text-books upon the subject, so far as we have examined them. Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. pp. 968-969; Webb's Pollock, Torts, p. 515, note. See also Corthell v. Holmes, 87 Me. 24, 32 Atl. 715. In Webb's Pollock, on Torts, p. 517, it is stated that in England the application of the remedy of abatement by the forcible act of an individual is now in use only as to rights of common rights of way, and sometimes rights of water, "and even in those cases it ought never to be used without good advisement." A fence across a public road is a common nuisance, which a person journeying along the highway may legally abate by removing the obstruction. This is so because his progress is impeded, and particular injury is sustained by him not shared in by the community generally. This right of abatement, however, cannot be lawfully exercised by one living at a distance from the obstructed way, with no immediate occasion to use it, who goes out for the express purpose of removing the impediment in the interest of the traveling public, for fear that he or his neighbors might receive injury from it. The appellant and his associates proceeded on the erroneous belief that, because the prosecuting witness was a violator of the law, they might right the wrongs the public was suffering by his acts, and this in a summary manner, by resort to physical force, guided only by the counsels of a mob. It was a congregation of law breakers on one side retaliating upon an individual law breaker on the other for lawless acts of the latter which affected, not them alone, but hundreds of others (the public), whom they assumed to represent. Courts of justice cannot approve or countenance such disregard of the law. To do so would create and encourage disrespect for all governmental restraint, which is the beginning of anarchy. The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

*Defendant, who was a barber and owner of a shop, sold his furniture, tools, and fixtures to the plaintiffs, and agreed that he would not engage in the barber business in any manner in the town of Russell. Held, that a decree enjoining defendant from working as an employee of the owner of another barber shop in that town will be sustained.

(July 6, 1901.)

ERROR to the District Court for Russell County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enjoin defendant from engaging in the barber business. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion:

Messrs. L. B. Beardsley and W. G. Eastland, for plaintiff in error:

From reading the contract as a whole, the words as therein used, "in any manner," in their usual and ordinary interpretation, which should be given them, admit of but one construction, and that is, that plaintiff in error was not to own, operate, carry on, control, or conduct a barber business in Russell, Kansas, on his own account, or by an agent or partner.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by plaintiffs below to enjoin the plaintiff in error from working at the barber trade in the town of Russell in violation of the terms of a contract made by him with the plaintiffs. It is alleged in the amended petition that the parties entered into a written contract, a copy of which is set out, in which plaintiff in error, for adequate consideration, agreed as follows: "I, H. C. Pohlman, do hereby sell and assign all my right, title, and interest to the building now used by me as a barber shop, together with all furniture, tools, and materials in said shop, to G. F. Dawson. I also agree not to engage in the barber business in any manner in Russell, Kansas, while said G. F., E. E., or H. A. Dawson shall conduct the same." The petition avers that, at the time the action was brought, Pohlman was working at the barber trade in Russell, Kansas, in a shop run by one Clarence Lester, in violation of the terms of the contract, to the great damage of plaintiffs; that he commenced work in said shop, in violation of his agreement, on or about the 21st day of July, 1898, and has worked ever since, and is now working, at said barber trade. The defendant below demurred to this petition on the ground that it stated no cause of action. His demurrer was overruled, and, electing to stand thereon, a perpetual injunction was decreed against him, and he comes here by proceedings in error.

The principal contention is that the plaintiff in error was not violating the terms of the contract in working for the proprietor of another shop. We disagree with counsel in this claim. The contract is that Pohlman should not engage in the barber business in any manner in Russell, Kansas. This means that he would not carry on said business after the manner of either a proprietor or an employee. We think that by the comprehensive language used he contracted not to work as a barber for any other person in that town so long as defendants in error were in business. Engaging himself as an employee in a rival shop would result in greater harm to the defendants in error than if the parties had been carrying on a purely commercial business. The barber sustains personal relations with his customers, which are at least quasi professional. Formerly, by statute (32 Hen. VIII. chap. 42), in England, barbers were united with a company of surgeons; it being enacted that they should confine themselves to the operations of bloodletting and drawing teeth. While a barber no longer practises surgery or extracts teeth, his vocation depends for success on the skilful sharpening of his blade and the dexterity of its use. It differs essentially from a commercial pursuit. The patrons of a mercantile establishment are generally indifferent concerning the ability and experience of a clerk or proprietor, whose dealings with them are chiefly confined to quoting prices, and separating from the stock such quantities of goods as the customer buys. The owner may sell out to another and set up again for himself in the same business near by, yet purchasers find what is suitable to their wants still exposed for sale by the new proprietor at the old stand. Like the surgeon or dentist, when the barber moves he attracts to himself those having confidence in his ability; and, the greater his professional skill, the more difficult it is to alienate from him those to whom his services have given satisfaction. The claim that the amended petition did not relate back to the time the action was commenced cannot be sustained. There is an express averment that it does so, and the verification states that the facts set out were true when the original petition was filed.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

City of LEBANON.

A farmer who, to give his children school facilities, takes a house in town, in which he places some of his household effects and lives with his family, is not subject to taxation there, where he keeps his country house at all times in readiness to receive the family when the purpose of their sojourn in town shall have been accomplished, and performs his duties as a citizen where his country house is located, claiming that as his home.

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendant in a suit to enjoin the collection of certain taxes which had been assessed against complainant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is substantially alleged in the petition that the appellant was, and had been for many years, a citizen of Marion county, residing and making his home upon his farm, owned by him, a few miles from Lebanon; that his farm and a dwelling thereon constituted his home, and the proceeds of his cultivation and management of the farm were the source of his income from which he derives support for himself and family, and that he had no other business, that a short time since, desiring to have his children within convenient access to the schools in the city of Lebanon while they were of school age, he, with his family, removed many of his household effects to a house in the city of Lebanon owned by plaintiff's wife, and his family now occupy said house for the purpose aforesaid. It is further averred that he was still devoting his attention to his farming and his dwelling thereon, which he has never abandoned as his permanent home, and which he keeps in condition ready at all times to receive his family when the purpose of their sojourn in Lebanon shall have been accomplished, or when they desire to return; that his farm is his only home, his residence in Lebanon temporary; that he at all times continued to perform his duties as a citizen in the precinct in which his said home is situated, being a regularly appointed and acting surveyor of a public highway in said precinct; that he had not at any time sought or undertaken to exercise any of the privileges pertaining to citizens having their domicile in the city of Lebanon, and has never at any time claimed a home in said city. The petition further shows that against his protest the officers of Lebanon had listed him for taxation as a citizen, and had assessed against him for municipal taxation $1,800 of personalty, consisting of cash, cash notes, etc., and charged against him a per capita or poll tax. A perpetual injunction was asked for restraining the officers from compelling him to pay said taxes. The answer of the appellee, city of Lebanon, may be treated as a traverse of all the material averments of the petition which tend to show a right to relief. It is further alleged, in substance, that about two years before the institution of the suit plaintiff and his wife, with the intention of making the city their permanent home, constructed a very commodious and costly residence, in which plaintiff and his wife and children have resided and lived at all times since its construction. It also shows that he sends his children to the school located in the city free of charge; that his wife, Little Montgomery, did not and does not intend abandoning her home in the city of Lebanon. The reply traverses the material averments of the answer except as to the building of the house for his wife and the fact that he sends his children free to school, he paying his proportion of the tax imposed by the state for schools. The court, upon final hearing, dismissed plaintiff's petition, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

We deem it unnecessary to recite in detail the evidence at length introduced by the parties. Nor is it necessary to enter into an extended discussion of the law in respect to the domicile of a party, nor what it takes to constitute a domicile to acquire one, or to lose one's domicile. An extended discussion of these questions may be found in 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 18 et seq. The intention of a party to hold or acquire his domicile is always a very material fact, and is entitled to much weight in determining the legal domicile of a party. Notwithstanding this, the manifest actions and conduct of a party may be properly held to fix and determine his true domicile despite his declared intention. In the case at bar it is clear that appellant never became domiciled in Lebanon unless he became so by reason of the facts occurring within two years preceding this litigation. His domicile was certainly in the county, not far from Lebanon, but outside of it. His only business is farming. He cultivates his farm, or has it cultivated. Part of his household goods remains in his house on his farm. He retains the right to remove his family back to his house at any time, and he says he spends most of his time on the farm, and that he removed his family to Lebanon to stay only while his two children were in the school age, the youngest of whom was sixteen years old at the time of the trial. He says he never exercised any of the privileges of citizenship peculiar to the city, never registered there as a voter. It is true that he sends his children free to the free school in Lebanon, but it does not appear that there is any special municipal tax collected for the support of the free school, and it is claimed for appellant that, inasmuch as he pays his share of the state tax devoted to free schools, he should be allowed to send his children to the free school in whatever district they might for the time being reside. After careful consideration of the law and facts of the case, we have reached the conclusion that the appellant had not, at the time of the trial of this case, lost or abandoned his country domicile. It results, therefore, that the court erred in dismissing his petition. We do not mean, however, to determine or decide that an indefinite continuation of his residence in Lebanon, or other acts, may not work a forfeiture of his country domicile, and authorize the court to hold that his true domicile is in Lebanon.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to perpetuate the injunction against the collection of the taxes then assessed, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky, Appt.,
v.
MOBILE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....Ky.....)

1. A statute permitting a foreign railroad corporation to extend its road through the state, subject to the restrictions prescribed by its charter for its government within the state of its domicile, when accepted, constitutes a contract which will preclude the state from subsequently requiring it to become domesticated as a condition to its continued enjoyment of the privilege.
2. Compelling a foreign railroad corporation operating a portion of its road within the state to become domesticated is not an unlawful interference with interstate commerce.
3. The equal protection of the laws is not denied to a foreign railroad corporation operating a portion of its road within the state, by compelling it to become domesticated as a condition to its continuing such operation.

(September 27, 1901.)

APPPEAL by the Commonwealth from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Carlisle County in favor of defendant in a prosecution against it for violating the statute requiring it to become domesticated as a condition of continuing business within the state. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Robert J. Breckinridge for appellant.

Messrs. Lansden & Leek, Saffold Bern-ney, and Shelbourne & Kane for appellee.

O'Rear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee, Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company, was incorporated by the state of Alabama February 3, 1848, with the usual powers and privileges, looking to the construction of a line of railway from Mobile, Alabama, to some point on the Ohio or Mississippi river. On the 26th day of February, 1848, the legislature of this state passed the following enabling act:

"An Act to Authorize the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company to Extend Their Railroad from the South Boundary Line of the State of Kentucky to the Mississippi or Ohio Rivers.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky, that the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company, when formed, under the act of the general assembly of the state of Alabama, approved February 3, 1848, entitled, 'An Act to Incorporate the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company,' shall be allowed the privilege of making a necessary reconnaissance and survey, for the purpose of ascertaining the most eligible route for extending their Mobile & Ohio Railroad to any point upon the Mississippi or Ohio rivers, in this state.

"Sec. 2. That as soon as said route and point shall be ascertained, the said Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company shall be allowed the right of way for the extension and construction of their said railroad, from the Tennessee line to the Mississippi or Ohio rivers; and that they shall be entitled to all the privileges, rights, and immunities, and subject to all such restrictions as are granted, made, and prescribed, for the benefit, government, and direction of said Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company, within the state of Alabama, by the act above described." Acts 1847-48, chap. 392.

The company was formed under the charter granted by the parent state, and did build and operate thereunder its road from Mobile through Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, into and through Kentucky, and Illinois to St. Louis, Missouri. Appellee has been operating its line of railroad under the legislative grants above named from 1848 to the present time although a portion of its road in Kentucky, from South Columbus to East Cairo, a distance of some 20 miles, was built since 1856, and along the line of way proposed for the Kentucky & Tennessee Railroad Company, incorporated by the legislature of this state February 23, 1870. The charter privileges of the latter company seem to have been acquired by appellee by permissive provisions of both the charters of appellee and of the Kentucky & Tennessee Railroad Company. Section 841, Ky. Stat., which became a law July 12, 1893, provides as follows: "No company, association, or corporation created by, or organized under, the laws or authority of any state or country other than this state, shall possess, control, maintain, or operate any railway, or part thereof in this state until, by incorporation under the laws of this state, the same shall have become a corporation, citizen, and resident of this state. Any such company, association, or incorporation may, for the purpose of possessing, controlling, maintaining, or operating a railway or part thereof in this state, become a corporation, citizen, and resident of this state by being incorporated in the manner following, namely: By filing in the office of the secretary of state, and in the office of the railroad commission, a copy of the charter or articles of incorporation of such company, association, or corporation, authenticated by its seal and by the attestation of its president and secretary; and thereupon and by virtue thereof, such company, association, or corporation shall at once become and be a corporation, citizen, and resident of this state. The secretary of state shall issue to such corporation a certificate of such incorporation." Appellee continued to operate its road in Kentucky after the passage of the foregoing act, and, failing to incorporate under the laws of this state, it was indicted and tried in the Carlisle circuit court in November, 1900, for the alleged violation of the provisions of this act. The circuit court found the defendant not guilty, and the commonwealth has appealed.

Following is the judgment rendered by the circuit court: "This cause coming on for trial, the defendant entered a motion to dismiss the indictment for the following reason: That §§ 841, 842, Ky. Stat., on which this indictment is based, are unconstitutional. And for the purpose of trying the constitutional question the facts were agreed and written, and were filed, and Exhibits A, B, C, D, and E filed as evidence, the same specified in agreement of facts, and jury was waived, and cause submitted to the court on the agreed facts, whereupon the court held that § 841 did not apply to defendant company, or, if it did apply to defendant company, that it was unconstitutional, in that it impairs the obligation of the grant of the Kentucky general assembly to the M. & O. R. R. Co., approved February 26, 1848, and, so far as that company is concerned, that it is a regulation of commerce among the states; and therefore the indictment is dismissed, to all of which the commonwealth objects and excepts, and prays an appeal, which is granted."

It was the contention of appellee on the trial below, and is its argument here, that the act of February 26, 1848, quoted above, constituted a contract between the state of Kentucky and the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company; that, therefore, in so far as the provisions of § 841, Ky. Stat., passed subsequent to February, 1848, imposed additional conditions upon, or in any wise altered the provisions of, the original grant to appellee, it was not applicable to this company, or, if applicable, such provisions were contrary to the provisions of § 10, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States. It was and is further urged by appellee that, its business being admittedly the carrying of commodities and passengers between and among two or more of the states, it was interstate commerce, and that § 841 is an interference with said interstate business, and violates the 3d clause of § 8, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States. It is again argued for appellee that § 841 violates the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that it denies to foreign railroad companies in Kentucky the equal protection of the laws.

What was the nature of the grant, or, rather, the legal character and effect of the act of legislature of February 26, 1848, conferring certain privileges upon appellee corporation?

The position assumed in argument for the commonwealth by the attorney general is that the act "is neither a charter, a contract, nor a grant, but is only a license." It is not claimed by appellee that the act is a charter, as that term is generally applied in law. And it argues that "contract" embraces both "grant" and "license." It is to be observed that the Kentucky legislature, by the act in question, in the very title of it, stated the purpose of the act, viz.: "An Act to Authorize the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company to Extend Their Railroad from the South Boundary Line of the State of Kentucky to the Mississippi or Ohio Rivers." It may be assumed that both the legislature of Kentucky and the railroad company regarded the permission of the state to construct and operate the railway through its territory to be necessary. This act was to grant to the railroad company that consent, and to impose the terms upon which the privilege or right was granted. The first section of the act gave the company the right, upon its organization under the original charter, "to make any necessary reconnaissance and survey for the purpose of ascertaining the most eligible route" for extending the proposed road. Section 2 of the act then provided that after such route might be ascertained the railroad company "shall be allowed the right of way for the extension and construction of their said railroad from the Tennessee line to the Mississippi or Ohio rivers." Thus are the purpose of the act and the right conferred clearly set forth. It may be said, without question, that the Kentucky legislature may have imposed such conditions upon the exercise of the right granted as to it seemed just and expedient. And the conditions so imposed would be part of the grant. Now, what were the conditions actually imposed? We find them in the language of the closing clauses of the 2d section of the act,—that the company "shall be entitled to all the privileges, rights, and immunities, and subject to such restrictions as are granted, made, and prescribed, for the benefit, government, and direction of said Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company, within the state of Alabama, by the act above described." Act Feb. 3, 1848. The state of Kentucky having offered the right to construct and operate the railroad in question, and named the only restrictions reserved by it to be ones similar to those reserved in the charter granted by Alabama, it remained to the company to either accept the terms named, and build subject to them, or to refuse to enter the state with its road. It chose the former course. The terms of the Alabama charter are contained in the copy of the act of its general assembly, approved February 3, 1848, and copied into the record. It is sufficient to say that there is nothing in that requiring or looking to the imposition of such conditions as are named in § 841, Ky. Stat.

What may constitute a grant by the state a contract, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution? Since Dartmouth Col- lege v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629, and perhaps the most famous judicial utterance of the past century, it has not been an open question in this country that a legislative grant to a corporation is a contract, within the meaning of the Constitution. Where the legislature grants franchises or privileges to a corporation, without reservation of right to amend or repeal the grant, and the corporation accepts it, and expends money or acquires property rights based thereon, it is not competent for the state to subsequently, by amendment or independent enactment, impose additional conditions upon the privilege of exercising the franchises or using the rights so previously granted. On this point Mr. Justice Story, in the first-cited case, said pp. 683, 684, 4 Wheat., and p. 670, 4 L. ed.: "When a contract has once passed bona fide into grant, neither the King nor any private person who may be the grantor can recall the grant of the property, although the conveyance may have been purely voluntary. A gift completely executed is irrevocable. The property conveyed by it becomes, as against the donor, the absolute property of the donee, and no subsequent change of intention of the donor can change the rights of the donee. 2 Bl. Com. 441; Jenkins, Cent. 104. And a gift by the Crown of incorporeal hereditaments, such as corporate franchises, when executed, comes completely within the principle, and is, in the strictest sense of the terms, a grant. 2 Bl. Com. 317, 346; Shep. Touch. chap. 12. . . . And a grant of franchises is not, in point of principle, distinguishable from a grant of any other property." And he further said (p. 675, 4 Wheat., and p. 668, 4 L. ed.): "Unless a power be reserved for this purpose, the Crown cannot, in the virtue of its prerogative, without the consent of the corporation, alter or amend the charter, or divest the corporation of any of its franchises, or add to them." And further along (p. 699, 4 Wheat., and p. 674, 4 L. ed.): "In respect to franchises, whether corporate or not, which include a perannuity of profits, such as a right of fishery, or to hold a ferry, a market, or a fair, or to erect a turnpike, bank, or bridge, there is no pretense to say that grants of them are not within the Constitution. . . . The truth, however, is that all incorporeal hereditaments, whether they be immunities, dignities, offices, or franchises, or other rights, are deemed valuable in law. . . . Whenever they are the subject of a contract or grant, they are just as much within the reach of the Constitution as any other grant." That this case, decided in 1819, both from its profoundly important utterances, as well as the connection with it of most illustrious and distinguished advocates and jurists, attracted the attention of the Kentucky legislature, in common with that of all other lawmaking bodies, cannot be doubted. Yet the legislature omitted to reserve in its grant of 1848 any right of future control over the rights ceded to the railroad company, further than were retained by the provisions of the Alabama charter. Furthermore, we find that the legislature, by its act of February 14, 1856, tacitly recognized that it had no control over such rights as it had previously granted to corporations, and which rights had become vested, for it provided in the act of that date as follows: "All charters and grants of or to corporations, or amendments thereof, enacted or granted since the 14th of February, 1856, and all other statutes, shall be subject to repeal at the will of the general assembly, unless a contrary intent be therein plainly expressed: provided, that whilst privileges and franchises so granted may be repealed, no repeal shall impair other rights previously vested." [Ky. Stat. (1894) § 1987].

We are now brought to the consideration of the question whether, if the provisions of § 841, Ky. Stat. be applied to appellee, it is an impairment of its grant of February 26, 1848. On this point the attorney general argues that an obedience by appellee to § 841 would not require it to "surrender a single right or power it has ever lawfully had or exercised in Kentucky." But, if it could not lawfully exercise them as heretofore, that would be equivalent to being denied the right to exercise them at all. For appellant it is argued that, to fulfil the requirement of the section named, it would be compelled to change its status from that of a foreign corporation to a domestic one. In other words, it would be compelled to become a citizen of Kentucky. One of the advantages now thought to pertain to its non-residency is the privilege of claiming the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in certain actions. Others of equal or greater value in fact may readily occur to the mind. But we apprehend that the real question is not to the extent of any change of condition, but whether there is in fact any change. The imposition of further conditions to be performed by the grantee, other than the police regulations, before it can lawfully use or enjoy the privileges theretofore granted to it, is essentially a change of the contract. A case very much like the one at bar is that of New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 153 U. S. 628, 38 L. ed. 846, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 952. It appears that the railroad company, a New York corporation, was permitted by an act of the Pennsylvania legislature to build some 42 miles of its railway through two counties of the latter state. The permission was granted upon certain stated conditions in regard to taxation and rate of freight on certain kinds of coal, etc. Subsequently the state of Pennsylvania enacted a law under a section of which it sought to levy and collect a tax upon the New York corporation on an entirely different basis from that prescribed in the act granting the franchise or right to build its road in the state. The company resisted the attempt. The state courts having decided the question adversely to it, it appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. In the latter court it was held, speaking of the effect of the Pennsylvania acts: "Those acts prescribed the terms and conditions upon which Pennsylvania assented to the company's constructing and operating its road through limited portions of its territory.

Consistently with those terms and conditions Pennsylvania cannot withdraw the assent which it gave, upon a valuable consideration, to the construction and operation of the defendant's road within its limits. Nor can the right of the company to enjoy the privileges so obtained be burdened with conditions not prescribed in the acts of 1841 and 1846, except such as the state, in the exercise of its police powers for purposes of taxation and for other public objects, may legally impose with respect to business carried on and property situated within its limits." If § 841 is applied to appellee, it will be required, in order to continue the use and enjoyment of the privileges granted to it in 1848, to do something in addition to that required by the terms of its grant. It will be compelled to take up the burdens of a citizenship, which it has not hitherto had to bear, and deprive itself of privileges deemed by many, or all similarly situated, to be of considerable pecuniary value. This would be manifest, substantial impairment of the obligation of the state's contract, and is therefore repugnant to § 10, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States.

The majority of the court are of the opinion that, even were the statute in question (§ 841) enforced against appellee it would not be such an interference with the interstate traffic in which appellee is engaged as to fall within the inhibition of the Federal Constitution on that subject. Nor is the court of opinion that the 14th Amendment to the Constitution is in any wise infringed, or would be, by the enforcement of the statute in question against the appellee.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....Ky.....)

A railroad company is liable to one who, having without right and while in a drunken and helpless condition at night boarded a train standing in a cut, is immediately ejected from the train with knowledge on the part of the trainmen that a passenger train will soon pass through the cut, for injuries by the latter train, which APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Simpson County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Roark & Finn, for appellant:

In exercising the right of ejecting passengers, it should not be done at a time and place, and under such conditions and circumstances, as would necessarily expose the person ejected to great peril of life or bodily harm, whether the attendant danger arises from the natural infirmity of the person or is self-imposed.

Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 81 Ky. 624, 50 Am. Rep. 186; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Johnson, 108 Ala. 62, 31 L. R. A. 372, 19 So. 51; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Logan, 88 Ky. 232, 3 L. Rep. 108; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ellis, 97 Ky. 330, 30 S. W. 979; Thurman v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1344, 34 S. W. 803; Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 103 Ky. 211, 44 S. W. 648; Railway Co. v. Valleley, 32 Ohio St. 345, 30 Am. Rep. 601; Burch v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. 3 App. D. C. 346, 26 L. R. A. 129; Haug v. Great Northern R. Co. 8 N. D. 23, 42 L. R. A. 667, 77 N. W. 97.

The law requires humane treatment. It censures that conduct which evinces such a disregard for human life as to shock the conscience of good citizenship.

If the station agent at Franklin knew that Fagg was in this deep cut upon this dark and stormy night, upon defendant's roadbed, and in a drunken helpless condition, and also knew that this north-bound passenger train would of necessity run over and probably kill him, and yet stood idly by, perfectly unconcerned, taking no precaution whatever, absolutely failing to notify those in charge of said passenger train to be on the lookout and guard against any injury to him, is not such conduct just as cruel, as brutal, as merciless, and as inhuman as if those actually in charge of said north-bound train had notice of his danger and failed to take any precaution to prevent the same?

The company is liable for an injury to trespassers by negligence when those in charge of the train discover the peril, because knowledge of danger by the servants in charge of the train is knowledge by the company, they being agents of the company.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Coleman, 86 Ky. 556, 6 S. W. 438, 8 S. W. 875.

The crew upon the passenger train could have stopped and rescued Fagg without endangering the life of any passenger; bringing it within the rule laid down in Reed v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 816, 47 S. W. 591.

Messrs. J. A. Mitchell and Edward W. Hines, for appellee:

Neither paragraph of the petition states a cause of action.

If Fagg had been discovered in the attempt to board the train, and defendant's servants had prevented him from doing so, would defendant have owed him the duty of removing him to a place of greater safety? Clearly not, and surely the fact that he succeeded in getting on the train before he was discovered did not deprive defendant's servants of the right to put him off at the very place where he got on.

Reed v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 20 Ky. L. Rep. 815, 47 S. W. 591.

The mere allegation that the defendant's agents knew of the presence of Fagg on the track in a drunken and helpless condition is not sufficient to show that they had reason to believe that he could not get out of the way of an approaching train.

Notice will not be imputed to the principal, unless the knowledge of the fact reaches the agent while acting for his principal, either generally, or with reference to the transaction to which the notice relates.

Paynter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, J. P. Waldron, administrator of Solon Fagg, deceased, instituted this suit against the appellee to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of the intestate. The question here for review is the action of the court in sustaining a demurrer to the petition as amended, and in dismissing it upon appellant's failure to plead further. It is in two paragraphs, but, in our opinion, it was not necessary or proper to thus paragraph it. If it is good, it simply states one cause of action; that is, the appellee's negligent killing of the appellant's intestate, which resulted in damage to the estate of the intestate. Because there may have been one or more acts of negligence which produced the injury resulting in death does not make it proper, in stating the cause of action, to do so in as many paragraphs as there may have been acts of negligence which separately or collectively produced the injury. So, in stating the averments of the petition, we will do so as though it was not paragraphed. It is averred that there is a deep cut upon the defendant's roadbed in the city of Franklin, immediately north of defendant's north switch; that upon a night in December, 1898, the decedent, Solon Fagg, was in a drunken and helpless condition, and at about 8:00 o'clock upon that night, while in that condition, boarded the north-bound freight train in the cut; that the night was dark and rainy; that the agents and servants of defendant in charge of the freight train knew the drunken and helpless condition of the decedent; that they knew that other trains of the defendant would shortly pass through the cut, yet they then and there negligently and wrongfully ejected him from the train; that it was natural and probable that death or great bodily harm would be inflicted upon him by reason of being ejected from the train; that upon the same night, while upon the track in the cut, drunk and in a helpless condition, he was run over and killed by one of the defendant's trains; that upon the night in question the defendant's superintendent at Nashville, Tennessee, and its agent at Franklin, Kentucky, had notice that he was in the cut upon defendant's track in a drunken and helpless condition; that the superintendent and agent knew that in a short while a north-bound passenger train would pass through the cut where he was, and that he was in great danger; that the superintendent and agent had ample time and opportunity to notify defendant's crew in charge of the north-bound passenger train which would shortly pass through the cut that he was in the cut, and to take other precautions to prevent his injury; that they failed to notify the crew upon that north-bound passenger train concerning him, and failed and refused to use any care or take any precaution to prevent injury to him; that the north-bound passenger train ran over and killed him in the cut upon the night in question. In an amended petition it is averred that the decedent was killed at the point where he was ejected from the train; that if the superintendent at Nashville and the agent at Franklin had notified the crew upon the passenger train of the position which he occupied, and of his condition, those in charge of it could and would have avoided injuring him, without endangering the passengers or the train. The foregoing averments are substantially those contained in the petition as amended; at any rate, all those that are essential to be stated for the purpose of considering the sufficiency of the petition. They are taken as true on demurrer.

For the purpose of considering the question involved, the facts averred may be summarized as follows: Decedent, without a right to do so, placed himself upon a freight train, and thus became a trespasser. He did this while the train was standing in a deep cut, on a dark and rainy night in December. While he was in a drunken and helpless condition, he was ejected from the train in the cut, and left there in the condition described. This condition was known to those in charge of the train from which he was ejected. They also knew that shortly thereafter a passenger train would pass over the track through the cut. The superintendent of the road at Nashville, and the agent at Franklin, the station near by where the ejection took place, were notified that he was on the track in the cut in a drunken and helpless condition, and this notice they received in time to have saved him from the impending peril by the exercise of ordinary care, and in doing which it would not have hazarded the lives of the passengers or the property of the appellee. The question is not involved as to the right of those in charge of the freight train to have ejected the decedent. That he was a trespasser, and the right to eject him, is admitted. The law gave the right to the agents and servants of the appellee to eject him. The question here for determination is whether they should have ejected him at the time, place, and under the circumstances averred in the petition, considering his mental and physical condition. The liability of appellee, if it exists, arises from the disregard of those in charge of the freight train for human life while in the performance of a legal right, and the disregard for human life by the appellee's superintendent and agent after they were advised of the perilous position which the decedent occupied, and their failure to use care to save him. All courts and all law writers agree that those in charge of a train have no right to throw a trespasser from it while moving, and thus jeopardize his life. Principles of humanity forbid the exercise of the right in such a cruel manner. For the same reason, if they eject a trespasser who is not imperiling the lives of the officers in charge of the train, or the passengers, or doing something which makes it hazardous to permit him to remain upon the train (Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Logan, 88 Ky. 232, 3 L. R. A. 90, 10 S. W. 655), they must be regarded of the time, place, and circumstances under which they perform the act of removal. If the decedent had boarded the train several miles from the cut, and after reaching there had been removed, under the circumstances described, it seems to us that no one could have had any difficulty in reaching the conclusion that death or great bodily harm would have been the natural and probable result of the removal, and a liability would have been incurred by the appellee. In this case, according to the averments of the petition, he got on the train, and, after getting on, was a trespasser, just the same as if he had boarded it at another station, and been carried to that point. Getting on the train was an accomplished fact. The fact that he had just got on the train while it was standing in the cut did not give those in charge of it the right to seize and hurl him from it, without regard to consequences; neither did that fact give them the right to eject him, regardless of time, place, and circumstances, and his physical and mental condition. They had no more right to jeopardize his life in his removal because he had been on the train but a short time than they would have had if he had been carried to that point from elsewhere. The right to remove a trespasser does not depend upon the question as to the length of time he has been on the train, neither is the liability of the railroad company affected by the fact that the trespasser has been on the train a long or a short time. That fact has nothing to do with the case. The same responsibility attaches for the removing of him in the one case as in the other.

The principle which underlies the doctrine enunciated in Louisville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Sullivan, 81 Ky. 624, 50 Am. Rep. 186, and Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ellis, 97 Ky. 330, 30 S. W. 979, is applicable to the facts of this case. Sullivan was drunk, and failed to pay his fare on demand, and was removed while in a drunken condition, in a deep snow, and fell and laid in it until he was badly frozen, entailing the loss of some toes, fingers, and part of his heel. The court held that the railroad company was liable for the injury resulting to him under the circumstances detailed. In the Ellis Case, the removal took place when he was drunk and in a cut in the road, on either side of which was a wire fence, and the court held that if the natural and probable result of his removal, under such circumstances, was that he would be killed by trains that would subsequently follow, then the company was liable. In condemning an instruction in that case which assumed the agents of the railroad company had the right to eject a trespasser, regardless of the time, place, and circumstances and his physical and mental condition, the court said: "It seems to us that the ordinary principles which characterize humanity condemn such claim. If the claim of appellee be true, that the decedent was ejected in a cut, away from any station, with banks and fences on either side of the track, in such mental or physical condition as rendered him incapable of taking care of himself, the officer with a knowledge of his condition, then it was no less wrong to eject decedent under such circumstances than it would have been to have ejected from the train a toddling child who had not mental capacity to know the danger of walking upon a railroad track, or the physical ability to avoid such danger if it had the mental capacity to discern it. Would anyone contend, if appellant should kill a child under such circumstances, that it would not be liable to damages therefor?" To show the views that other courts have on questions substantially similar to the one here involved, we will quote from opinions delivered by them. It was said in Haug v. Great Northern R. Co. 8 N. D. 23, 42 L. R. A. 669, 77 N. W. 97: "When the carrier discovers that one helpless from intoxication is upon its train without right, it must, in selecting a safe place to put him off, have regard to his actual condition, physical and mental, without any reference to his responsibility for such condition. The law declares to the carrier that it shall not expose him to great peril, even in exercising its undoubted right to eject him; and, in declaring whether he will be subjected to peril, not only must climatic conditions, the propinquity of shelter, and other matters be taken into account, but also the actual state of his mind and bodily health and strength, if known to the agent of the carrier." In Railway Co. v. Valleley, 32 Ohio St. 349, 30 Am. Rep. 601, the court said: "It might, perhaps, as far as this case is concerned, be conceded that, if a man were so intoxicated as to be without reason, sense, or intelligence, it would be unlawful, as it would be inhuman, to expel him from cars at night, where he would be just as likely as not to lie down upon the rails and go to sleep. We may concede, further, that to put off a drunken man, during a bitterly cold night, in the woods, far from any house, when the probabilities were that he would freeze to death before help could reach him, would be as indefensible in law as it would be wicked and cruel in fact. And, further, to put a man off, in a dark night, upon a high railroad bridge, or upon the brink of a precipice, where the first step would be destruction,—this could find no justification in law. All this might possibly be." In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Weber, 33 Kan. 554, 52 Am. Rep. 543, 6 Pac. 877, the court said: "The duty of the railroad company, however, with respect to Weber, did not end with his removal from the train. He was unconscious, and unable to take care of himself. The company could not leave him upon the platform helpless, exposed, and without care or attention. It was its duty to exercise reasonable care and diligence to make temporary provision for his protection and comfort. As was said by the learned court who tried the cause: 'Of course, the carrier is not required to keep hospitals or nurses for sick or insane passengers, but, when a passenger is found by the carrier to be in such a helpless condition, it is the duty of the carrier to exercise the reasonable and necessary offices of humanity towards him until some suitable provision may be made.'" In Conolly v. Crescent City R. Co. 41 La. Ann. 61, 3 L. R. A. 133, 5 So. 259, 6 So. 526, the court said: "But none of these cases hold that this right of exclusion can be exercised arbitrarily and inhumanely, or without due care and provision for the safety and well-being of the ejected passenger. On the contrary, the duty of exercising such care and provision is universally recognized." In Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 109 Ind. 186, 58 Am. Rep. 387, 6 N. E. 310, 10 N. E. 70, the court, referring to some cases, said: "These are cases—extreme ones, it may be—illustrating the doctrine that regard must be had to the helpless condition of one who enters a railroad train, and that those in charge of the train must do no act which is cruel or inhuman. Granting that these cases are extreme ones, still the general doctrine which they assert is undeniably a sound one; for through all the cases runs the principle that what humanity requires must be done by those who act with knowledge of another's helplessness." In Roseman v. Carolina O. R. Co. 112 N. C. 716, 19 L. R. A. 327, 16 S. E. 766, the court said: "But where the power expressly given by law is exercised in such a manner as to wilfully and wantonly expose the ejected person to danger of life or limb, the company is still liable for injury or death resulting from the expulsion. Cases falling within this last exception to the general rule, and not intended to be included under the statute, arise where the persons ejected are manifestly too infirm to travel, or too much intoxicated to be trusted to find the way to the nearest house or station. 3 Wood, Railway Law, § 362; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 493; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Wright, 68 Ind. 586, 34 Am. Rep. 277." In Brown v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 51 Iowa, 238, 1 N. W. 487, the court said: "In exercising the right of ejection, reasonable and ordinary care should be employed. In determining whether such care has been exercised, all the circumstances should be considered,—as the physical condition of the person ejected; the time, whether in daylight or late at night; the condition of the country, whether thickly or sparsely settled; the place of the ejection, whether near to, or remote from, dwellings of any character, including stations; the character of the weather, whether pleasant or inclement, etc. The rules of law, as well as the dictates of humanity, require that the ejection shall occur at such place, and be conducted in such manner, as not unreasonably to expose the party to danger." Judge Elliott, in his work on Railroads (§ 1637), says: "If he is so intoxicated or so young or feeble as not to be able to take care of himself, or look out for his own safety, the company should exercise reasonable care to see to it that he is not expelled and abandoned in such a place, and under such circumstances, that he will be exposed to unnecessary peril." The conclusion which we have reached is supported by Isbell v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 27 Conn. 393, 71 Am. Dec. 78.

Should the company be held responsible because its superintendent at Nashville and agent at Franklin knew that the decedent was on the track in a drunken and helpless condition, and that shortly thereafter a train would pass over its track through the cut, and failed to notify those in charge of it of his situation, and thus avoid the calamity which befell him? We think it should. The knowledge of these officers was the knowledge of the company. From the averments, they could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. They could have saved the life of the unfortunate man by giving notice to those in charge of the passenger train of his peril. It would be a strange doctrine of ethics and of law if an unfortunate man, on a dark, cold night, in a drunken and helpless condition, is on the track of a railway company in a deep cut, and that fact is known to the superintendent, together with the knowledge that a passenger train will soon pass over the track through the tunnel, and will probably kill him, that the company is not responsible if its superintendent could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care, and failed to do so. We are of the opinion that if the death of decedent would naturally and probably flow from the act of his removal from the train at the time, place, and under the circumstances in his physical and mental condition, then the company is liable. We are also of the opinion that, if the company could not be made responsible for the acts of its agents and servants in thus removing the decedent, still if he was on the track in a drunken and helpless condition, and the superintendent at Nashville and the agent at Franklin knew of his situation, and failed to exercise ordinary care to save his life, by notifying those who were in charge of the train which was soon to pass over its track through the cut, and those in charge of the train could have, without hazarding the lives of the passengers on it or the property of the company, avoided running over him, the company is liable.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

SMITH BROTHERS & COMPANY

v.

NEW ORLEANS & NORTHEASTERN

and

CHARLESTON & SAVANNAH RAILWAY COMPANY et al., Appts.

(106 La. 11.)

*1. This is an action for damages for the breach of an obligation of the carriers to carry goods in bond. Plaintiff's instructions were not misleading, but in all respects were clear enough. The reasons of plaintiff for desiring the goods to come from Charleston in bond were evident enough to warn defendants not to take them out of bond. Proper papers were delivered by plaintiff for obtaining the goods to be carried in bond. The goods were taken out of bond without authority, and were, in consequence, of less value at the point of destination than they would have had, had they been brought there in bond, as intended by plaintiff. The defendants are liable for damages which might have been foreseen. They knew that plaintiff was a merchant who would seek to sell his goods in the most favorable market. It was not proper for them to assume (although they were in good faith) that it was as well to pay the duties in Charleston, and there take the goods out of bond, thereby rendering it no longer possible to export them from New Orleans. Taking the goods out of bond was an act of interference with plaintiff's right, rendering the defendants responsible for actual damages.

*2. Between the two defendants—the one the initial line and the other the continuing line to the point of destination—the responsibility is solidary; both having taken part in the taking of the goods out of bond, and the carrying of them to the point of destination.

*Headnotes by BREAUX, J.

NOTE.—The above case seems to be of first impression with respect to the liability of a common carrier which has engaged to transport imported goods in bond, for paying the duties and taking the goods out of bond without authority.

Parish of Orleans, Division B, in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract to transport rice in bond. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Henry J. Leovy and Rice & Montgomery, for appellants:

There was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and these appellants.

The averment in the answer of these appellants, to the effect that plaintiff did not furnish the necessary papers to obtain shipment of his goods in bond, is not disproved by plaintiff, on whom was the burden of proof.

The "special circumstances" making it important to plaintiff that the goods should arrive at New Orleans in bond were not communicated to these appellants, who cannot, therefore, be held to have "contemplated" or to have "foreseen" the damages that might result from the duties being paid in Charleston.

Under the instructions communicated to them, these appellants were justified in believing that it was not a matter of consequence to plaintiff whether the duties were paid in Charleston or New Orleans, as according to said instructions they were to be paid.

The evidence does not show that rice, or such rice as that of this shipment, is habitually imported for re-exportation, or for the purpose of selling to the United States; but, if it did, how were these defendants to know the grade of the rice, or the custom of trade in it? The very circumstances of the present suit show that such importations in bond cannot be frequent.

Hadley v. Barendale, 9 Exch. 341, has been repeatedly affirmed as applicable to similar cases in the United States.

United States Teleg. Co. v. Gilderslove, 29 Md. 249, 96 Am. Dec. 519.

Mr. Harry H. Hall for appellee railroad company.

Messrs. Denegre, Blair, & Denegre for appellee corporation.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff claims damages in the sum of $2,182.66, growing out of defendants' failure to carry a consignment of rice in bond. Plaintiff avers, substantially, that 218,260 pounds of rice were shipped to it from Hamburg on the steamship Dalmatia, due to arrive in Charleston, South Carolina, in May, 1898; that, through their agents, the defendant railroads applied to plaintiff for the transportation of the consignment over their line of railroads from the port above named to New Orleans; that plaintiff made known to these agents that it wanted the rice carried in bond, as sanctioned by a statute of the United States (without custom duty), and that for that reason they were not willing to pay the custom duty of 2 per cent per pound at the port of Charleston; that, after having been informed of plaintiff's desire, the defendants' agents advised it of their willingness and ability to transport this rice on the conditions before stated; that, on receiving this information, plaintiff delivered its bill of lading to the agents of the Northeastern Railroad Company, who promised to make all needful arrangements with the steamship before named, and with the custom-house authorities at Charleston, and with other connecting railroads, for the transportation of the rice through to New Orleans in bond, without payment of custom duties; that the said railroad company bound itself to deliver this rice in bond to plaintiff in New Orleans for 25 cents per 100 pounds, for all charges. The invoice, dated May 10, 1898, issued in Hamburg for the 1,000 bags of rice in question, which in due time was placed in the hands of the Plant Railroad System, after the arrival of the steamship Dalmatia at Charleston, among other statements, contained the following: "To be shipped per Str. Dalmatia to Charleston in bond for New Orleans." On May 25th the agent here wrote to the representative of the Plant System, inclosing the invoice to which we have just referred. The letter contained the following, among other, statements: "As I understand it, the Plant System is a bonded line, and there will be no difficulty in handling the business to New Orleans. All custom-house duties to be paid here by Smith Bros. & Co., Limited." A member of the plaintiff firm testified that when he delivered the bill of lading to the agent in New Orleans, in the presence of the agent of the Plant System, who was here at that time, he stated to them that it was necessary for the rice to come in bond. He also stated, as a witness, that he declined to turn over his rice to a rival system of railroads, to be hauled for the same rate, as he was led to believe that the Plant System was also a bonded road. As relates to the Plant System, its codefendant, the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company, charges that the former agent falsely represented that their system was a bonded line, and also represented that they could bring the rice from Charleston to New Orleans without the payment of duty, and that they paid the duty, although well aware that they ought not to have paid it. This defendant avers that the judgment of the lower court released the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company from all liability, and held its codefendant the Plant System for the damages, because it had not committed the breach of contract of which plaintiff complained; that it was pretended by the officers of the Plant System that their officials had been misled by a letter of instructions sent by the agent of the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company,—a position not sustained in the district court; that the officers of the Plant System always understood that the rice in question was to be shipped in bond; that they were informed by the customs officials in Charleston that their line was not a bonded road, and, instead of notifying plaintiff, they purposely withheld the information until June 2d, and after they paid the duties; and that this was done only in order to cover the freight upon the haul. It appears that about June the rice arrived in New Orleans, but not in bond, in violation of the agreement to which we have just referred. The New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company refused to deliver the rice to plaintiff without payment to it of the custom charges, amounting to $4,362.12, and the freight charges of 25 cents per 100 pounds. To prevent loss and to avoid a forced sale, plaintiff paid these amounts under protest, and reserved all of its rights to sue for and recover the amount thus paid to this railroad. Plaintiff, in its petition, sets out at some length the loss it incurred in consequence of defendant's disregard and violation of the agreement as stated, growing out of the fact, it avers, in substance, that the rice could have been more profitably handled and sold here in bond than with the custom duties paid, for the reason that if it had been in bond it could have been exported to foreign markets, or it could have been sold to the United States government, which at the time was buying large quantities of such food for its armies, and, further, that plaintiff could not profitably handle so large a quantity of rice not in bond, owing to the limited sales of rice in the local market at the time. Plaintiff charges that all these facts were well known to the defendants when they promised to transport the rice in bond. Plaintiff avers that it had to sell this rice in the local market for less than it cost, and that if the defendants had complied with their contract as a common carrier, instead of losing it would have made a profit. It claimed from the defendants in solido the amount of loss it alleges it has sustained, and the profits it would have made. The final balance of the exhibit annexed to the petition reads, "Actual loss per pound $.0156." The defendants filed separate answers. The New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company admits that a consignment of rice was made to the plaintiff as alleged, and specially avers that it was agreed by its agent with the agent of the Plant System that the rice was to come from Charleston to New Orleans over the Plant System and this defendant's road in bond, and that it was understood that the customs duty of 2 cents per pound should not be paid in the port of Charleston. This defendant avers that it was in no wise responsible for the failure of the Plant System of railroads to carry out the instructions received, or to fulfil the undertaking it had assumed, and that, if any payment of the duty in question made by the Plant System has violated any contract with plaintiff, this defendant is not responsible for its violation. The other defendant, the Plant System, alleges, in substance, in its answer, that, if any damages have been suffered by the plaintiff, it alone was at fault, in communicating its instructions and purposes to the agent of the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad Company, or in the misleading instructions given to the representative of the Plant System by the agent of the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company. The judgment of the district court was in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant the Plant System for the sum of $2,182.66, with legal interest from June 22, 1898, and sustained the writ of attachment sued out by plaintiff. As relates to the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company, the district court rejected the demand of plaintiff.

There is no question but that the plaintiff desired to have the rice carried from Charleston to New Orleans in bond, and that ample notice of plaintiff's wish in this respect was given to the agent of the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company in New Orleans. We think that it is equally as evident that the Plant System was aware of the instructions given by plaintiff for hauling the rice in bond. While it is true the testimony is conflicting, one of the members of the plaintiff firm who testified and the agent of the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company agree in the statement that such were the instructions received and afterwards communicated to the officials of the Plant System. The agent of the Plant System admitted, as a witness, that his understanding and that of the agent of the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company was that the Plant System was a bonded line. But this was error, as the Plant System was not a bonded line for south-bound freight from Charleston. We will not dwell upon this particular issue at any length. Before passing to the consideration of another ground of the decision, we will state, however, with reference to one of the defendants (the Plant System) that it must be held to have been informed of plaintiff's intention regarding this consignment.

We repeat, the defendants knew that the goods were to come to New Orleans in bond. But, while virtually conceding this, the defendants urged that they did not know, and that plaintiff did not make the least attempt to inform them of, the fact that it (plaintiff) wished to sell the goods to the United States government, or to ship them, duty unpaid, to another country. This defense is particularly urged by the Plant System. The contention on its part is that the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company did not specifically explain or instruct its codefendant as to the intention of plaintiff regarding the sale to the United States, or a reshipment of the goods, as just stated, and that it (the Plant System) had the right to infer that the only possible damage that plaintiff could suffer would arise from the payment at Charleston instead of at New Orleans, and that, as no damage could have arisen in that case, none was due. This is the important question involved. The proof is that the grade of rice in question could not compete in New Orleans with the domestic rice, and that it was quite evident that the rice was only suitable for exportation from the port of this city. In answer to the proposition that the low quality or grade of the rice was warning enough not to take it out of bond, and that it must have been evident from that fact that it was intended for exportation, defendants deny that this was a warning or notice at all. We can only say, in deciding the question, that, whether that fact was in itself a warning or not, defendants should not have taken the goods out of bond. Viewed in the most favorable light, defendants' action was hasty and ill advised. They must or should have known that the owner had an object in importing this rice in bond. A member of the plaintiff firm testified positively that one of the agents of the Plant System had been informed of the object. There are circumstances sustaining the correctness of that statement. The right to ship in bond was absolute, and one should have been extremely slow in interfering with the right without special instructions. In the presence of the testimony, and in view of the surrounding facts and the rights of the parties, we do not think it possible, in justice and reason, to arrive at the conclusion that defendants were justified. The rice was intended by the owner for exportation or for sale to the United States, and it was not for defendants to assume that it was intended to be sold in New Orleans. It is evident that on receipt of the rice in bond the plaintiff would have exported it, if it had been to its advantage. It appearing that it would have been profitable at the time to export this rice, it is not for defendants to set up the defense that, if it had been sold to the United States government, the receipt in bond would not have been of any benefit. The test, as relates to the measure of damages, is the disposition which plaintiff might have made of it by exportation, if exportation was to its benefit. On this point the defendants insist, substantially, that no consequence which is not the necessary and ordinary result of a breach of the obligation can be supposed to have been contemplated, unless full information be imparted to the party sought to be held liable at the time of entering into the engagement; in other words, that the "special circumstances" rendering it important to plaintiff that the goods should arrive in New Orleans in bond were not communicated to the defendants, who therefore cannot be held to have contemplated or to have foreseen the damages which might result from the duties being paid in Charleston; citing articles 1934-1943 of the Civil Code and a number of decisions. True, in this case the defendants were not guilty of fraud or bad faith, and in consequence the question falls within the meaning of the articles just cited. We are inclined to the opinion that these articles are not as restricted in their scope as defendants would have us take them. The words of one of the articles are, "such damages as were foreseen or might have been foreseen." We think that the special condition attached was directly brought home to defendants by the recital contained in the invoice in their possession. The damages resulting from the breach might have been foreseen. The loss in the value of the goods was a direct consequence of the breach of the obligation. Besides, information had been imparted to at least one of the defendants, if not both, ample enough to warn either or both not to pay the duty. This, as we think, brings the case within the rule furnished by the cases cited by the defendants; the leading case being Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341. The decisions rendered under the common and civil law systems, in our opinion, do not hold that one is not responsible unless every damage possible is brought home to him in express terms at the time the obligation was assumed. It is true that the loss is limited to the thing which was the object of the obligation. Pothier (Dupin's edition, vol. 1) illustrates the principle thus: Let us suppose that I have sold a thing having a well-known value in the market and which I bought myself to deliver within a certain time, and that I failed to comply with my obligation. If in that time the article had increased in value, and it can no longer be purchased at the same price, the increase in price which the buyer from me is obliged to pay is a damage which I owe, because it is damage suffered *propter rem ipsam non habita*m, which is in touch with the thing which is the object of the contract, and which I might have foreseen. This authority then gives examples of damages which could not have been foreseen. The latter do not cover defendants' case. Pothier's view has the support of the civil-law authorities. To conclude upon this subject, the carrier who takes goods of a merchant out of bond, without instructions, and despite the circumstances indicating that they had a value in bond, is not in the situation of one who could not have foreseen the possibility of accruing damages.

tween themselves gives rise to the next question. The New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company insists that the breach of the obligation was committed by the Plant System; and the Plant System, on the other hand, contend that they only carried out instructions communicated by the agent of the first-named road. A letter was introduced in evidence, written by the agent of the New Orleans & Northeastern Railroad Company, instructing the Plant System to pay the customs duties. This was understood, the Plant System contend, as including all customs duties paid. There were two or more different statements in this letter; one leading to the inference that it was the carrier's wish that the duties be paid in Charleston, and the other that, in compliance with its desire, they must not be paid. There was direct contradiction in the letter. The writer's testimony was admitted to explain the meaning of the letter. To this explanation counsel for the Plant System objected, and reserved a bill of exceptions to its admissibility. For the reasons just stated, the letter was confusing and ambiguous. The explanation was properly heard. This witness said that by the words in the letter, "If any customs duties accrued at Charleston, please have same paid and billed against the shipment," he meant, if any charges accrued while the shipment was in bond, same were to be paid, and billed against the shipment. The other testimony of this witness in this connection does not relieve his company from all responsibility. It remains that these defendant companies acted together. One was the continuing line of the other in carrying this freight. They both obligated themselves as carriers, and each, we think, took a part in securing this freight, and to that end in taking it out of bond. The information gained by one of the officials at one end of the line was communicated to the other at the other end. The errors of each in the interest of both and with the sanction of both do not present issues enabling us to conclude that the damages were all due by one of these railroads. As relates to the amount, we do not think that the testimony would justify us in reducing it lower than found due by the judgment of the district court.

For these reasons, the judgment of the District Court is avoided, annulled, and reversed, and it is now ordered, adjudged, and decreed that there be a judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendants in solido for the sum of $2,182.66, with interest at 5 per cent from June 22, 1898, until paid. It is further ordered that the writ of attachment herein issued be maintained with plaintiff's lien and privilege on the property attached. Costs of appeal are to be taxed to defendants and appellants.

Monroe, J., concurs in the decree.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

STATE of Louisiana ex rel. Joseph LASERRE, App't,

v.

*1. It is error for a district court to refuse to entertain an application made to it by a husband and father, during his marriage, for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to his wife,—the application being based upon an alleged illegal detention by the latter of their minor child,—upon the ground that the spouses can only bring suit against each other in specially permitted cases, and that an application of this character is not authorized by law.

2. A writ of habeas corpus is essentially a writ of inquiry in aid of right and liberty in respect to matters in which the state has an interest, though private rights may be involved. The writ simply brings the parties before the court for the ascertainment of the facts of the case. The court is clothed with a sound discretion, after hearing, to grant or refuse to the applicant the relief asked for. Neither spouse has an absolute right to the custody of the children.

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans, Division C, in favor of defendants in a habeas corpus proceeding to obtain possession of relator's minor child. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edwin T. Merrick, Philip Gensler, Jr., and Walter S. Lewis, for appellant:

In case of difference between the parents, the authority of the father prevails.

Civil Code, art. 216; Bosworth v. Beiller, 2 La. Ann. 293; Gates v. Renfro, 7 La. Ann. 570; Woods v. Perkins, 43 La. Ann. 349, 9 So. 48.

The husband can invoke the writ of habeas corpus against his wife to recover possession of his children.

Bermudes v. Bermudes, 2 Mart. (La.) 181; Acosta v. Robin, 7 Mart. N. S. 387.

Mr. Frank McGloin, for appellees:

The policy of this state in the matter of the personal custody of children pending disagreements between spouses has been radically altered by act 124 of 1888, and, in the absence of a final judgment of separation or divorce, the wife is the party now preferred.

The general rule is that a married woman cannot be sued, even by a stranger, except in exceptional cases.

For earlier cases in this series as to right to custody of child, between parents and others, see Van Walters v. Marion County Childrens' 54 L. R. A.

Coward v. Pulley, 9 La. Ann. 13.

The law of Louisiana places a married woman in her own interest, under incapacity (Civil Code, art. 1782), and confides her to the particular protection of her husband, holding him responsible for the common obligations of the marriage, and giving to him, as a rule, the prosecution and defense of her rights.

Civil Code, arts. 121, 122, 1316, 1786, 2307; Code Prac. arts. 106, 107, 118.

The Code of Practice, art. 105, positively forbids suits by married women against their husbands, except in certain specified cases. Shall it be contended that, if the law has thus protected the husband against his wife, free and fully capacitated as he is, the latter, incapacitated as she is, and under the tutelage of her husband, should be placed in a position of such comparative disadvantage?

Parents have a right of their own to the love, society, and services of their children, and it is for the enforcement of this right that petitioner herein is before the court.

17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 362.

While the writ of habeas corpus is one of right, a party seeking to avail himself of it is not at liberty to select for himself, absolutely, either the time or place for relief, or the tribunals through which it is to be obtained.

Nicholls, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff alleged that about the 19th of October, 1898, he was married to Blanche Michel, in the city of New Orleans; that of his said marriage there was issue, a girl child named Lucille, who was at the institution of this suit nineteen months old; that on or about the 10th of January, 1901, his wife left his marital domicile, and was then residing at No. 738 Napoleon avenue, and, although summoned to return to the marital domicile, had refused to do so; that his wife had taken away from him his said child, and declined to return her to his care, and she was therein aided and abetted in the illegal retention of said child by her father, Henry Michel; that his wife was unfit to have the custody and control of the said child, for the reason that she was wanting in discretion; that the child had been in bad health for some time, and she had exposed her by taking her away from home when sick, contrary to the instructions of plaintiff's physician, among other occasions, on December 31, 1900; that he, as husband and master of the community, was entitled to the custody of the child. He prayed that his wife be authorized by the court to defend in this proceeding; that a writ of habeas corpus issue to his said wife and said Henry Michel, commanding them to produce the said child to the court on the 15th of November, and to show cause on said day why the writ should not be made absolute, and relator should not be given the custody of his child; that after due proceedings the writ be made absolute. He prayed for general relief and for costs. The petition was sworn to. The court authorized the wife to defend the suit and to stand in judgment therein, and ordered that a writ of habeas corpus issue to her and to her father, Henry Michel, commanding them to produce the child in open court on the day fixed, and then and there to show cause why they kept the child detained, and why she should not be delivered to the care and custody of the relator. The wife excepted to the petition on the ground of no cause of action, and, for answer to the petition, averred that she was in possession of the child; that the child was of tender years and needed a mother's care, and could not, with safety to said child, be deprived thereof. She denied that she was wanting in discretion, or that she was unfit to have control of her own child. She averred that her husband did himself force her to leave the home he had only recently set up for her, having deliberately abandoned her child in said home, discharging the only servant, cutting off her credit, and leaving her and her said child without either money, food, or protection; that relator had never adequately supported either herself or her child, but had left upon her own family, during the entire term of their married life, not only the charge of supporting and housing her and her child, but also of supporting and sheltering himself; that he had more than once prior to this occasion abandoned his family, and at other times threatened so to do; that by his long-continued course he had forfeited his right to have her or her child, and that he had frequently declared his inability to do so; that respondent and her child had with her parents a safe and comfortable home, where they had extended to them kindness and affection, and had every need supplied; that relator could not support, maintain, or educate said child, or give it the necessary care. She prayed that the writ of habeas corpus be denied, and that she have judgment given her for the custody of the child. The district court rendered judgment refusing the application, dismissing the proceeding, and maintaining the exception of no cause of action. It held, under article 105 of the Code of Practice, and the authority of Cowand v. Pulley, 9 La. Ann. 12; Theurer v. Schmidt, 10 La. Ann. 296; Heyob v. Her Husband, 18 La. Ann. 41; Moore v. Moore, 18 La. Ann. 614,—that the public policy of the state, since the adoption of the Code of Practice, was against the maintenance of any civil suit between husband and wife, no matter what the cause of action, or how serious the complaint, when not within one of the exceptions of article 105, Code of Prac.; that it was against the policy of the state that husbands and wives should be heard complaining of one another during marriage. The court, in its opinion, referred incidentally to articles 104 and 105 of the Code of Practice; to articles 119, 120, and 229 of the Revised Civil Code; to Carroll v. Carroll, 42 La. Ann. 1074, 8 So. 400; Suberville v. Adams, 46 La. Ann. 124, 14 So. 518; State ex rel. Huber v. King, 49 La. Ann. 1508, 22 So. 887; Bermudez v. Bermudez, 2 Mart. (i.a.) 181; Heno v. Heno, 9 Mart. (La.) 643; and Bird v. Black, 5 La. Ann. 189,—and declared that it did not always follow that, because there might be an undoubted obligation (right), there must necessarily be a means of enforcing it (Rev. Civ. Code, art. 1757); that the legislature might, in its wisdom, have determined that it were better, in the public interest, that the fulfillment of certain obligations, however desirable, should not be made enforceable in law; and it was of the opinion that, since the Code of Practice, the duties which husband and wife owed to each other and to their children were of this nature. The relator appealed.

In the brief filed in this court on behalf of the mother, counsel analyzes and discusses the petition, declaring that an examination of the same will show that there is no just cause of complaint against the wife, justifying her deprivation of the custody of her only child; that it is not alleged that she is a woman of vicious life, or that the child is in surroundings not suitable and comfortable. The district court did not, in dealing with the question, consider the pleadings or the merits at all, but based its action upon the broad proposition that a husband is without legal right during marriage, at least without the simultaneous pendency of an action for divorce or separation from bed and board, to apply to a court of justice for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to a wife, for the custody of their child, and that courts were without legal right to entertain such an application, no matter what the particular facts of the particular case might be. Under such circumstances, consideration of the pleadings becomes unnecessary.

Counsel of the relator urges that a child remains under the authority of his father and mother until his majority or emancipation; that in case of difference between the parents, the authority of the father prevails (citing Bosworth v. Beiller, 2 La. Ann. 203; Woods v. Perkins, 43 La. Ann. 349, 9 So. 48; and Gates v. Renfro, 7 La. Ann. 570); that the writ of habeas corpus is a writ in the name of the state of Louisiana (Code Prac. art. 791); that at common law a husband and wife cannot sue each other, because they are regarded as one person (9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 799; 1 Bl. Com. 120; 2 Kent, Com. 129; Doe ex dem. Merigan v. Daly, 8 Q. B. 934); but that the writ of habeas corpus would lie in favor of the one against the other (King v. De Manneville, 5 East, 221; People v. Landt, 2 Johns. 375). Counsel calls the attention of the court to Bermudes v. Bermudes, 2 Mart. (La.) 182, 183; Hyde v. Jenkins, 6 La. 427; and Prieto v. St. Alphonsus Convent of Mercy, 52 La. Ann. 683, 47 L. R. A. 656, 27 So. 153. It is urged that, under the court's view, the husband, to enforce his legal rights, would either be driven to an action of separation from bed and board, or for a divorce, which it was not the policy of the law to encourage (Gahn v. Darby, 36 La. Ann. 74), or he would have to have recourse to fraud or force. In the case of Bermudes v. Bermudes, 2 Mart. (La.) 182, the court said: "The paternal house is the proper residence of the family. If the wife choose to absent herself from it without offering to the court any reason, the court will presume that none exists. De non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est lex. In such a case they must consider her as the faulty parent. The father is the master of the family. His authority as to its civil force is founded in nature, and the care which it is presumed he will have of their education. While his conduct is proper the court cannot interfere with his authority, and will cause it to be respected. The mother, however, is not without her rights. If she be compelled to live separated from him on account of ill treatment,—if from his conduct she can show that the children are not likely to receive a proper education, or that it will be a dangerous example to them,—the court will afford their aid to her solicitude, especially in regard to the daughters, and deprive the father of a power which it is likely that he will abuse. For the right of the community to superintend the education of its members, and disallow what, for its own security and welfare, it sees good to disallow, goes beyond the right and authority of the father. Blissett's Case, Loft, 748, 749." It has been held elsewhere that where the wife breaks up the household and departs from her husband's home wrongfully, whether it be done of her own purpose or from weakly yielding to the evil influence of others, she is not to be allowed to take with her the children of their union. People ex rel. Olmstead v. Olmstead, 27 Barb. 9; People ex rel. Nikerson v. —, 19 Wend. 16; Church, Habeas Corpus, § 443. But the father's right to the custody of his children is not absolute, even during marriage, and even where there is no suit pending for a separation from bed and board. The courts in the United States, while adopting the legal principle that the father is usually entitled to the custody of his children, have been inclined to modify it by adopting the equitable principle that this right must yield in some instances to considerations affecting the welfare of the children, and by regarding more highly than was formerly done in England the rights of the mother. Hurd, Habeas Corpus, § 441. Thus, while the father may have the first title to custody of the children by nature, his claim may be disregarded by the court, acting on a principle of natural justice, if his character and conduct render him unfit to be a guardian; hence they will not be delivered to him on a writ of habeas corpus when it would be manifestly to their injury to do so, nor taken from the mother when the mother, blamelessly on her part, had been forced to live with her father, apart from her husband, and when it appears that they are well provided for by the mother, and not likely to be by their father. Particularly is this so in cases where the matter at issue is the custody of an infant child of such tender years as to require the personal care of the mother, where the minor child is out of the possession and custody of the father. It by no manner of means follows that the prayer of the petitioner will be granted because the writ has been ordered to issue. The writ simply brings the parties before the court for the purpose of inquiry and the ascertainment of the facts of the case. The court is clothed with the power, with a sound discretion, to grant or refuse relief. The child itself, in contentions of this kind, is entitled to some measure of protection from the court. The parents, in issues of this kind, are not simply urging their own legal rights, but are acting for and on behalf of the child; and in respect to this matter the state itself, as stated in the Bermudes Case, has an interest which goes beyond the mere right and authority of either the father or mother. The right of neither is absolute. The right of either or both depends upon matters in pais, of which it is the object of the writ to have full inquiry, through an exhaustive examination under oath, so that the tribunal may have before it all the light practicable. We scarcely think that a writ of habeas corpus, directed to a woman, touching the custody of a minor child, can be called a suit by the husband against the wife because the party invoking the state's action is a husband, and the party against whom the writ is directed is his wife, and the child is theirs. It is the result of the suggestion that the child is improperly restrained of its liberty, and that inquiry should be made into the facts of the case. It may be observed in this connection that illegal restraint may exist without the exercise of force or coercion. Church, Habeas Corpus, § 439. When the writ issues the wife is called into court in the name of and by the state itself, though this be done on the relation of the husband. It is true that the ultimate action of the court upon the writ may be in aid and in enforcement of private rights,—of the rights of the husband of the wife in the premises,—but the result is incidental and consequential. The writ of habeas corpus is essentially a writ of inquiry, and upon matters in which the state itself is concerned, in aid of right and liberty. As mere inquiry is primarily sought, and the costs of the proceeding will fall upon the relator in case the action of the state has been unadvisedly sought and obtained, the exact or precise legal interest which the relator may have in inaugurating the inquiry and in its result should not be subjected to too rigid a test at the instance of those whose conduct and action are sought to be investigated. We do not think that either husband or wife should be driven to the necessity of instituting an action of separation from bed and board or divorce, to have the matter of the legal custody of the children judicially inquired into. Actions of separation or divorce should not be forced; nor do we think that where husband and wife are, as a matter of fact, living apart, the spouse out of the possession of the children of the marriage, and claiming the legal right to have such possession, should be driven to force or to fraud to obtain the same. Such a course of conduct would tend directly to breaches of the peace and to violence. It is right, proper, and legal for the party entitled to the possession of the child to obtain the same under the sanction of judicial proceedings. It would be stretching the terms of article 105 of the Code of Practice for no good purpose, and with no good results, to hold otherwise. That article does not refer to proceedings of that character.

For the reasons herein assigned, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the District Court be, and the same is hereby, annulled, avoided, and reversed; that the application for the writ of habeas corpus be reinstated, to be proceeded upon according to law, under the exceptions and answers filed by the defendants.

Breaux, J., dissenting:

I entertain the greatest respect for the opinion of the majority in this case. I know that there are decisions in other jurisdictions sustaining the views expressed; yet, again, in matter of habeas corpus, I am compelled to dissent on grounds that I consider strictly legal. It is my misfortune, perhaps, that opinions of those in authority while I was at the bar have brought about a conviction which I am unable to overcome. Turning to the Code of Practice, I find the following, vis.: Habeas corpus enables free persons to obtain their release "from illegal arrest or detention." Code Prac. art. 787. In another article this writ is referred to as directed to a person who has another in his custody, or detains him in confinement. Id. art. 791. Again, the supreme court shall have the power to issue writs of habeas corpus at the instance of persons in actual custody. In another article: "If the imprisonment or detention took place by virtue of a judicial order, regular in its form, but illegally obtained or executed, the petition shall mention in what the illegality consists." Id. art. 797. But, if the imprisonment or detention has not been made by virtue of a judicial order, the petitioner need only allege that he is illegally imprisoned or confined; and throughout, as I read the articles, illegal custody or imprisonment is made a condition to issuing the writ. The provisions of the Constitution are not broader, regarding habeas corpus, than those of the Code of Practice from which I have just quoted. Power is given to issue the writ of habeas corpus at the instance of any person in actual custody. Article 93. The text of article 104 of the Constitution is similar on the subject. I quote from article 115 of that instrument: "The district judges shall have power to issue writs of habeas corpus at the instance of all persons in actual custody in their respective districts." In my view, the husband, independently of any other proceeding or suit, is not entitled, under our law, to the writ of habeas corpus to compel the mother to surrender the children primarily intrusted to her care by law and by nature. The law does not seem to contemplate giving to the husband the power, as a separate and independent one, to bring the wife before the court by way of habeas corpus in a case such as the one just decided. While it may be that the decision in Bermudes v. Bermudes, 2 Mart. (La.) 181, is or should be controlling, I cannot avoid the thought that it was pronounced in 1812,—many years before the adoption of our Code of Practice. Legislation has not, in my view, at any time gone to such an extent as to justify the issuance of writ on a state of facts as related in the cited decision. I read none. I respectfully submit that it cannot well be considered as the construction of the articles of the Code of Practice and of the Constitution of a date long subsequent. In dissenting, I must again disclaim any intention of criticising a different conclusion. I must say that I regret my inability to construe the law differently than as before expressed.

rendered, it might give rise to condemnation at the bar of public opinion, which may seek by legitimate influence to condemn and suppress it; but in matter of business it affords no ground to refuse to pay a creditor if he has earned the amount which he claims.

2. An issue of fact is not sustained by the testimony that some time previous to the services rendered wrongs against the social order had been committed. Rumors and reports based, from all appearances, on the previous wrongs charged,—i. e., wrongs of a date anterior to services claimed, and as to which several of the witnesses directly swore,—do not make it appear with reasonable certainty that they were continuing wrongs.
3. Witnesses testified that in the community in which he resided plaintiff, as a member of the community, and while at home, was not deemed guilty as charged; others testified to the contrary. The jury found that the weight of the testimony was with the former.
4. To that extent the jury's verdict is affirmed. It is not affirmed as to the amount of damages.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Rapides in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrews & Hackenyo and Scarborough & Carver, for appellants:

The administration of justice requires the utmost latitude to evidence and pleadings in court proceedings, where parties are acting in good faith.

Burke v. Ryan, 36 La. Ann. 951; Vinas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 1265; Staub v. Van Benthuyssen, 36 La. Ann. 470; Clement Bros. v. Their Creditors, 37 La. Ann. 694; Gardemal v. McWilliams, 43 La. Ann. 458, 9 So. 106; Kelly v. Lafitte, 28 La. Ann. 436; Rayne v. Taylor, 14 La. Ann. 407.

The proceedings connected with the jurisdiction of the courts are so important to the public good that the law holds that nothing that may be therein said, with probable cause, whether with or without malice, can be slander, and, in like manner, nothing written with probable cause, under the sanction of such proceedings, can be libel.

Vinas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 1265.

Where there is a suit pending in a court of competent jurisdiction between proper parties, everything alleged or said pertinent to the issue in the case is absolutely privileged.

Gardemal v. McWilliams, 43 La. Ann. 454, 9 So. 106; Wimbish v. Hamilton, 47 La. Ann. 252, 10 So. 856.

Where no malice has been shown, only actual damages can be recovered.

Roos v. Goldman, 36 La. Ann. 132; Crétin v. Lecy, 37 La. Ann. 182.

In all slander suits both malice and absence of probable cause must concur to give grounds for action.

Stewart v. Sonneborn, 98 U. S. 187, 25 L. ed. 116; Cauchois v. Dupuy, 3 La. 207; Boullemet v. Philips, 2 Rob. (La.) 365.

Messrs. White & Thorator, for appellee:

A libel is any publication, whether in writing, print, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obliquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation.

Staub v. Van Benthuyssen, 36 La. Ann. 467; Weil v. Israel, 42 La. Ann. 955, 8 So. 826.

Declarations of a witness "are protected by the occasion, and cannot serve as the foundation for a civil action when they are pertinent and material."

Burke v. Ryan, 36 La. Ann. 951.

The fact that defendant in a suit for damages for malicious prosecution acted under the advice of counsel is no excuse if the advice was given upon his misrepresentation of the circumstances of the case.

Découx v. Lieux, 33 La. Ann. 392.

Communications in a judicial proceeding are privileged, "and the only questions are whether the occasion existed and the matter complained of was pertinent to the occasion."

Words spoken by way of interrogation, if imputing a crime, are actionable. And it is not necessary that the charge should be made in direct terms; it may be made by insinuation.

13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 348.

The fact that matter defamatory and libelous in its character was charged in the petition of a plaintiff against a defendant does not of itself carry absolute exemption from liability for damages claimed by reason of said defamatory and libelous charges. Other facts must concur to bring about that result.

Wimbish v. Hamilton, 45 La. Ann. 1191, 14 So. 77.

Matter inserted in a pleading, to be privileged, must be legitimately related to the issues, or so pertinent to the subject of the controversy that it may become matter of inquiry on the trial.

Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Thomas, 28 C. A. 96, 48 U. S. App. 575, 83 Fed. 803.

Under the law of Louisiana slander is a quasi-offense, actionable under the broad provisions of the Code: "Every act whatever of man that causes damage to another obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it."

Both malice and injury may be inferred from the nature and falsity of the words.

Spotorno v. Fourichon, 40 La. Ann. 423, 1 So. 71; Miller v. Holstein, 16 La. 389; Daly v. Van Benthuyssen, 3 La. Ann. 69;

When the facts furnished by a client to his attorney are misleading and defamatory in character, and their incorporation into the petition is foreign to the objects and purposes of the suit, the client is responsible in damages.

Wimbish v. Hamilton, 47 La. Ann. 246, 16 So. 856.

Though there was no proof of malice on the part of the defendant in uttering the slander, "yet, in such case, the law imputes malice to the act on account of its character."

Savoie v. Scanlon, 43 La. Ann. 973, 9 So. 916.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defamation of his character is plaintiff's cause of action. Ten thousand dollars is the amount he claims for damages. From a verdict and judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $500, the defendants appeal.

Plaintiff is a steamboat captain and pilot, and defendants are stockholders and promoters of the Boyce Cotton-Seed Mill & Manufacturing Company. Plaintiff brought suit against the defendants some time previous to the present suit, in which he alleged that he had entered into a contract with defendants to raise a subscription to the stock of the Boyce Cotton-Seed Mill & Manufacturing Company, and to secure a site for the mill at or near Boyce, Louisiana, and that as a consideration defendants agreed to pay him 5 per cent on the amount of all stock subscribed. He alleged in his petition in this first suit that it was agreed that he was to use his energy and influence to secure a site and raise subscriptions; and he also alleged in his petition that through his efforts an oil-mill site was secured, and stock subscribed to the amount of $10,000; and he claimed $500 for his services, that amount being 5 per cent of the sum he claimed to have secured, and the commission he averred the defendants had bound themselves to pay. Defendants in the first suit answered plaintiff's petition, and admitted that they had employed plaintiff to solicit subscriptions, but alleged that he failed to secure any subscriptions, and that those obtained were secured by themselves. They also charged that they had learned that plaintiff's reputation was such that plaintiff could not secure subscriptions; that many persons refused to subscribe for the reason that plaintiff was connected with the proposal to construct the mill in question, which was afterwards (they aver) constructed by themselves (the defendants in this suit). The plaintiff accepted a sum less than the amount of his claim, and discontinued the suit. In the present action he sets forth that the answer filed in the suit which was discontinued, as just stated, and the interrogatories propounded to various witnesses, suggested and gave rise to the implication that the plaintiff's conduct as the father of a family was not what it should have been.

Plaintiff is a widower, with eight children, four of whom reside with him. Defendants, in their answer in the case now before us for decision, pleaded the privileged character of their allegations in their defense in the first suit filed. They also alleged that their defense and allegations to that end were based on probable cause, and with the advice of counsel that, if true, the allegations were a good defense to the suit brought; and they substantially further averred that, should the court not sustain these grounds of defense, they honestly believed, from common report, the truth of their allegations. Defendants aver in their answer, inter alia, "that his conduct with her (the asserted concubine) on the boat and since she left there has been such as to cause them to believe, as they did at the time, that he lived with her as his concubine." (The parentheses ours.) In the case here a number of witnesses were examined, and the interrogatories and answers filed in the first suit were filed in evidence in the present suit. By his witnesses plaintiff sought to prove the extent to which he had been wronged by defendants' answer, and the issues raised by them in the first suit, and defendants directed their efforts chiefly to prove that the reports circulated in the community, and the poor success plaintiff had met with in securing subscriptions, justified their defense. The charge brought, we think, was useless to the defense. If true, the defendants were none the less liable for the amount due for services actually rendered by plaintiff in securing subscriptions. A defense entirely foreign to the issues does not fall within the rule protecting averments as privileged. Averments are not privileged if it appears that they are entirely useless to the defense. The charge made was not a disqualification to attend to the business of soliciting subscriptions and to aid in establishing a factory in the community. The language used had a tendency to degrade, without in the least, as we take it, assisting in establishing a defense. While it is true that the greatest latitude should be allowed in judicial proceedings in order to enable the parties to bring before the court all pertinent issues, or issues which parties may deem pertinent, yet there must be some limit to this wide range.

We have reviewed our decisions on the subject, and have not found that they (while they recognize every right which is needful to the full presentation of the issues) have gone to the extent of laying down the rule that an averment which has the effect of holding up one of the parties to public odium is to be sustained as protected, or as privileged, although not called for by the character of the issues. The most recent views of this court upon this subject were expressed in Wimbish v. Hamilton, 47 La. Ann. 246, 16 So. 856. In that case the court said: "The allegations were pertinent to the issue presented." Here there is nothing of the sort. The employee was seeking to recover from his employer an amount he averred was due. The charge was an inde-pendant one, not connected in any manner with the service he was expected to render. The lack of influence of one who has undertaken to do a certain thing in which his influence may be of some moment would not be a cause preventing him from recovering for what he has done. We are justified in concluding that the amount due for his services is all the court would have allowed him. To determine that issue, the question of personal conduct in matter not connected with the service, if true, however to be regretted and reprehended, is not an issue to be considered.

We pass to the other grounds of defense in the case before us for decision,—want of malice, probable cause, and the truth of the averments contained in the answer filed in the first suit. We take it that absence of malice is not a complete defense against a demand for damages by one who uselessly charges another with having failed in a duty, or with having transgressed the law in a manner in which he, as a defendant in a suit, cannot be held to have been particularly concerned. Although the averments may not have been made malò animo, they are not to be dismissed from all consideration because of that fact. With reference to probable cause, we have not discovered wherein it was, in its nature, a probable cause; for we think it was made without any cause whatever. The truth of the averments vel non made in the first suit presents the serious and most important issue of the case. It is true that defendants heard from credible persons of the community words condemning plaintiff for an asserted intimacy with his servant or housekeeper at his home, at which his children reside. The particulars of the intimacy at plaintiff's home are not given, and the testimony does not disclose acts leading to unavoidable inferences of improper intimacy. At a previous time, while away at some distance, commanding and piloting a steamboat, this servant was a chambermaid on the boat. Witnesses testified to facts which sustain the allegations made in the first suit. It must be borne in mind that this was some time previous to defendants' employment of plaintiff as a solicitor, and while the latter was away from home. In reading decisions upon the subject, we found the following in point, which we think expresses a correct view: A woman who is at the time chaste, virtuous, and exemplary, although she may at some previous time have had illicit intercourse with a man, is an innocent woman, within N. C. Code, § 1113, which provides that, "if any person shall attempt, in a wanton manner, to destroy the reputation of an innocent woman by words, written or spoken, which amount to a charge of incontinency, every person so offending shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." State v. Grigg, 104 N. C. 882, 10 S. E. 684. Beyond the fact that this woman is plaintiff's housekeeper, that she is a quadroon or octoroon, that her conduct was not reputable before she came to Boyce, and that rumor charges improper relations, the record does not reveal any particular fact showing illicit intimacy.

In bringing this decision to a close, we will state that the advice of counsel is available as a mitigating circumstance, and to that fact we have given due weight. Besides, we do not think that this is a case for allowing an unreasonable sum in damages. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the amount of the judgment be, and the same is hereby, reduced to $100, and, as reduced, it is affirmed.

STATE of Louisiana

v.

Jean Baptiste NED, Appt.

(105 La. 696.)

*The conviction of a person of a crime which the Constitution requires should be tried by a jury of twelve, though nine jurors concurring might render a verdict (Const. 1898, art. 116), is not a legal conviction, though twelve jurors were physically present during the trial, and all concurred in a verdict of guilty, if one of the jurors on the jury was in a drunken condition during the trial.

(June 2, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of St. Landry convicting him of crime. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Lewis and James J. Bailey for appellant.

Mr. E. Lee Garland for the State.

Nicholls, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant appeals from a sentence of seven years' imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary. The crime of which he was convicted was one requiring for conviction, under the Constitution, "a trial" by a jury of twelve. Const. 1898, art. 116. The court overruled his motion for a new trial, which assigned as the ground therefor that "one of the jurors, Lastie L. Harmon, who after the panel had been completed, and the trial gone into, and the court reconvened pursuant to adjournment, appeared in court in a drunken condition; that when the first witness after the recess hour was called on, and before his testimony was given, the said juror, because of his drunken condition, had to be removed to an adjoining room; that when he reappeared in court and resumed his seat among his fellow jurors he was still in an intoxicated condition, unable to hear, follow, and understand the testimony, and immediately fell asleep, and remained in that condition during the remainder of the trial, and had to be awakened by one of the jurors when the judge ordered the jury to their chamber for deliberation; that the juror remained asleep during the entire time that the different witnesses were testifying, during the argument of counsel, and the charge of the judge." The judge refused the new trial, assigning as his reason "that, under article 116 of the Constitution, in cases of this character, though a jury of twelve is required, nine of the jurors can find a verdict, and the misconduct of one member of the jury does not render the finding of the nine concurring members invalid, unless it be shown that said juror was one of the nine rendering the verdict; that the record in the case failed to show any dissenting juror, and the reason for setting aside the verdict of jurors under the old rule of unanimity does not exist in this case, and, in the opinion of the court, should not be applied especially in view of the consideration that no injury either appears or has been shown to the accused; the misconduct of the juror was not of such a nature as to have any appreciable influence on the other members in arriving at a just verdict, as the law permitted the remaining jurors to render a legal verdict." The attorney general has filed no brief in the case. In that of the district attorney he says: "The evidence taken on the trial of the motion for a new trial we must admit establishes the fact that the juror was to a certain extent hors de combat, so that there can be no dispute between the state and the defense as to the facts governing the trial of the motion narrowing the contention to a question of law, to wit, whether, since the adoption of the Constitution of 1898, misconduct on the part of one member of the jury will vitiate a verdict rendered in a case where under the Constitution nine concurring can render a verdict, unless similar charges of misconduct can be leveled against his fellows."

Neither the judge nor the district attorney should have permitted the trial to proceed under the conditions existing. The spectacle of a man on trial for a crime involving his liberty, with a drunken juror in the jury box, is not one calculated to advance the proper administration of justice, nor to inspire the people with the respect which should be due to courts.

Independently of this, the conclusions of law reached by the court and the district attorney were not well grounded. The duty of a jury is not simply to hear the evidence adduced upon a trial, but, on retiring to their room, to deliberate upon it. The Constitution required that in this case the accused should be tried by twelve men. He could not waive this requirement. He was entitled to the deliberation, consultation, and decision of twelve men. This he has not had. Had a jury of twelve been impaneled for the trial of this cause, and, one or two of the jurymen absenting themselves, the trial been proceeded with, with nine or ten or eleven jurors, it could not be claimed that the constitutional requirement that the accused should be tried by a jury of twelve had been complied with. We understand the Constitution to require, not simply that nine jurors should concur in a verdict, but that twelve must be present from the beginning of the trial to the end. The juror in this case was physically present, but for legal purposes he might well have been absent. We do not intimate that every act of misconduct by a single juror would carry with it the avoidance of the verdict rendered by the jury, but misconduct, such as has been shown in this case, should carry, and does carry, with it that result.

For the reasons assigned herein, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the verdict of the jury, and the judgment thereon rendered, be, and the same is hereby, set aside, and the cause remanded to the District Court for further proceedings according to law.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Ann MULHALL

v.

John FALLON et al.

(176 Mass. 266.)

1. Declarations of one killed by negligence that his mother was poor, and that he sent money to her repeatedly, are admissible under Stat. 1898, chap. 535, in a suit by her to recover for the killing.

2. Evidence of a son's declarations that his mother was very poor, and that he sent her money repeatedly, corroborated by her testimony that she bought food with his money, sufficiently shows her dependence on him for support to carry to the jury a suit by her to recover for his negligent killing, under Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2.

3. A woman's testimony that she was almost entirely dependent on her son for support is not inadmissible in a suit by

NOTE.—Right of alien nonresident to maintain statutory action for death of other person.

It would seem that from the earliest times the notion has prevailed in the mind of man that those having an interest in the life of a person were entitled to compensation from, or punishment of, the person who wrongfully caused his or her death. In the English law 54 L. R. A.

under the Saxons are found the weregilds for the killing of a person varying in amount from the death of the poor or peasant up to that of the King himself. Blackstone informs us that during the continuance of this custom, a process was certainly given for the recovering of the weregild by the party to whom it was due, and that, when these offenses by degrees grew no longer redeemable, the private process was still her for his negligent killing, because it is a conclusion which the jury is to draw, or because it is law rather than fact.

4. Upon the question whether or not a woman was dependent upon her son for support, interrogatories are admissible as to whether he contributed to her support, and, if so, how much.
5. Partial dependence upon her son for the necessities of life is sufficient to enable a woman to maintain a suit for his negligent killing, under the Massachusetts statutes.
6. An action for negligent killing of her son may be brought by a nonresident alien under Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2.

(May 31, 1900.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to rulings of the Superior Court for Norfolk County made during the trial of an action to re-

continued, in order to insure the infliction of punishment upon the offender, though the party injured was allowed no pecuniary compensation for the offense. This process was known as an appeal of murder, and by the statute of 8 Hen. VII. chap. 1, it was provided that if a man be acquitted on an indictment for murder, or found guilty and pardoned by the King, he may still be proceeded against by an appeal of murder at the instigation of the party interested in the life of the person killed, if such appeal is brought within a year and a day from the time of the alleged commission of the offense. This appeal of murder existed as late as 1818; and the writ was issued, and, strangely enough, its issuance caused the revival of another thought-to-be obsolete practice, but which the court held to be still in force, viz.: Trial by wager of battel. Ashford v. Thornton, 1 Barn. & Ald. 405. The case was argued with a great deal of force by Chitty for the appellant and Tindal for the appellee, and Lord Ellenborough, with whom all the judges of the court concurred, held that the appellant had a right to bring the case by the writ of appeal, but that in such case the appellee had an equal right to his plea of wager of battel, and that the court was only in doubt as to what the judgment should be. The appellant, doubtless thinking that one member of the family was enough to fall by the hands of the appellee, declined to accept the decision of the court giving the latter trial by battel, and the appellee was therefore discharged. The idea that such a case could arise in the 19th century was so repugnant to British notions that in the following year appeal of murder, as well as of treason, felony, or other offenses, together with wagers of battel, were abolished by the enactment of Stat. 59 Geo. III. chap. 46.

It is difficult to ascertain just at what period the custom, or rule, or law, whichever it may have been, by which payments of wergild were made, fell into disuse, but since the time when it did so it has been an established rule of the common law that no action for damages can be maintained against a person for causing the death of another, until the passage of the act of Parliament, 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93, in 1846, commonly known as Lord Campbell's act. Since then, and very shortly after the passage of the pioneer act, the several states of the United States enacted similar acts differing generally only in respect to the persons who were entitled to maintain the action, and for whose benefit the same should be prosecuted. In regard to the rights of aliens to sue, it is believed that all of the acts passed by the different state legislatures are identical with Lord Campbell's act,—that is to say, there is no express provision contained in any of them that the action may be maintained by a nonresident alien.

A person twenty-seven years old came to this country from Italy in 1889, and while employed by the defendant company as a laborer on its roadbed or track, he was, October 28th, 1894, killed in a collision which was imputed to the negligence of his employer. The decedent did not see his mother after he had left her in Italy in 1889. At the time of the trial she still resided in her native country and owed allegiance to the government of it. In an action brought by her to recover under the statute of Pennsylvania, providing that a parent could recover for the death of a child caused by the wrongful act of the party against whom the action was brought, it was held that the statute was not intended to confer upon nonresident aliens rights of action not conceded to them, or to citizens of Pennsylvania by their own country, or to put burdens upon the citizens of that state to be discharged for their benefit; that it had no extraterritorial force, and the plaintiff was not within the purview of it; and that a construction which would include nonresident alien husbands, widows, children, and parents of the deceased was one so obviously opposed to the spirit and policy of the statute that the court would not adopt it. Deni v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 525, 37 Atl. 558.

In Adam v. British & Foreign S.S. Co. [1898] 2 Q. B. 430, 87 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 844, the action was brought by the mother of the decedent, a Belgian subject, who was an engineer on board a Belgian ship. It was not disputed that the collision was caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants; and the court held that had the deceased been an English subject the action would have lain, notwithstanding that the negligence and death both occurred upon the high seas. The court held that the provisions of the act by which damages can be recovered for death caused by negligence do not apply for the benefit of aliens abroad, and therefore the representative of an alien whose death has been caused by the negligence of a British subject, outside the jurisdiction of the court, cannot maintain an action to recover damages in respect of the death; that it is a principle of English law that acts of Parliament do not apply to aliens,—at least if they be not even temporarily resident in Great Britain,—unless the language of the statute expressly refers to them; that the power of the country is to legislate for its own subjects all over the world, Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. Sprout and Dickson & Knowles, for defendants:

The enactments of a legislature of any state are to be regarded as applying to the territory of such state, and not to extend beyond its limits, or to operate upon non-resident aliens.

It cannot be contended that there is in this case any right of action at common law.

In Dent v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 525, 37 Atl. 558, it was adjudged that the action could not be maintained.

The same doctrine is held in Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164.

The question of dependency was one of law, and not of fact. It was not for the plaintiff to say whether she came within the provisions of the statute as a dependent person.

Messrs. James E. Cetter, John W. McAnarney, and J. P. Fagan, for plaintiff:

Oral declarations of Patrick Mulhall that he had sent money to plaintiff were admitted under the provisions of Acts 1898, chap. 535, which provides that "no declaration of a deceased person shall be excluded as evidence on the ground of its being hearsay, if it appears to the satisfaction of the judge to have been made in good faith before the beginning of the suit, and upon the personal knowledge of the declarant."

The legislature "has unquestionable authority to change the common-law rules of evidence, to prescribe the modes of proof, and to direct who may and who may not be competent witnesses."

The question of dependency in this case was one of fact for the jury, and was rightfully submitted to them.

and as to foreigners within its jurisdiction, but no further (Colquhoun v. Heddon [1890] 25 Q. B. 129; Jefferys v. Boosey, 4 H. L. Cas. 815, 3 C. L. Rep. 625, 24 L. J. Exch. N. S. 81, 1 Jur. N. S. 615); and that there was nothing in Lord Campbell's act to show that it was intended to apply for the benefit of foreigners not resident in the Kingdom. The intention of the legislature is to be collected from the statute; and there is no implied, and certainly no express, intention to give to foreigners out of the jurisdiction a right of action which even British subjects had not until the passing of 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93.

In an action brought in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Colorado, based upon the statute of the state which gives the right to the father and mother to recover damages in the case of a death occurring through the negligence of the defendant, a demurrer was put in to the complaint upon the ground that it appeared therein that the plaintiffs were nonresident aliens, they being citizens and residents of Ireland, in the Kingdom of Great Britain. The case of Dent v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 527, 37 Atl. 558, was cited in support of the demurrer. The court adopted and followed that case completely, and gave judgment sustaining the demurrer, and asserted that one of the reasons for doing so, given by the Pennsylvania supreme court, was satisfactory, which was that no case had been brought to the notice of the court in which an English court had held that a nonresident alien was entitled to the benefits conferred by the act of 1846. This decision was made March 11th, 1899, and the decision of the Queen's Bench in the case of Adam v. British & Foreign SS. Co. [1898] 2 Q. B. 430, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 844, was made the July previous, but must have been unknown to the judge who made the decision 54 L. R. A.

or he certainly would have cited it. Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164.

Thereafter, in a decision made April 17th, 1900, the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, disapproved Dent v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 525, 37 Atl. 558, and Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164, stating that they rest largely upon the proposition that no case can be found in which Lord Campbell's act has been extended to nonresident aliens, and that the act has no extra-territorial force. After stating that this is hardly in accordance with the facts, the court held that the mother of a son who had been killed by the wrongful act of the defendant could maintain an action for so wrongfully causing the death of her son, although she was a resident of Ireland and had never been a resident of this country. Vetaloro v. Perkins, 101 Fed. 398. The reasoning of the court was as follows: The manifest purpose of the provision of the statute of Massachusetts giving the right of action is to give the widow and next of kin of an employee the same right to bring an action in the case of death as the employee would have had in case he had survived. No distinction is made between citizens and aliens. The only limitation imposed is that the next of kin, in order to maintain an action, must be dependent for support on the wages of the employee. To exclude nonresident aliens from the right to maintain an action would be to incorporate into the act a restriction which it does not contain; i. e., to refuse compensation to a certain class of persons for a real injury recognized by statute law; that it would be to relieve employers with respect to some employees from the exercise of due care in the employment of safe and suitable tools and machinery and competent superintendents; and to offer an inducement to employers to give a pref-

As the act stands, its language applies to any next of kin to a person killed as the deceased was in this case, without reference to their residence or citizenship.

The statute is of a remedial and protective nature, and should be interpreted liberally. It was intended for the benefit of employees and those dependent upon them, and an employee might well consider it as an inducement to enter into a contract for labor, expecting to receive its protection, and the assurance that, in case of wrongful death, those dependent upon him would, in a measure, be provided for.

The fact that the plaintiff was an alien was no bar to her recovery in this case.

erence to aliens, and to discriminate against citizens. That would be to hold that the legislature of Massachusetts intended by the act to declare that employers should not be liable for the grossest negligence which results in the instant death of an alien employee in cases where his widow or next of kin happen to reside in a foreign country.

In this case the court was evidently unaware of, or ignored, Adam v. British & Foreign S.S. Co. [1898] 2 Q. B. 430, 87 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 844, as the latter sadly interferes with the reasoning herein, and justifies that in Denl v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 527, 37 Atl. 558, and Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 98 Fed. 164.

Then follows MULHALL V. FALLON, the principal case, which, as will be seen, approves and follows the case last cited. These are all the cases which are direct authorities upon this subject.

Previous to any of the decisions herein mentioned, in 1875 a case arose in Alabama under an act to suppress murder, lynching, etc., by which it was provided that certain parties who were injured by a death caused by a riot or lynching could maintain an action against the county for a penalty of $5,000. The decedent at the time of his death was a subject of Great Britain, had always lived in Canada, and had only been, as the court expresses it, a resident, or rather a sojourner, in Alabama for a few months immediately preceding his death. The plaintiff was the wife of the decedent, and as such wife was, according to the terms of the statute, entitled to sue for the penalty. Prior to and at her husband's death she resided in Canada. She and her husband were alien subjects of Great Britain,—never had been domiciled in Alabama or in the United States. The court, on the request of the defendant, charged the jury that if they believed from the evidence 54 L. R. A.

There are in Great Britain laws similar to our own, conferring similar rights of action under like circumstances.

Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93, 1846; Employers' Liability Act, 43 & 44 Vict. chap. 42, 1880; Workmen's Compensation Act, 60 & 61 Vict. chap. 37, 1897.

This court has always dealt liberally with the rights of aliens.

Holmes, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action under Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2, for causing the death of the plaintiff's son. The plaintiff is an Irish woman, who, so far as appears, never has left Ireland. In the superior court she had a verdict, and the case is here on exceptions to a refusal to direct a verdict for the defendants either on the ground that the statute conferred no rights upon the plaintiff, or on the ground that she did not appear to have been dependent upon the wages of her son for support. Exceptions were taken, also, upon some matters of evidence.

On the question of the plaintiff's dependence upon her son we are of opinion that there was evidence for the jury. It appeared from declarations of the deceased, properly admitted under Stat. 1898, chap. 535, that his mother was very poor, and that plaintiff and her deceased husband, for whose death plaintiff sues, were aliens, not citizens of Alabama or the United States, the plaintiff could not recover. The supreme court, in reversing a judgment in favor of the defendant, held that the words "any person" in the statute were as comprehensive as would have been the expression "any human being." One of the principal grounds, however, upon which the court placed its decision was, that the object of the statute was the suppression of murder—was the purpose the statute intended to accomplish. It was supposed that the consequences such murders might visit on the country at large would quicken the diligence of public officers and private citizens to detect, pursue, apprehend, and bring offenders to conviction and punishment. The court stated that conviction on a prosecution bars the suit, or, if it has ripened into judgment, operates as a satisfaction thereof. That be the victim an alien or a citizen, the law is violated, the peace is broken, the security of person and life is lessened, to the same extent, and as great crime is committed in the killing of the one as the other. That the purpose of the statute would not be accomplished if a distinction was drawn between the killing of a citizen and an alien; murder would not be suppressed. Luke v. Calhoun County, 52 Ala. 115.

There are certain decisions like Philpott v. Missouri P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 164, in regard to the right of the representative, beneficiary, or other person to whom the right to maintain the action is given by statute, if, resident in one state, to maintain such an action in another state; but as such decisions necessarily relate to a citizen or resident of a state, and are possibly grounded upon the constitutional rights of citizens of the several states, it is considered that they do not affect the question. P. H. V.

that he sent over money repeatedly, and regretted not being able to do more. The money, it is true, was received by his father while alive, but the father was a paralytic, and died nearly a year before his son. The plaintiff, in her deposition, confirmed the statements of her son. She testified that she bought food with his money, among other things, and that she wished she had more to eat.

In answer to the question to what extent, if at all, she was dependent upon her son for support, she answered that she was almost entirely dependent upon him for the last two years. This question was objected to, but was admissible. The extent to which particulars may be summed up in a general expression is a matter involving more or less discretion, and cannot be disposed of by the suggestion that the general expression involves the conclusion which the jury is to draw, or that it is law, rather than fact. Poole v. Dean, 152 Mass. 589, 591, 26 N. E. 406; Windram v. French, 151 Mass. 547, 550, 551, 8 L. R. A. 750, 24 N. E. 914. The question to what extent she was dependent upon her son called for details of fact in a perfectly proper way. Whether the answer showed a sufficient dependence to satisfy the statute remained for the jury to answer under the instructions of the court. Even more plainly admissible were interrogatories whether the son contributed to her support, and, if so, how much. The plaintiff also testified that she "had to turn around and go 3 miles to earn [her] support;" that she had a boy that was hard set to earn from 8 pence to 1 shilling a day, and another boy an invalid. How far these statements should outweigh the others was for the jury. See Houlihan v. Connecticut River R. Co. 164 Mass. 555, 557, 42 N. E. 108; Daly v. New Jersey Steel & I. Co. 155 Mass. 1, 5, 29 N. E. 507; Supreme Council A. L. of H. v. Perry, 140 Mass. 580, 590, 5 N. E. 634. Partial dependence for the necessities of life would be enough, as it is made in terms by the English statute. 60 & 61 Vict. chap. 37, § 7, cl. 2; McCarthy v. New England O. of P. 153 Mass. 314, 318, 11 L. R. A. 144, 26 N. E. 806; Simmons v. White [1899] 1 Q. B. 1005; Atlanta & C. Air-Line R. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 372, 26 L. R. A. 553, 20 S. E. 550. In Hodnett v. Boston & A. R. Co. 156 Mass. 86, 30 N. E. 224, there was nothing to show that the plaintiff did not support herself by her own earnings.

We come, then, to the more difficult question whether the plaintiff can claim the benefit of the act. However this may be decided, it is not to be decided upon any theoretic impossibility of Massachusetts law conferring a right outside her boundary lines. In Manville Co. v. Worcester, 138 Mass. 89, where a Rhode Island corporation sought to recover for a diversion of waters from its mill in Rhode Island by an act done higher up stream in Massachusetts, it was held, following earlier decisions, that there was no such impossibility, although the point was strongly urged. It is true that legislative power is territorial, and that no duties can be imposed by statute upon persons who are within the limits of another state. But rights can be offered to such persons, and if, as is usually the case, the power that governs them makes no objection, there is nothing to hinder their accepting what is offered. The same principle is recognized without discussion in Lumb v. Jenkins, 100 Mass. 527, where a nonresident alien was held entitled to take land by descent. So, after discussion, as to a nonresident's right to sue. Peabody v. Hamilton, 106 Mass. 217. So the Supreme Court of the United States holds that a right to recover for wrongfully causing death under a state law similar to Lord Campbell's act may be asserted by an administrator appointed in another state. Dennick v. Central R. Co. 103 U. S. 11, 26 L. ed. 439. See 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 879, Death by Wrongful Act. It is true that the arguments which prevailed in this case did not prevail in Richardson v. New York O. R. Co. 98 Mass. 85, and perhaps would not have prevailed in England. Adam v. British & Foreign SS. Co. 79 L. T. N. S. 31. But so far as the principle for which we cite the case is concerned, it is in accord with our own decisions, assuming that, like Lord Campbell's act, the statute was regarded as conferring a new right of action on the foreign executor or administrator, and not as giving a right of action to the deceased which went to the executor by survival only. Blake v. Midland R. Co. 21 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 233, 237; Seward v. The Vera Cruz, L. R. 10 App. Cas. 59, 67. The cause of action survived in Higgins v. Central New England & W. R. Co. 155 Mass. 176, 29 N. E. 534. This distinction seems to be lost sight of by many of the cases given in the Encyclopedia as following Dennick v. Central R. Co. so that their reasoning is not very satisfactory. But see Bruce v. Cincinnati R. Co. 83 Ky. 174, 182 et seq.

The question, then, becomes one of construction, and of construction upon a point upon which it is probable that the legislature never thought when they passed the act. In view of the decisions to which we have referred, we lay on one side as too absolute some expressions which are to be found in the English cases, and some of which are cited in Adam v. British & Foreign SS. Co. 79 L. T. N. S. 31. Our different relation to our neighbors politically and territorially is a sufficient ground for a more liberal rule,—at least as to inhabitants of the United States.

One or two cases may be found where a general grant of a right of action for wrongfully causing death has been held to confer no rights upon nonresident aliens. Deni v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 181 Pa. 525, 37 Atl. 558; Brannigan v. Union Gold-Min. Co. 93 Fed. 164. But compare Knight v. West Jersey R. Co. 108 Pa. 250, 56 Am. Rep. 200. On the other hand, in several states the right of the nonresident to sue is treated as too clear to need extended argument. Philpott v. Missouri P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 164, 167; Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Higgins, 85 Tenn. 620, 622, 4 S. W. 47; Augusta R. Co. v. Glover, 92 Ga. 132, 142, 143, 18 S. E. 406; Luke v. Calhoun County, 52 Ala. 115, 118, 120.

Under the statute the action for death without conscious suffering takes the place of an action that would have been brought by the employee himself if the harm had been less, and by his representative if it had been equally great, but the death had been attended with pain. Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 1, cl. 3. In the latter case there would be no exception to the right of recovery if the next of kin were nonresident aliens. It would be strange to read an exception into general words when the wrong is so nearly identical, and when the different provisions are part of one scheme. In all cases the statute has the interest of the employees in mind. It is on their account that an action is given to the widow or next of kin. Whether the action is to be brought by them or by the administrator, the sum to be recovered is to be assessed with reference to the degree of culpability of the employer or negligent person. In other words, it is primarily a penalty for the protection of the life of a workman in this state. We cannot think that workmen were intended to be less protected if their mothers happen to live abroad, or less protected against sudden than against lingering death. In view of the very large amount of foreign labor employed in this state, we cannot believe that so large an exception was silently left to be read in. Whether, if the statute were of a different kind, we could make a distinction between a mother living just across the boundary line between Massachusetts and Rhode Island and one living in Ireland, need not be considered now.

We are of opinion that the superior court was right in letting the case go to the jury. A similar decision has been rendered upon this statute by the United States circuit court for this district. Vetaloro v. Perkins, 101 Fed. 393.

SECURITY MUTUAL LIFE ASSOCIATION.

(.....Me.....)

No recovery of his commissions can be had by one who secures applications for insurance at a time when he has not complied with the statute prohibiting, under penalty, the soliciting of insurance without a license, although the policies are not issued until after the license is procured, and the statute does not expressly prevent recovery of the commissions.

(January 31, 1901.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Knox County made during the trial of an action brought to recover commissions alleged to be due to plaintiff on policies secured by him, which resulted in a verdict in his favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. I. Thompson for defendant.

Mr. L. M. Staples for plaintiff.

Wiswell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action of assumpsit, upon an account annexed to the writ, to recover commissions upon premiums paid by various persons to the defendant on policies of life insurance issued by it, the applications for which were solicited, received, and forwarded to the defendant by the plaintiff under a written contract between the plaintiff and the defendant wherein the plaintiff was appointed an agent of the defendant "for the purpose of procuring and effecting applications for insurance," and which provided for the compensation that was to be received by the plaintiff.

At the trial the defendant, among other defenses, contended that some or all of the applications of these persons for insurance were solicited, received, and forwarded to the defendant at a time when the plaintiff had no license from the insurance commissioner of this state as provided by Rev. Stat. chap. 49, § 73, and subsequent amendments, and that consequently the plaintiff could not recover. The case shows that the plaintiff had no such license between July 1 and October 18, 1897.

Thereupon the defendant's counsel requested the presiding justice to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover any commission upon the premiums paid to the company in cases where the applications for such insurance were solicited by the plaintiff during the period that he was without such a license. The requested instruction was applicable to the state of facts involved, because, although the policies may have been in fact issued after October 18, 1897, and during a period when the plaintiff had a license, it is clear that in more or less instances the plaintiff's work in soliciting and receiving applications for the policies was performed during the period that he was without a license.

In order to give progress to the case, the presiding justice declined to give the requested instruction, but did instruct the jury "that for any policy bearing date subsequent to the 18th of October the plaintiff is entitled to his commission from the company upon that risk, although he may have solicited the insurance before that time and made himself liable to the penalty." To this refusal to instruct, and to the instruction given, the defendant (the verdict being for the plaintiff) took exception.

The statute above referred to, as last amended by chapter 95, Pub. Laws 1895, after providing that the commissioner may issue a license to any person to act as an agent of a domestic insurance company, and to any resident of the state to act as agent of any foreign insurance company, which has received a license as provided by another section, and after fixing the fee that shall be received by the commissioner for each license, contains this language: "And if any person solicits, receives, or forwards any risk or application for insurance to any company, without first receiving such license, or fraudulently assumes to be an agent and thus procures risks and receives money for premiums, he forfeits not more than $50 for each offense; but any policy issued on such application binds the company if otherwise valid."

Although this statute contains no express provision preventing a recovery for his services by one who acts as an agent of an insurance company without such license, and does not expressly provide that contracts for such services shall be void, it prohibits the performance of such services, without the license referred to, under the penalty therein provided. In Harding v. Hagar, 60 Me. 340,—a very similar case in principle,—this court said in its opinion: "It is too well settled to require the citation of authorities that no party can recover for acts or services done in direct contravention of an express statute, or for property so sold and delivered." In Randall v. Tuell, 89 Me. 443, 38 L. R. A. 143, 36 Atl. 910, where the authorities are fully collected, the principle is thus stated: "It is the general doctrine, now settled by the great weight of authority, that where a license is required for the protection of the public and to prevent improper persons from engaging in a particular business, and the license is not for revenue merely, a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of the act is void."

In accordance with these authorities, and many others that might be referred to, it must be held that the plaintiff cannot recover for the services performed by him in direct contravention of the statute. The purpose of the statute is undoubtedly for the protection of the public. It is clearly not for revenue. The license fee required was only the sum of $2. True, the statute referred to provides that a policy issued in such a case shall not thereby be void, but the contract of insurance is not the one under consideration here. It is the contract between the company and the plaintiff by virtue of which the latter performs services in obtaining applications for insurance which the statute prohibits unless the person performing such service has a license therefor.

The evidence as to when these applications for insurance were solicited and obtained by the plaintiff is somewhat indefinite, but some of them were unquestionably received when the plaintiff had no license, and the burden is upon him to show that he had a license when the services were performed. Harding v. Hagar, 60 Me. 340.

1. Failure of a municipality to attempt to enforce its ordinance limiting the speed at which bicycles may be ridden on its streets will render it liable for injuries to a pedestrian knocked down by a bicycle which is being ridden at an immoderate rate of speed.
2. Sustaining a demurrer to a plea in an action for negligent injuries, which alleges that they were committed by a third person, is not error where there is also a plea of the general issue, since the plea demurred to amounts merely to the general issue.

(June 12, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Washington County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries received by plaintiff by being knocked down by a bicycle in one of defendant's streets. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. A. Mason, W. J. Witsenbacher, and E. J. Halm, for appellant:

It would not be pretended that the state incurred any liability for the failure on the part of public officers to enforce the provisions of its statutes, or owed compensation to anyone injured by a transgression of these provisions; and the municipality of Hagerstown should not be held to any greater liability.

Schmucker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee in this case instituted an action against the appellant for damages for an injury resulting from being struck and knocked down by a rapidly moving bicyclist on a public street in Hagerstown. The appellant demurred to the narr., and, its demurrer having been overruled, filed pleas, and went to trial upon the issues joined thereon, and, the verdict and judgment being against it, appealed. The record contains no exceptions to the court's action upon the evidence, or its instructions to the jury, and the main question, therefore, presented for our consideration, is whether the declaration stated a good cause of action. The declaration alleges the incorporation of the appellant, and that it was vested by its charter with control over its streets, and was given full power and authority to prevent, suppress, remove, and abate all nuisances and obstructions thereon, and, for the purpose of carrying out its powers and for the preservation of the peace and good order of the community and the protection of the lives and property of its citizens, to pass and enforce appropriate ordinances; that, in the exercise of the powers thus conferred on it, the appellant, some time prior to the happening of the injury complained of, passed an ordinance to regulate bicycle riding within its corporate limits, by which it was provided that it should be unlawful for any person to ride a bicycle at an immoderate speed on its streets, and a fine was imposed for a violation of the ordinance; that, by virtue of the power and authority conferred upon the appellant, it became its duty, not only to pass such ordinances as were necessary to protect the lives and limbs of its citizens, and prevent, suppress, and abate all nuisances and obstructions as aforesaid, but also to exercise all reasonable care and diligence in the enforcement of the same. The declaration alleges, further, that the appellant negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully failed, refused, and omitted to enforce the provisions of said ordinance; that the provisions were negligently permitted to remain and be unenforced, so as, practically, to be a dead letter, although immoderate bicycle riding, trials of speed between riders of bicycles, and racing of bicycle riders upon the streets of Hagerstown had become and was at the time of the injury complained of, and for some time prior thereto had been, a nuisance upon that portion of West Franklin street between North Potomac street and Walnut street, a menace to the lives and limbs of the citizens of said Hagerstown traveling along, upon, and across said West Franklin street at its intersection with said North Jonathan street, as well as at other places on said portion of West Franklin street; that on diverse days and at diverse times, both in the daytime and after night, immoderate bicycle riding, trials of speed, and racing between bicycle riders occurred on said portion of West Franklin street, openly, publicly, and notoriously, and that the appellant negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully failed, refused, and omitted to enforce the provisions of said § 3; that, by reason of the failure of the appellant, the provisions of said ordinance became and were treated and considered, by persons riding bicycles on said portion of West Franklin street, as a dead letter, or an ordinance the provisions of which could be violated with impunity. The declaration further alleges that on the 5th day of August, A. D. 1899, the plaintiff, while in the exercise of due care and caution on his part, was crossing said West Franklin street at its intersection with said North Jonathan street, and while so crossing was struck and knocked down by a certain person or persons unknown to the plaintiff, who were then and there riding at an immoderate speed along and upon said portion of West Franklin street, at its intersection with said North Jonathan street, by reason of the carelessness, negligence, omission, and default of the appellant in the premises; that, by reason of such carelessness, negligence, omission, and default of the appellant in the premises, the plaintiff was seriously and permanently injured.

In the cases of Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160, 66 Am. Dec. 326; Taylor v. Cumberland, 64 Md. 68, 54 Am. Rep. 759, 20 Atl. 1027; and Cochrane v. Frostburg, 81 Md. 54, 27 L. R. A. 728, 31 Atl. 703, this court held that a municipal corporation having powers similar to those possessed by the present appellant is bound to exercise them for the public good, and to protect persons and property, and that its duty is not discharged by merely passing ordinances upon the subject. It can relieve itself from responsibility only by a vigorous attempt to enforce them. In Marriott's Case the city was held liable for damages to the plaintiff who suffered injury from falling upon ice which had accumulated upon the footway of one of the streets in such manner as to constitute a nuisance, and to obstruct and endanger the public in walking thereon; the injury having occurred after the lapse of a sufficient time after the city might, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have obtained notice of the condition of the street. In Taylor's Case the plaintiff was injured by being struck by a sled coasting on the public street at a high rate of speed, at a place where large numbers of men and boys had for several days prior thereto been coasting at a rapid and dangerous rate of speed. This sport was held to constitute a nuisance of a dangerous character, which the city should have suppressed. Inasmuch, however, as the city had, through its police, made a vigorous effort to suppress the coasting, and had so far succeeded in doing so that the sled by which the plaintiff was injured was the only one then on the street, the court, while affirming the principle of Marriott's Case, held that the lower court should have submitted to the jury the question whether the defendant had used reasonable care and diligence to suppress the nuisance. In Cochrane's Case the declaration averred that large numbers of horses, cows, hogs, and horned cattle were permitted to run at large upon the public streets, until they, especially the horned cattle, became a nuisance, and a source of danger to persons passing along the streets, and that, although the nuisance had become notorious, the city refused to take any steps whatever to abate it. The further allegation was made that the plaintiff, while passing along the street with due care, was attacked and seriously injured by one of the horned cattle so negligently permitted to be at large upon the street. The defendant demurred to the declaration, and the demurrer was sustained. Upon an appeal this court held the declaration to be sufficient, and reversed the judgment of the lower court. In the opinion in that case the cases bearing upon the subject in both this and other states, were reviewed, and, although it was conceded that the law in some of the other states was different, the Cases of Taylor and Marriott were affirmed and relied upon by the court in reaching its conclusion. It is apparent that the allegations contained in the declaration in the present case, which we have already stated at some length, bring it within the principle of the last-mentioned cases. We think the learned judge below committed no error in overruling the demurrer filed by the appellant.

Nor was there any error in sustaining the demurrer to the appellant's third plea, which alleged that the injury complained of had been done by one Lester Davis while conducting himself in accordance with the provisions of the ordinance regulating the use of bicycles on the streets. The plea in question amounted to general issue; for to aver that a third party committed the wrong alleged is the same thing as to say that the defendant did not commit it. The general issue is set up in the first plea, and under it the facts alleged in the third plea could have been offered in evidence, so that the appellant was, in no aspect of the case, injured by the court's action upon that demurrer. The judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with costs.

UNITED RAILWAYS & ELECTRIC COMPANY OF BALTIMORE, Appt.,

v.

STATE of Maryland to Use of Emma P. DEANE, Widow of Frank H. Deane, Deceased, et al.

(.....Md.....)

1. An exception to a refusal to take a case from the jury at the close of plaintiff's evidence is waived by the introduction of evidence by defendant.
2. Failure of employees of a street railway company to overpower or remove from the car a drunken passenger whose conduct is such as to indicate danger to other passengers if he is permitted to ride unrestrained is negligence which will render the company liable for injuries which he inflicts upon a passenger, although there is nothing to indicate that the one injured is in especial peril.
3. Permitting a drunken passenger who has been removed from a street car for turbulence and an assault upon a fellow passenger, to return to and remain upon the car without further effort to remove him, although his turbulence continues, is negligence which will render the street car company liable for injuries inflicted by him upon a passenger.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Baltimore City in favor of plaintiff in a suit to recover damages for the death of Frank H. Deane, which was alleged to have resulted from negligence of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Fielder O. Slingluff, George D. Penniman, and T. Rowland Slingluff, for appellant:

Every means at the command of the employees of the railroad was resorted to, to eject the turbulent passenger, as a protection to the remaining passengers, and the assistance of willing passengers was called in, but to no avail. This relieves the carrier from responsibility.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought in the name of the state of Maryland, to the use of the widow and children of Frank H. Deane, against the United Railways & Electric Company of Baltimore, to recover damages for the injury caused to the equitable plaintiffs by the death of Mr. Deane. His death is alleged to have been the result of the defendant's negligence, and the negligence charged consisted in the failure of the company's servants to protect the deceased, while he was a passenger on one of its cars, from the deadly assault made upon him by a fellow passenger. The main question in the case is whether there was sufficient evidence of negligence to justify the trial court in allowing the case to go to the jury. At the close of the evidence adduced in behalf of the plaintiff the defendant requested the court to withdraw the case from the consideration of the jury. That request was refused, and the defendant reserved an exception. The defendant then offered evidence on its part, and, when all the evidence on both sides was in, it renewed the request previously refused, and presented several other prayers for instructions to the jury. The request to withdraw the case from the jury was again refused, though the court granted several other prayers submitted by the defendant. The refusal to grant the first, third, and tenth prayers, which asked to have the case taken from the jury, the refusal to grant the defendant's eighth prayer, and the granting of the plaintiff's first prayer constitute the rulings assigned as error in the second exception. No point has been made upon the plaintiff's prayer, and we need not allude to it further than to say that it fairly submitted the law of the case to the jury. The first exception is out of the case, because the presentation of evidence by the defendant after the court had declined to take the case from the jury on the evidence of the plaintiff was a waiver of that exception. That proposition has been so recently decided, in Barabass v. Kabat, 91 Md. 53, 46 Atl. 337, that we shall not pause to discuss it. We therefore come to inquire as to the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support the averments of the declaration.

It may not be amiss at this point to state briefly the legal principles applicable to such a case as this, though they were considered and announced not long ago in Tall v. Baltimore Steam Packet Co. 90 Md. 248, 47 L. R. A. 120, 44 Atl. 1007: "A carrier is not an insurer of the absolute safety of his passengers, yet he is bound to use reasonable care according to the nature of his contract; and, as his employment involves the safety of the lives and limbs of his passengers, the law requires the highest degree of care which is consistent with the nature of his undertaking. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State use of Hauer, 60 Md. 449. This, though the measure of the carrier's duty as between him and his passenger in respect to the acts or omissions of the carrier and his servants towards the passenger, is not the standard by which his liability to the passenger is to be gauged or determined when intervening acts of fellow passengers or strangers directly cause the injury sustained whilst the relation of passenger and carrier is subsisting. Such an injury, due in no way to defects in the means of transportation or to the method of transporting or to an actual trespass by an employee whilst the relation of passenger continues, and involving, therefore, no issues of negligence concerning the duty to provide safe appliances and competent and careful servants to operate them, but arising wholly from the independent misconduct of a third party, furnishes a ground of action against the carrier only when the carrier or his servants could have prevented the injury, but failed to interfere to avert it. The duty of the carrier in such instances is consequently relative and contingent, not absolute and unconditional. . . . The negligence for which in such cases the carrier is responsible is not the tort of the fellow passenger or the stranger, but it is the negligent omission of the carrier's servants to prevent that tort from being committed. The failure or omission to prevent the commission of the tort, to be a negligent failure or omission, must be a failure or an omission to do something which could have been done by the servant; and therefore there is involved the essential ingredient that the servant had knowledge, or with proper care could have had knowledge, that the tort was imminent, and that he had that knowledge, or had the opportunity to acquire it, sufficiently long in advance of its infliction to have prevented it with the force at his command." It is not because a particular passenger is known by the carrier's servants to be in peril of injury at the hands of a fellow passenger or stranger that a failure to use the means at command to protect him will be actionable negligence; but it is because there is a known or discoverable danger that an injury may be done to some passenger, and because no effort is made to avert that injury from all the passengers, that the carrier is liable if an injury is inflicted on one of the passengers when it could have been prevented. It is just as incumbent on the carrier to protect all his passengers from assault by a fellow passenger, when his servants have knowledge or the means of knowing that an assault on someone is imminent, and when they have time and the means to avert it, as it is to protect all his passengers from injuries likely to result from defective means or methods of transportation. Consequently it will not do to say, after an assault has been made, that the servants of the carrier did not know or could not have foreseen that the particular individual who was assaulted would be injured by an assault, if they were apprised, or with proper care could have known, of circumstances which indicated that someone would be injured unless the disorderly passenger or stranger were ejected or controlled.

Turning to the facts, the usual conflict between the witnesses for the plaintiff and defendant encountered in personal injury cases is found in the record, though there are some circumstances about which there is no controversy. It is quite a familiar doctrine that, in dealing with a request to withdraw a case from the consideration of the jury, the court has nothing to do with the weight of the evidence, but is confined strictly to determining whether there is any evidence legally sufficient to sustain or justify a recovery. The truth of the evidence adduced in behalf of the plaintiff, no matter how flatly contradicted, must therefore be conceded, except in very rare instances, where it is physically impossible that it could be true. Upon the hypothesis that it is true, the sole inquiry is, Will it warrant a jury in finding a verdict for the plaintiff? If it will, then the case must go to the jury. If it will not, then the jury should not be permitted to deal with it at all. Now, it is not disputed that on Sunday afternoon, September 17, 1899, the deceased got on a car of the defendant railway company on South Charles street, going north; that at the corner of Charles and Cross streets a man named Geisenkotter boarded the same car; that Geisenkotter was very drunk, boisterous, and disorderly; that he assaulted a passenger on the rear platform, and acted like a maniac. Either because of the assault which he made on the passenger upon the rear platform, or because of his violent and threatening conduct, he was ejected from the car at the corner of Charles and Barre streets by the conductor and motorman. It is practically conceded that he was not a fit person to be upon the car, which was quite crowded with passengers, and therefore that he was properly put off. But when the car started he again got on, and, though the conductor saw him get on, and the motorman saw him after he was on, they did not at once make an effort to remove him. Though the car stopped at Charles and Conway streets, one square north of where Geisenkotter had re-entered the car after having been ejected, no attempt was made to remove him, notwithstanding his continuous disorderly conduct. The next street north of Conway is Camden. The car stopped there, but still no effort was made to put Geisenkotter off. From this point there is a divergence in the evidence. According to the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, while the car was proceeding from Camden street towards Pratt street, Geisenkotter, without the slightest provocation, assaulted Mr. Deane, striking him a vicious blow in the eye, which caused the rupture of a cerebral blood vessel, and thereby produced paralysis, and ultimately death. On 54 L. R. A.

the part of the defendant it was shown that an effort was made to eject Geisenkotter at Pratt street; that at each intersecting street a search was made for a police officer, but none was found; and that after the car passed Baltimore street, and before it reached Fayette street, the fatal blow was struck. The company insists that it was not derelict in its duty to the passenger, because its agents did not know, and had no reason to apprehend, that Deane was in imminent danger of injury at the hands of his drunken and disorderly fellow passenger; and the question was asked during the argument, What did the employees fail to do that they ought to have done, and which, if they had done, would have prevented the injury? It may be true that there was no reason to suppose that Mr. Deane, rather than any other passenger, was in imminent peril. But that is not material. As already observed, it is not the peril which a particular individual is in that is to be considered in a case of this kind. If there is danger of anyone being injured, and the employees fail to remove, subdue, or overpower the turbulent individual, after knowing that there is danger, or after they ought to have known that there was danger if they had exercised proper care, that failure is negligence, for the consequences of which the company is answerable. So the case comes down to the inquiry, Was there evidence tending to show that the employees of the defendant failed to do what they ought to have done under the circumstances? There ought to be no difficulty in answering this question. If Geisenkotter, who had assaulted another passenger before he was ejected from the car, and who was drunk, disorderly, and turbulent, was properly put off the car because his presence was a menace to other passengers, then it was the plain duty of the employees who put him off, to have kept him off. They demonstrated their ability to keep him off by having put him off. If he had been kept off after having been put off, he could not have assaulted Deane. While his assault on the other passenger did not necessarily indicate that he would subsequently strike Mr. Deane, it did show that he was in a condition which rendered it very probable and likely that he would attack someone else; and this was known to the employees sufficiently long before the assault was made on Mr. Deane to enable the conductor, not only to put Geisenkotter off, but to have kept him off, the car. It cannot be doubted that if there was sufficient reason for putting Geisenkotter off the car, so that injury to other passengers might be avoided, there was equally sufficient reason for keeping him off; and the failure to do this when there was power to do it was an act of negligence which caused the injury to and death of Mr. Deane. If, on the other hand, every effort was made by the employees to avert the injury, but was made without success, then the company would not be liable. This was plainly said to the jury, and it was a question of fact which was properly left to them.

The eighth prayer was rightly rejected. It sought to exculpate the defendant unless the jury should find that after Geisenkotter re-entered the car the defendant's servants knew, or should have known of the danger to the deceased. This prayer was faulty for two reasons: First, it eliminated all the facts that had preceded Geisenkotter's expulsion from the car, and narrowed the investigation to the occurrences which took place after he had returned, though the things which transpired before he was put off explained and threw light on what happened after his re-entrance; secondly, it undertook to confine the jury to a consideration of the danger to Deane, though the company's liability depended, not on that fact, but upon the circumstance that anyone was in peril.

Upon the whole record, we think there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the question of negligence, and it was their exclusive province to weigh its value and probative force. They evidently believed the version of the unfortunate affair which was narrated by the witnesses for the plaintiff, for they returned a verdict against the defendant, and it is not for us to say that they were mistaken in doing what they did. As no error was committed by the trial court, the judgment will be affirmed, with costs.

Petition for rehearing denied.

*In an action on a bond given by an agent to his principal, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, it appeared that, by the terms of the agency contract to secure the faithful performance of which the bond was given, the agent was required to make weekly reports to his principal of the business transacted by him; that the principal, without the knowledge or consent of the sureties, permitted the agent to continue in its employ, and to transact its business under the agency, without requiring him to make such weekly reports; and it is held that the failure to require the agent to make the reports, and permitting him to continue to transact its business under the contract in violation of the terms thereof in this respect, constituted a material departure from the contract, and released and discharged the sureties from liability on the bond. *Morrison v. cover money which he had collected and failed to account for. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mahon & Agatin, for appellant:

The alleged omission to require weekly statements is not sustained by the evidence, and is not a defense in any event. Such omission, if there was any, could not be held to discharge the sureties, because it could not be prejudicial to them, nor was it made a condition of their liability.

Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 425.

Messrs. Searle & Spencer and John G. Williams, for respondents:

Appellant cannot recover because, without the knowledge or consent of the sureties, he disregarded the terms and conditions of the contract of hiring in that it did not require Dewey to make weekly remittances of all the money collected and a weekly statement of all business done by him, as required by the contract of hiring and the regulations and rules of the company.

Morrison v. Arons, 65 Minn. 321, 68 N. W. 33.

Appellant cannot recover because without the consent or knowledge of the sureties Dewey was permitted to retain money collected, largely in excess of what he was permitted by the contract to retain, and which under the contract he was required promptly to remit to appellant.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1896, plaintiff, a Pennsylvania insurance corporation, with its head office in Philadelphia, constituted and appointed defendant Dewey agent for the transaction of certain of its business in thirty-seven counties of this state. As such agent, Dewey had the general management and charge of its business in the matter of soliciting and procuring insurance risks, delivering policies, collecting premiums, and remitting and paying the same over to the company. To secure the faithful performance of his duties as such agent, Dewey executed and delivered to plaintiff a bond in due form of law, with the other defendants as sureties. The agent defaulted in the performance of his duties, failed to remit moneys collected by him, and this action was brought against him and his sureties upon the bond to recover the amount of his delinquency. Defendants had judgment in the court below, and plaintiff appealed.

It is claimed by the sureties in defense that they were released and discharged from liability on the bond because and for the reasons: (1) That plaintiff, without their knowledge or consent, modified and changed Dewey's agency contract by extending and enlarging his territory, thereby creating additional duties and responsibilities which were not contemplated by the parties when the bond was executed, and which constituted a material departure from the original agreement; (2) that Dewey was permitted by plaintiff, without the knowledge or consent of the sureties, to continue to transact the business of the company without being required to make remittances of money collected, and without being required to make weekly statements of business transacted by him, as provided by the terms of the contract; and (3) that the sureties were released and discharged because the company permitted Dewey to retain money collected, which, under the terms of the contract, he was required to promptly remit. It is unnecessary to go into a discussion or consideration of the first and third of these defenses. The evidence fully sustains the second, and, as this disposes of the case adversely to plaintiff, we need consider no other question. The terms of the contract between plaintiff and the agent, for the faithful performance of which the bond was given, so far as pertinent to the second defense, are as follows: "It is expressly agreed and understood that the said second party [Dewey] shall receive as a special trust the net or gross premiums, as the case may be, due the association, and shall remit to the said first party [insurance company] at the beginning of every week, and the said second party shall also at the same time make and forward a detailed statement of the collections made during the preceding week, showing the policies delivered, the collections made thereon, policies in hand not delivered, reasons for nondelivery, and policies in the hands of subagents." The contention is that plaintiff permitted Dewey to continue in its employ as its agent without requiring of him the remittance of money collected, or the weekly reports provided for by the terms of the contract, without the consent of the sureties, and that, in consequence of which, the defendants were released and discharged from all liability upon the bond. Our conclusion, from a careful examination of the evidence, is that the case of Morrison v. Arons, 65 Minn. 321, 68 54 L. R. A.

N. W. 33, is decisive of the case. In that action it appeared that one Arons was employed as a traveling salesman under a contract by the terms of which it was provided that there should be monthly settlements between the agent and his employer, and for the faithful performance of his duties Arons executed and delivered the bond upon which the action was brought. Instead of requiring of the agent monthly settlements, as provided by the terms of his agency contract, he was permitted by his employer to make such settlements and such reports of his doings as agent at such times as his inclination prompted. The court there held: "We agree with the court below in its construction of the contract, but we cannot concur in its holdings that the sureties were not discharged by the failure and omission to have monthly accountings and settlements between Arons and plaintiffs. . . . [Had monthly accountings been had], it is quite certain that plaintiffs would have discovered before the expiration of thirteen months that the business was not profitable, while Arons would have learned that he was far from earning a living out of it. The natural result would have been for both parties to terminate their contract relation, and avoid further loss. It is evident that there would be much less hesitation on the part of a person called upon to become a surety upon a bond given for the faithful performance of a contract with such conditions than if the real situation was not to be ascertained for months. The condition in the employment contract, whereby monthly accountings and settlements were agreed upon, was an exceedingly beneficial one for all concerned. It was an essential feature of the contract, whereby Arons agreed to conduct plaintiffs' business enterprise for an indefinite period of time. . . . The contract of suretyship was departed from and varied when this provision was wholly disregarded, and the case is brought directly within the rule that, if an essential condition of such a contract is not complied with, a surety is not bound." No distinction can be made between the two cases. In the case at bar, as in that case, the terms of the agency contract required the agent to make stated reports of transactions had by him, and in each case he was permitted by his employer to wholly fail to comply with the terms of his contract in that respect. The evidence in the case in hand, though perhaps not as specific as might have been, is reasonably clear and conclusive that Dewey made no reports of his doings as plaintiff's agent at all, and wholly failed to comply with the terms of his contract in that regard. The testimony of plaintiff's comptroller, taken by deposition at Philadelphia, and offered in evidence on the trial, is to the effect that Dewey never made any reports to the company, and that the company never required him to do so. It is true that he also testified that reports were made by the company's cashier, who received his information from Dewey; but that Dewey never made any reports, in writing or otherwise, direct to the company, is conceded by him.

He testified further that no other officer of the company had any more information on the subject than he possessed. The testimony of the local cashier at the company's Minneapolis office, who claims to have acted in a dual capacity as cashier of the company and clerk or agent for Dewey at the same time, though the evidence is clear that he was the agent and representative of the company, is to the effect that Dewey never made any weekly reports to him, and was never required to make any. He did state that Dewey made some verbal reports whenever he had matters on hand to report, but did not explain how he knew that the reports were made when the agent had material on hand for that purpose. There is no other evidence on this subject, and, although the cashier may have made reports to the company of the business of the agency, such reports were not the ones required or contemplated by the terms of Dewey's contract. The contract expressly required the agent to make detailed reports, and the terms thereof in this respect could not be complied with by reports made by another, under no responsibility, and bearing no relation to the contract with the sureties. Plaintiff was bound, in so far as the sureties were concerned, to require the agent to keep and perform the contract, and the sureties had the undoubted right to insist upon its faithful and strict observance. The consequences of a departure from the terms of the contract in this particular cannot be avoided by showing that another agent endeavored to perform the duties required of Dewey. Therefore the act of the company in continuing the agent in its employ without insisting upon the performance of the terms of the contract was a material departure therefrom, and one affecting the substantial rights of the sureties. It may be stated, as a general rule, that dealings between the principal and agent, which amount to a departure from the contract by which a surety is bound, and which, by any possibility, might materially vary or enlarge the surety's liability, operate to discharge him; and it is no answer to say that he was not in fact prejudiced. Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 345; General Steam Nav. Co. v. Rolt, 6 C. B. N. S. 550; Calvert v. London Dock Co. 2 Keen, 638; Bragg v. Shain, 49 Cal. 131. In line with this general rule, it was held in Lancaster Ins. Co. v. Callahan, 68 Minn. 277, 71 N. W. 261, that, where there is a continuing suretyship for the faithful discharge of his duties by a servant, if the master discovers dishonesty in the servant, and continues him in his service thereafter, without the consent of the surety, express or implied, the latter is not liable for any losses arising from such dishonesty. Although there is no evidence in this case that plaintiff knew of Dewey's dishonesty, or continued him in its employ after acquiring any such knowledge, it is very certain and clear that such dishonesty might have been discovered had he been required to make reports as required by the terms of his contract. The sureties had the undoubted right to insist that the provisions of the contract be fully complied with in this respect, and, plaintiff having, without their knowledge or consent, acquiesced in the violation and breach thereof, they were released and discharged from all liability on the bond, and the court below properly ordered judgment in their favor. As this finally disposes of the case adversely to the plaintiff, it is not necessary to consider any of the other questions argued.

Judgment affirmed.

Jesse ROHART, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

- *1. An ordinance of the board of park commissioners of the city of Minneapolis provides that no vehicle which, together with its load, weighs more than 2,000 pounds, and which is in use for carrying goods, merchandise, building material, manure, dirt, earth, or other article or commodity, and which has tires less than 6 inches in width, shall pass or enter upon any park or parkway. Held, as applicable to a parkway, the ordinance is void because unreasonable, and in its effect prohibitive of traffic thus classified.
2. Whether or not the parkway in question was established as such by assumption of authority over it by the park board, and by acquiescence therein on the part of the city council, in the absence of any express action as a body,—quære.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Municipal Court of Minneapolis denying a new trial after conviction for violation of a municipal ordinance prohibiting the use on a parkway of traffic wagons having tires less than 6 inches wide. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Arcander, for appellant:

A municipal corporation holds the title to its streets in trust for the general public.

The public for whom it holds the streets in trust is not only its own citizens, but the entire public, of which the legislature alone is the representative.

It cannot be argued that, because the city by its charter is given the right to control and limit the use of its streets, it would therefore also have the right to delegate this power of control and limitation to someone else.

The ordinance is unreasonable and therefore void.

State v. Waddell, 49 Minn. 500, 52 N. W. 213.

Messrs. Frank Healy and C. J. Rockwood, for respondent:

A parkway is a passage, path, road, or street set apart for ornamentation, to afford the benefit of air, exercise, or amusement.

It was competent for the legislature to authorize the establishment of such a system, with such limited uses, and to authorize taking, as a part of such a system, ordinary streets and highways, and to limit their use to these purposes.

If any way called a parkway has all the usual features of a parkway except that it is carrying a traffic of lumber, ice, hay, stone, earth, garbage, merchandise, and all the miscellaneous traffic of a large city population, it is not in fact a parkway, no matter what appellation may be given to it. It is not reserved for ornamentation, nor to afford the benefit of air, exercise, or amusement. The uses are inconsistent.

If the park board has power to exclude heavy traffic from parks and parkways, it certainly has power to prescribe the conditions upon which such traffic shall be permitted.

There is certainly nothing unreasonable in attempting to preserve a few streets out of hundreds, and to set them apart for recreative uses. Nobody is inconvenienced by thus limiting the use of Lyndale avenue, because within 300 feet on either side there is a street just as good as Lyndale avenue would have been if it had not been boulevarded and macadamized.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An ordinance of the board of park commissioners of the city of Minneapolis provided that no vehicle which, together with its load, weighed more than 2,000 pounds, and had tires less than 6 inches wide, should pass over or enter upon any of the parkways of the city. Defendant was convicted of violating this ordinance in July, 1900, by driving upon Lyndale avenue with a wagon equipped with tires 3½ inches wide, and carrying a load of over 2,000 pounds. Defendant appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and claims in this court that the conviction ought not to be sustained, for the reason that the part of Lyndale avenue upon which he was driving when arrested was not a parkway, but, if it was a parkway, that the ordinance requiring such traffic to be conveyed upon vehicles furnished with 6-inch tires was unreasonable and void. It appears from the record that in 1887, and for many years prior thereto, Lyndale avenue was a public street and highway, and had been used and traveled as such; that on June 25, 1887, the park board passed a resolution designating that part of Lyndale avenue here in question as a parkway, and through its secretary sent a communication to the city council announcing the passage, on July 19, 1887, of that resolution, as follows: "Resolved, by the city council of the city of Minneapolis, that so much of Lyndale avenue as lies between Western avenue and Twenty-Ninth avenue North he dedicated and turned over to the board of park commissioners as a parkway in compliance with their request of July 7, 1887." After these proceedings the park board took possession of the street, and caused the same to be macadamized, at a cost of $13,000, the foundation of such macadam being broken stone, surfaced with limestone rock, with a slight covering of gravel, and rolled with a steamroller. Thereafter, and on November 19, 1887, the park board's attorney submitted a report to the board relative to the title of the land along Lyndale avenue, and recommended that a certain proportion thereof, including that involved in this case, be abandoned for parkway purposes until the city should have perfected its title thereto. Upon this report the board passed a resolution to the effect that all proceedings of the board relative to laying out and improving Lyndale avenue as a parkway between Twentieth avenue North and Twenty-Ninth avenue North be abandoned, annulled, and rescinded, to the end that the city might acquire a perfect title to the same before designating it for parkway purposes. The city thereupon commenced proceedings for the laying out of Lyndale avenue to a width of 66 feet, and for condemning the necessary property for that purpose, which proceedings terminated in making the street a public highway. It does not appear that any further steps were taken by the city council to redesignate the avenue for a parkway, or in any way giving its consent to the same, except by its silent acquiescence; nor does it appear that the park board took any action, as a body, to rededicate, or to designate and set aside, such avenue for parkway purposes. It is asserted by counsel for the city that the park board assumed control of the avenue, and has had possession of and exercised dominion over it from the time of the completion of the council's condemnation proceedings in 1888 down to appellant's arrest in July, 1900. But the record is void of evidence showing what, if any, acts the park board performed in the exercise of such control. There is nothing to show that it kept the roadway in repair. Neither does it appear when the ordinance went into effect.

So far as we are informed by the record, dominion and jurisdiction by the board over the avenue as a parkway can only be inferred from the fact that in 1887 the board instituted proceedings for its improvement by macadamizing it, and vacated such proceedings only for the purpose of permitting the city to perfect its title to the land, and from the further fact that the board assumed jurisdiction over it by having caused the arrest of appellant. Section 2 of chapter 281, Special Laws 1883, provides that the park board shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, to devise and adopt a system of public parks and parkways, and to designate the lands and grounds to be used and appropriated for the same; and, upon obtaining title or the right of possession thereof, to hold, govern, and administer the same, and to lay out and improve the same according to such plan as the board may adopt. But by § 1, chap. 304, Special Laws 1885, it is provided that all parkways shall be subject to the control and government of the board of park commissioners in respect to the construction, maintenance, regulation, and government thereof, and to the use, travel, and traffic over and upon the same: provided, that no street, alley, or public place, or any part thereof, shall be made a parkway without the consent of the city council. Under this law it is clear that the park board had authority to designate Lyndale avenue as a parkway in the manner in which it did,—by a resolution to that effect. It is equally clear that the rights of the public in relation to such street could not be changed unless the city council gave its consent to such dedication. Such consent might be given, as it was in the first instance, by a resolution of that body; but there is nothing in the act to prevent such consent from being given in some other manner. It might be inferred from the council's conduct in reference to the avenue. If, in fact, the park board did designate it as a parkway, and had assumed control of it for a number of years without objection on the part of the city council, then consent might be inferred. The difficulty with this case is that the record does not furnish convincing evidence either that the park board actually took possession of the avenue after title thereto was perfected by the city, and continued to exercise dominion over it as a parkway down to the time of appellant's arrest, or that the city council acquiesced in such control, if assumed, by the park board. But, inasmuch as the case must be disposed of adversely to respondent upon the question of the validity of the ordinance, we have deemed it wise not to determine, at this time, whether or not Lyndale avenue was a parkway at the time in question.

2. The pertinent part of the ordinance here involved reads as follows: “. . . No vehicle, which, together with its load, weights more than 2,000 pounds, and which is in use for carrying goods, merchandise, building material, manure, dirt, earth, or other article or commodity, and which has tires less than 6 inches in width, shall pass or enter upon any park or parkway.” It was held in the case of State v. Waddell, 49 Minn. 500, 52 N. W. 213, that in respect to a parkway to which the city had not acquired title as a part of its park system the board had no power to exclude the ordinary class of traffic, and confine the travel thereon to what may be termed park or pleasure travel. A distinction is made between streets and avenues of a park system to which the city has acquired title for such purposes and a street which has simply been designated a parkway by the board with the consent of the city council. In the one case the board has complete jurisdiction and power, not only to regulate, but to prohibit, general traffic; while in the other case it has no power to prohibit general traffic. It does not follow, however, that it has not the power to regulate such traffic within a reasonable limit. Conceding that the avenue in question was a parkway, and could be used by the public for general purposes of travel and traffic, how far does the board's regulating power extend? If, in order to protect the roadbeds, it were necessary to prohibit heavy traffic in wagons with narrow tires, provided wider ones were reasonably obtainable, such requirement would not be unreasonable; but in this case the tire used by appellant was of the widest in common use carried in the market for such traffic. According to the evidence, the 6-inch tire was not in common use, and was not found in the market ready-made, and only obtainable upon special order, and at extra expense. The evidence does not disclose that the roadway was in any manner damaged by appellant's wagon, nor does it appear that such traffic with 3½ inch tires would tend to impair the same. Under these circumstances the ordinance contained an unreasonable and arbitrary requirement, which, in its effect, was prohibitive of that class of traffic. Such power the board of park commissioners did not possess, and in that respect the ordinance is void.

Order reversed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam response was handed down on May 28, 1901:

Since filing our opinion in this case, attention has been called to a misstatement of facts. It is stated in the opinion that all proceedings with reference to the acquisition of Lyndale avenue as a parkway between Twentieth and Twenty-Ninth avenues had been abandoned and rescinded by the board of park commissioners. A more critical examination of the record discloses the fact that the resolution passed by the park board, as amended, referred only to Lyndale avenue between Twentieth and Twenty-Fourth avenues North, and, as the alleged trespass occurred between Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Ninth avenues North, it is contended on behalf of respondent that that portion of the parkway was never abandoned. It appears, however, that the resolution was reported by the secretary of the park board to the city council as originally introduced, including the street from Twentieth to Twenty-Ninth avenues North, and it was upon this resolution, as so reported, that the council took action. We make this correction in order that the facts may not be misunderstood, but we are unable to see that it affects the conclusions of the court as stated in the former opinion. We shall not undertake to decide whether or not, under such circumstances, the parkway was abandoned, and we leave that question undetermined. The petition for reargument is denied.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Missouri, Resp't.,
v.

(160 Mo. 333.)

1. An unconstitutional delegation of legislative power is not effected by conferring upon the state auditor the right to issue licenses for bookmaking on horse races to persons of good character, to be exercised on grounds of good repute.
2. A statute prohibiting bookmaking or pool selling at all places except upon grounds where the races are to be run, and by all except licensed persons, is not an unconstitutional special law on the ground that it grants special and exclusive rights and immunities.

(February 19, 1901.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction convicting him of violating a statute for the punishment of bookmaking and pool selling by unlicensed persons. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. J. Rowe, for appellant:

The act approved April 7, 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 100), is prohibited by §§ 1 and 53, art. 4, of the Constitution of Missouri, and § 1, art. 14, of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Messrs. Boyle, Priest, & Lehmann, William M. Williams, and Thomas B. Harvey, for respondent:

Gaming is a vice which the state may, in the exercise of its police power, regulate or suppress, and it may do so by prohibiting gaming on particular games or in particular places.

The restrictions contained in the law are reasonable in their nature, and are plainly designed to further the general object of the law by confining bookmaking and pool selling to such persons, places, and times as in the judgment of the legislature would best serve the public welfare.

The act is not a delegation of legislative authority, but simply delegates power to determine the fact or state of things upon which the law intends to make its own action depend.

Messrs. Edward C. Crow and Samuel B. Jeffries also for respondent.

Burgess, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 19th day of January, 1900, the defendant was convicted in the St. Louis court of criminal correction, and fined $1,000, under an information filed in said court against him and others by the prosecuting attorney of said court, charging them with bookmaking and pool selling in violation of an act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri entitled "An Act to Punish Bookmaking and Pool Selling by Unlicensed Persons, to Provide for the Issuance of Such a License, and to Dispose of the Funds Arising from Such License," approved April 7, 1897, at No. 112 North Fourth street, in the city of St. Louis and state of Missouri, on the 10th day of October, 1899, by unlawfully engaging in bookmaking by means of a system of gambling, commonly called a "book," upon the result of a certain contest of speed of beasts known as "horses," by certain persons, in the manner therein named, which was to take place thereafter, on the 10th day of October, 1899, beyond the limits of the state of Missouri, and by then and there betting money with certain persons therein named on the result of said contest, etc. Defendant appeals.

The only question raised by defendant on this appeal is with respect to the validity of the act of the legislature, which he contends is unconstitutional because violative of §§ 1 and 53 of article 4 of the Constitution of this state, and of § 1 of article 14 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. Section 1 of article 4 of the state Constitution provides that "the legislative power subject to the limitations herein contained shall be vested in a senate and house of representatives to be styled 'the general assembly of the state of Missouri.'" The act provides that no person shall record or register, by mechanical or other means, bets or wagers, or sell auction pools, or engage in any bookmaking, by or through any device, book, instrument, or contrivance, upon the result of any trial or contest of skill, speed, or power of endurance of man or beast, which is to take place within or beyond the limits of this state, without first having obtained a license as in the act provided. Section 2 provides that any person of good reputation desiring to obtain a license to sell auction pools, make books, or register wagers or bets by mechanical or other means, shall apply, in writing under oath, to the state auditor, for such license, stating that the contests upon which such pools, books, or wagers are made are actually to take place upon the race course or fair grounds where he desires to carry on business, the character of the business he desires to conduct, and the length of time; and the state auditor, if satisfied with the good character of such applicant, and the good repute of the race course or fair ground upon which the applicant may desire to conduct such business, may issue a license authorizing him to do any or all of the things provided therein. The auditor may refuse to issue a license to any person to be used upon any race course or fair ground after such place or places have been operated for a period of ninety days in any one year. Section 3 requires that no license shall be issued for less than three nor more than ninety days, and it shall express upon its face the particular class of business which the applicant is permitted to conduct, and such license shall only authorize him to engage in pool selling, bookmaking, or registering bets as expressed therein. It shall also state the number of books and registers to be used, and the length of time and place where conducted, and no license shall be issued from the 1st day of November to the 1st day of April in each year. Section 4 prohibits the business being conducted at any other place than mentioned in the license, and prevents its being conducted at any other time than between 10 o'clock A. M. and 7 o'clock P. M.; and such person holding a license shall not be permitted to sell pools to, and accept or register bets from, any minor. Section 5 prescribes the penalty for the violation of any of the provisions of the act. Laws 1897, p. 100.

It is perfectly clear that bookmaking and pool selling, within the scope and meaning of this act, are gaming or gambling, which the state may, in the exercise of its police powers, prohibit altogether, or may regulate and control by restricting it to certain localities, or by prohibiting it from being practised in other localities. Thus it was held in State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 17, 14 Am. Rep. 471, that an ordinance of the city of St. Louis licensing bawdy houses was valid under the city charter, and that a license taken out in conformity with the ordinance would shield them from criminal proceedings by the state. Indeed, there is no conflict in the authorities upon this question, or the right of cities to suppress such houses, when authorized to do so by their charters. In St. Louis v. Fitz, 53 Mo. 585, it is said: "There is no doubt of the power of the legislature, or of municipalities deriving their power from the legislature, to make police regulations designed to promote the health and morals of the community. Laws to prohibit or regulate gaming, sales of intoxicating liquors, houses of prostitution, and thus indirectly advance the morals and good order of society, are beyond question." Any practice the tendency of which is to corrupt the morals of those who participate in or witness its practice is a proper subject of regulation by the state; and that bookmaking and pool selling and betting upon horse racing is demoralizing in its tendencies, and hence an evil which the law may legitimately suppress without infringing upon the constitutional rights of any citizen, is no longer an open question. In the case of Es parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, 27 Pac. 933, it is said: "Any practice or business the tendency of which, as shown by experience, is to weaken or corrupt the morals of those who follow it, or to encourage idleness instead of habits of industry, is a legitimate subject for regulation or prohibition by the state; and that gambling, in the various modes in which it is practised, is thus demoralizing in its tendencies, and therefore an evil which the law may rightfully suppress without interfering with any of those inherent rights of citizenship which it is the object of government to protect and secure, is no longer an open question. The measures needful or appropriate to be taken in the exercise of this police power are determined by legislative policy, and for this purpose a wide discretion is committed to the lawmaking body. Whether it shall entirely prohibit, or only regulate by confining such practices within prescribed limits—whether the law shall apply to every kind of gambling, or only to those games or wagers in which evil effects appear with greatest prominence,—must be determined primarily by the legislative department of the state, or of the municipality authorized to exercise this great power, which is conferred for the purpose of securing the public safety and welfare; and unless it clearly appears that a statute or ordinance ostensibly enacted for this purpose has no real or substantial relation to these objects, and that the fundamental rights of the citizen are assailed under the guise of a police regulation, the action of that department is conclusive." The same rule is announced in State ex rel. Patterson v. Donovan, 20 Nev. 75, 15 Pac. 783; Cooley, Const. Linn. p. 596. A similar question was before the Supreme Court of the United States in L'Hotel v. New Orleans, 177 U. S. 596, 44 L. ed. 903, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 791, in which it was said: "In this respect we premise by saying that one of the difficult social problems of the day is what shall be done in respect to those vocations which minister to and feed upon human weaknesses, appetites, and passions. The management of these vocations comes directly within the scope of what is known as the police power. They affect directly the public health and morals. Their management becomes a matter of growing importance, especially in our larger cities, where, from the very density of the population, the things which minister to vice tend to increase and multiply. It has been often said that the police power was not by the Federal Constitution transferred to the nation, but was reserved to the states, and that upon them rests the duty of so exercising it as to protect the public health and morals. . . . Obviously, the regulation of houses of ill fame—legislation in respect to women of loose character—may involve one of three possibilities: First, absolute prohibition; second, full freedom in respect to place, coupled with rules of conduct; or, third, a restriction of the location of such houses to certain defined limits. Whatever course of conduct the legislature may adopt is, in a general way, conclusive upon all courts, state and Federal. It is no part of the judicial function to determine the wisdom or folly of a regulation by the legislative body in respect to matters of a police nature."

But defendant claims that § 2 of the act delegates legislative power to an executive officer, namely, the state auditor, in that it confers upon him the right to say who are persons of good character, and what race courses or fair grounds are of good repute, and the right to grant a license to any person he believes of good reputation to make a book on A's race track, and upon the same person a license to make a book on C's track, etc. While the legislature could not delegate to the state auditor the power to make laws, it does not follow that it could not delegate to him the power to pass upon the character of persons applicants for license to sell auction pools, make books, or regulate wagers or bets upon contests to take place upon the race course where they desire to carry on the business, and to determine what race courses and fair grounds are of good repute, and to grant to persons whom he may find to be of good character licenses to sell auction pools thereon. The power delegated to the state auditor is not the power to make a law, but is the power to determine a fact or thing upon which the action of the law depends, and it cannot be said to be legislative in its character. The state, in the exercise of its police regulations, may prohibit gambling altogether, or regulate it in such manner as it may see proper, and for that purpose may vest such officers as it may see proper with the power to pass upon the character of persons who apply for licenses for that purpose, as well, also, as the place where to be conducted, and to grant license to such persons as he may think entitled thereto to conduct their business at such times and places as he may think proper, not prohibited by law. In passing upon a similar question in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 34 L. ed. 620, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13, it was said: "The manner and extent of regulation rest in the discretion of the governing authority. That authority may vest in such officers as it may deem proper the power of passing upon applications for permission to carry it on, and to issue licenses for that purpose. It is a matter of legislative will only. As in many other cases, the officers may not always exercise the power conferred upon them with wisdom or justice to the parties affected. But that is a matter which does not affect the authority of the state, nor is it one which can be brought under the cognizance of the courts of the United States." So, in Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. 491, 13 Am. Rep. 716, it is said: "The legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

. . . If the power to determine the expediency or necessity of granting licenses to sell liquors in a municipal division can be committed to a commission, a council, or a court,—which no one can dispute,—why cannot the people themselves be authorized to determine the same thing? If a determining power cannot be delegated, then there can be no power delegated to city councils, commissioners, and the like, to pass ordinances, by-laws, and resolutions in the nature of laws, binding and affecting both the persons and property of the citizens. If a determining power cannot be conferred by law, there can be no law that is not absolute, unconditioned, and peremptory; and nothing which is unknown, uncertain, and contingent can be the subject of law." In State v. Barringer, 110 N. C. 525, 14 S. E. 781, it was held that a law which prohibits the manufacture of spirituous liquors within 3 miles of the orphans' home, near Barium Springs, in that state, without the written permission of the superintendent of the home, was a constitutional exercise of the power of police regulations. The discretion vested in the state auditor is not arbitrary. He is by law made the state's agent, and is bound to exercise the discretion vested in him fairly and impartially, for the just purpose of carrying out the intention of the law. It is frequently the case that statutes require particular things to be done to make that legal which would otherwise be illegal, which depend upon the judgment and discretion of a designated agent, officer, or person; and under such circumstances the discretion is not arbitrary, but is lawful, when lawfully exercised. Statutes and ordinances have been sustained forbidding orations, etc., in a park without the prior consent of the park commissioners (Com. v. Abrahams, 150 Mass. 57, 30 N. E. 79), or upon the common or other grounds in the absence of the permission of the city committee (Com. v. Davis, 140 Mass. 485, 4 N. E. 577); prohibiting the occupancy of a place on the street for a stand in the absence of permission of the clerk of Faneuil Hall Market (Re Nightingale, 11 Pick. 168); prohibiting the keeping of swine without a permit in writing from the board of health (Quincy v. Kennard, 151 Mass. 563, 24 N. E. 860); forbidding the erection of wooden buildings without the permit of the commissioners of the town, through their clerk (Easton Comrs. v. Covey, 74 Md. 262, 22 Atl. 266); and forbidding the beating of drums in the traveled streets of a city without the permission of the president of the board of trustees of the municipality (Re Flaherty, 105 Cal. 558, 27 L. R. A. 529, 38 Pac. 981). In all of these cases, and numerous others that might be cited, the power to grant permission (in other words, a license) was vested in some particular person or persons, committee or officers; and in none of them was it held that the power to do so was a delegation of legislative power. Our conclusion is that the act is not violative of § 1, art. 4, of the state Constitution.

A further contention is that the law in question violates § 53, art. 4, of the state Constitution, which provides that the "general assembly shall not pass any local or special law," in that it grants to corporations and individuals special or exclusive rights and immunities. State v. Walsh, 138 Mo. 400, 35 L. R. A. 231, 37 S. W. 1112, and State v. Thomas, 138 Mo. 100, 39 S. W. 481, are relied upon as supporting these contentions. In Walsh's Case an act of the legislature (Laws 1895, p. 150) was held to be a special law, and void under § 53, supra, upon the ground that "it takes bookmakers, pool sellers and betmongers" as a class, and divides them into two portions, one of which, to wit, that portion which assembles "on the premises or within the limits or inclosure of a regular race course," it renders immune from punishment, while another portion of the same genus, bookmaker, pool seller, or betmonger, who pursue their avocation outside or immediately outside of the sacred precincts of "a regular race course," is subject to fine and imprisonment. In Thomas's Case, Walsh's Case was approved, and it was held that the act of 1891 (Laws 1891, p. 122), which prohibits the selling of bets, "upon the result of any trial or contest which is to take place beyond the limits of this state," but exempts by implication all persons who make such wagers on "contests which are to take place within this state," is a special law, and in conflict with § 53, supra, and that the act is a special law and void for the further reason that it separates offenders who gamble on events to occur outside of this state from those who do the same things as to events occurring within this state,—prescribes punishment for the former and protection to the latter,—thus dividing natural classes into two portions, making two classes out of one, and arbitrarily enacts different rules for the government of each. The act passed upon in Thomas's Case made it a criminal offense to wager upon horse races to take place out of this state, while wagering upon similar races to occur in this state was exempt; and it was correctly held that the law was special, and therefore void. The act adjudicated upon in the Walsh Case (Laws 1895, p. 150) provides "that any person who keeps any room, shed, tenement, tent, booth or building, or any part thereof, within this state, and who occupies same with any book, instrument, or device for the purpose of recording or registering bets or wagers, or selling pools upon the result of any trial or contest of skill, speed, or power of endurance of man or beast, which is to be made or to take place within or without this state, or any person who records or registers bets or wagers, or sells pools upon the result of any trial or contest of skill, speed, or power of endurance of man or beast, which is to be made or take place within or without this state; or, being the owner, lessee, or occupant of any room, tenement, shed, tent, booth or building, or any part thereof, knowingly permit the same to be used or occupied for any of the purposes hereinabove set forth, or therein keeps, exhibits, or employs any device or apparatus for the purpose of recording or registering such bets or wagers or selling of pools as are hereinabove set forth, or becomes the custodian or depositary for hire or privilege of any money, property, or thing of value which is staked, wagered, or pledged contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a term of not less than six months or more than one year, and by a fine of not less than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment: provided, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prohibit or make it unlawful for any person to engage in or register bets and wagers, make books, sell pools or bet upon any trial or contest of speed of a horse, or between horses, on the premises or within the limits or inclosure of a regular racecourse on which such contest of speed is had, and at and prior to the time thereof: provided, that it shall be unlawful to make and sell said pools or book-bets to minors; and any person selling said pools and book-bets to any minor shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail for a term of not less than three months or more than one year, and by a fine of not less than $500." Now, the only material difference between the act of 1895, passed upon and held to be invalid in the Walsh Case, and the act in question in this case (Laws 1897, p. 100), is that under this act bookmaking and pool selling are prohibited at all places except upon race courses and fair grounds where the races are to be run, and then only upon the procurement of a license from the state auditor by any person who desires to engage in such business, while no license is provided for by the act of 1895. Gaming, sales of intoxicating liquors, houses of prostitution, and any practice which tends to demoralize, weaken, and corrupt the morals, may be regulated by the state, and confined to certain localities, or prohibited altogether, under its police powers, without infringing upon the inherent rights of any of its citizens. "And unless it clearly appears that a statute or ordinance ostensibly enacted for this purpose has no real or substantial relation to these objects, and that the fundamental rights of the citizens are assailed under the guise of a police regulation, the action of that department is conclusive." Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, 27 Pac. 933. The sale of intoxicating liquors by retail is permitted in this state only under a license for that purpose,—the business to be conducted at some particular building,—and the power of the legislature to thus regulate its sale has never been called in question. So it was held by this court that a city ordinance licensing bawdy houses in the city of St. Louis was valid, under its charter. State v. Clarke, 54 Mo. 17, 14 Am. Rep. 471; State 54 L. R. A.

v. Debar, 58 Mo. 395. In Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, 27 Pac. 933, an ordinance of the city of San Francisco prohibiting the selling of pools on horse races, except within the inclosure of a race track where the race is to be run, is a valid police regulation, not in conflict with the Constitution of that state, and not void because its incidental effect may be to confer a special privilege or benefit upon those who own or control the race courses, by giving them the exclusive right to carry on the business, or of selling to others the privilege of the pool selling. It was held in Brennan v. Brighton Beach Racing Assn. 56 Hun, 188, 9 N. Y. Supp. 220, that by the laws of New York taxing race associations on their receipts, and declaring that such racing and pool selling in the state shall be confined to the period between the 15th day of May and the 15th day of October in each year, and all pool selling shall be confined to the tracks where the races take place, and the days when they take place, it was the intention of the legislature to sanction pool selling at the times and places fixed by the statute, and that a purchaser of a pool ticket at such a time and place may sue for his share in the pool. In Debardeleben v. State, 99 Tenn. 649, 42 S. W. 684, the defendant was tried, convicted, and fined for betting upon a horse race while without the inclosure within which the race was run, and appealed. The law under which the conviction was had provides, among other things, that "horse racing, without regard to the distance which may be run, trotted, or paced, where the same is run, trotted, or paced upon a race track, or path made or kept for the purpose, and inclosed by a substantial fence, . . . but it shall be unlawful gaming to bet or wager in any way upon any horse race, unless the race track upon which the race is run, trotted, or paced be inclosed by a substantial fence, and the bet or wager be made within said inclosure, upon a race to be run, trotted, or paced within said inclosure." Held, that horse racing is indictable as gaming under the laws of the state of Tennessee, unless the race is run within a substantial inclosure, and the bet made therein, and that the statute is not vicious class legislation; that the class legislation is not arbitrary or capricious, as the law embraces all persons, and affects alike all who are or choose to place themselves within its reach. So in the case at bar the law embraces all persons alike who choose to place themselves within its reach, and is not, therefore, vicious class legislation, either as to persons or place. And if bawdy houses, the sale by retail of intoxicating liquors, and gambling may be licensed by the state, in the exercise of its police powers, to be conducted by certain persons at specified places, and prohibited at all others, in regard to which there can be no question, for the same reasons it must follow that the act of 1897, in declaring betting on horse racing to be gambling, and in authorizing it, and the licensing of bookmaking and pool selling to be carried on at certain race courses, and in prohibiting it at all other places, is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state. The act is not in any way in conflict with § 1, art. 14, of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Our conclusion is that the law is valid, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

All concur.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

Elmer J. WHEELER
v.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

(.....N. H.....)

1. A railroad company is liable for injuries to a drunken passenger caused by his fall from the door of a baggage car, near which he was permitted to dance and stagger, if, by exercising the care the situation required, it could have prevented the injury, and the passenger could not avoid it, although his inability resulted from his voluntary intoxication.
2. The jury must determine whether or not a railroad company could have prevented a drunken passenger staggering and dancing between the open doors of a baggage car without capacity to appreciate the danger, from falling out and being injured.
3. Whether or not the measure of care which a railroad company owed to a drunken passenger dancing and staggering between the open doors of the baggage car was such that by its exercise he could have been prevented from falling out to his injury is a question for the jury.
4. That incapacity of a passenger is caused by his voluntary intoxication will not absolve the carrier, upon discovering it, from using due care to prevent his being injured because he has placed himself in a dangerous position without ability to care for himself.
5. A general exception to the court's charge to the jury is unavailing without a specification calling the attention of the court to the particular error that it may be corrected.
6. A railroad company is chargeable with the knowledge of its conductor and baggageman as to the helpless condition of a passenger riding in the baggage car.
7. When proper instructions are given it is no ground of exception that they are not given in the form requested.
8. A requested instruction not true in its application to the case on trial should not be given, although stating a proposition true in general.
9. The failure to exercise due care for the protection of a drunken passenger on the part of a carrier having knowledge of his inability to realize the danger from an exposed position which he has assumed, and not the passenger's incapacity which results from his voluntary intoxication, nor his placing himself in such position, is the legal cause of his falling from the train and being injured.

10. The rule of contributory negligence does not apply to an injury to a drunken passenger by falling from a train while staggering and dancing between the open doors of the baggage car, where, with knowledge on the part of the carrier of his inability to realize his danger and to care for himself, it makes no effort to protect him from injury.
11. Whether or not the intoxication of a passenger renders him incapable of understanding the danger of a position which he has assumed, or of protecting himself from its hazards, although he is able to talk, laugh, sing and dance about, is a question for the jury.
12. The duty of a railroad company may be found by the jury to include the doing of something to prevent injury to a drunken passenger who is in a dangerous position, the danger of which it knows he is ignorant of and powerless to avoid.
13. The duty of a carrier to protect an intoxicated passenger from falling from an exposed position on the cars is not changed by the fact that the intoxication is in violation of a statute.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Coos County Court made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

Plaintiff boarded defendant's train in an intoxicated condition, and entered the baggage car to ride there. While the train was in motion at the rate of 40 or 50 miles an hour he danced, staggered, and moved about in the car, the side doors of which were open. A lurch of the train caused him to fall from one of the open doors, whereby he received the injury complained of.

gence. His inexcusable negligence contributed to and was the proximate cause of his injury.

Messrs. Crawford D. Hening and Albert S. Twitchell for plaintiff.

Parsons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the position occupied by the plaintiff at the time of his injury was dangerous to one in full control of his bodily powers, or dangerous to the plaintiff only because of his lack of such control, the plaintiff's own act produced the dangerous situation from which his injury resulted. If his failure to exercise the care of a person of ordinary prudence placed him in this situation, dangerous to him on either ground, the fact of his intoxication would not excuse him. If his act would have been negligence in a sober man, he was none the less guilty of negligence if intoxicated. For an injury resulting from prior or concurrent negligence of the defendants, to which his negligence contributed, he could not recover. But if the defendants, with knowledge of the plaintiff's danger, in the performance of the duty owed by them could have prevented the injury, they were bound to do so; and their breach of duty would be the legal cause of the injury, unless at the time of the injury the plaintiff, by the exercise of due care, could have avoided it. If the plaintiff could not have prevented the injury to himself, and the defendants could, by the care the situation required of them, they are liable if they did not, although the plaintiff's inability resulted from his prior negligence or intoxication. "If due care on the part of either at the time of the injury would prevent it, the antecedent negligence of one or both parties is immaterial, except it may be as one of the circumstances by which the requisite measure of care is to be determined. In such a case the law deals with their behavior in the situation in which it finds them at the time the mischief is done, regardless of their prior misconduct. The latter . . . is the cause of the danger; the former is the cause of the injury." Nashua Iron & Steel Co. v. Worcester & N. R. Co. 62 N. H. 159, 164; Inland & Seaboard Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 551, 558, 35 L. ed. 270, 272, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653; Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Ives, 144 U. S. 408, 429, 36 L. ed. 485, 493, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679; State v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 52 N. H. 528, 537; Bremner v. Jones, 67 N. H. 374, 26 L. R. A. 408, 30 Atl. 411; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 99, 100; Cooley, Torts, 674; Pierce, Railroads, 374. The plaintiff was not a trespasser to whom the defendants owed no duty except not actively to injure him. Buch v. Armory Mfg. Co. 69 N. H. 257, 44 Atl. 809. If he were, in spite of his prior misconduct the defendants would be liable for negligently running upon him. Eagerly v. Union Street R. Co. 67 N. H. 312, 36 Atl. 558. He was the defendants' passenger. Upon them was imposed the duty of carrying him safely, so far as it could be done by the exercise of the care demanded by the circumstances. Taylor v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 48 N. H. 304, 2 Am. Rep. 229. Whether the defendants, knowing the plaintiff's dangerous position, and his incapacity to protect himself or to appreciate the danger, could have prevented the injury, is a question of fact. Whether, under the circumstances, the care which the defendants owed the plaintiff was such that, by its exercise, the injury would have been prevented, was also a question for the jury. Monroe v. Connecticut River Lumber Co. 68 N. H. 89, 93, 39 Atl. 1019. The defendants' answer is that the plaintiff's incapacity was produced by his voluntary intoxication. But, if it were established that the plaintiff's incapacity and irresponsibility were known to the defendants, the cause of his condition is entirely immaterial. Intoxication will not of itself prevent a recovery. It will not excuse the plaintiff's nonexercise of care, and will not prevent his recovery if he exercised such care as the law required. Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 239; Alger v. Lowell, 3 Allen, 402; Kean v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 61 Md. 154; Cincinnati, I. St. L. & O. R. Co. v. Cooper, 120 Ind. 469, 6 L. R. A. 241, 22 N. E. 340; Wood, Railroads, § 319a; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 146; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 93, 94; Pierce, Railroads, 295; 2 Jaggard, Torts, 1091; Buswell, Personal Injuries, § 147. The declaration alleged the plaintiff's incapacity to care for himself, the defendants' knowledge of that fact and of the dangerous position he was in, their ability to prevent the injury by due care, and their failure to do so, and that the plaintiff's injury was due to the defendants' breach of duty. These facts constituted a cause of action, and the demurrer was properly overruled. It was conceded on argument that the formal allegation of the plaintiff's due care or absence of fault was unnecessary. Upon the questions of fact presented to the jury there was evidence tending more or less strongly in favor of the plaintiff's contentions. The motion for a verdict was properly denied. The general exception to the charge is unavailing without a specification calling the attention of the court to the particular error, that it may be corrected. Emery v. Boston & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. 434, 36 Atl. 367. A special exception was taken to the instruction that the defendants were chargeable with the knowledge of their conductor and baggage man. The defendants, a corporation, could act only through agents and servants, and the individuals named were in charge of its business on this occasion. The conductor was in charge of the train, and the baggage man of the car in which the injury happened. The instruction was proper.

The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury that if they found "that the plaintiff himself was negligent, and that his negligence materially contributed to produce the injury complained of, he cannot recover." This request was repeated in various forms involving the same principle of law. The instruction was not given in the form requested. The instruction asked correctly states an elementary legal proposition, and the question is whether the rule asked for was in substance, so far as it was applicable to the evidence, included in the instructions given. We think that it was. When proper instructions are given, it is no ground of exception that they are not given in the form requested. Walker v. Walker, 64 N. H. 55, 5 Atl. 460. If a request to charge the jury states a proposition true in general, but not so in its application to the case on trial, the instruction should not be given. Atherton v. Tilton, 44 N. H. 452, 456; Clark v. Wood, 34 N. H. 447, 453. The contentions of the defendants are: (1) That such contributory negligence conclusively appears upon the evidence; and (2) if this contention is not sustained, that the specific instruction requested should have been given. It may be assumed that the plaintiff was negligent and careless in boarding the defendants' train in his intoxicated condition, and in occupying, in that condition, up to the moment of the accident, the exposed position which he did in the baggage car. This appears to have been conceded at the trial. The question is, Did this negligence, in a legal sense, contribute to the injury? If it did, the defendants are entitled to a verdict. The jury were instructed in part as follows: "In this case the plaintiff must show you that he was so much under the influence of liquor or so drunk at the time the accident happened that he was irresponsible, or incapable of taking care of himself under the circumstances in which he was placed; that the defendants knew of his condition at the time the accident happened; and that, after they knew of the plaintiff's condition and his danger, they could have prevented the accident by the exercise of due care. If the plaintiff fails to satisfy you of any of these facts, his case falls. When a man in his senses exposes himself voluntarily to apparent danger, he is not in the exercise of that care which the law makes it the duty of every man to take to prevent injury to himself; and drunkenness will not relieve the plaintiff from the exercise of the care required of people in general. But, while drunkenness will not excuse the exercise of due care on the plaintiff's part, still, if the plaintiff was so completely under the influence of liquor or so drunk at the very time of the accident that he was irresponsible, or incapable of taking care of himself, and the defendants knew of his condition and danger in time to prevent the accident, and did not use due care to prevent it, they were in fault. . . . In this case, while the defendants were not under obligation to accept the plaintiff as a passenger in the condition he tells you he was, still, if they did accept him when they knew he was so much under the influence of liquor that he was irresponsible, or incapable of taking care of himself, under the circumstances in which he was placed, or if they permitted him to remain on their train after they became aware of his condition, it was their duty to use due care to prevent injury to him; and due care would be the exercise of such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise, situated in precisely similar circumstances as the facts show you existed at the time of this accident. In this case, if the defendants knew the plaintiff's condition, and could have prevented the accident by the exercise of due care, they are in fault; but if the defendants, after they knew of the plaintiff's condition, could not have prevented the accident by due care, they are not in fault. This is predicated on the fact that you find that the plaintiff was so much under the influence of liquor that he was irresponsible, or incapable of taking care of himself." These instructions clearly and forcibly stated the rights and duties of the parties, and the legal principles involved were repeatedly impressed upon the attention of the jury. The instructions assume, in effect, the plaintiff's guilt of contributory negligence in occupying the position he did at the time of the accident; for the jury were told that the plaintiff must fail unless at the time of the accident he was incapable of taking care. What was said includes the instruction requested, and more; for the request left it to the jury to say whether, by the exercise of care at the time of the accident, the plaintiff could have avoided the injury, while the charge assumed that by the exercise of care at time he could have avoided the injury, because the jury were told that he could not recover unless incapable of care. Hence the charge was more favorable to the defendants than the requested instruction. It included that and more. Whether the charge is correct in assuming that a sober passenger, who stands in an open baggage car, and does not keep himself from being thrown out by the lurch of the train, is guilty of contributory negligence under all circumstances, we need not inquire, because the defendants cannot complain of an error in their favor. Mandigo v. Healey, 69 N. H. 94, 96, 45 Atl. 318. The question in the case is: Was the plaintiff's negligent conduct in becoming intoxicated, and placing himself while intoxicated in a position where, by reason of his intoxication, he was incapable of preventing injury to himself, the legal cause of the injury? It must be conceded that the defendants were bound to exercise care for the plaintiff's safety, having accepted him as a passenger. If, in a given situation, they could, by the exercise of the care demanded by the situation, save him from harm, which by like care he could not avoid, they are liable. One element requisite to the determination of the care required is the knowledge of the danger possessed by each party. The plaintiff's intoxication may be laid entirely out of the case, except upon that question. Take the case of a sober passenger standing between the open doors of a car, or dancing about in the car, who does not know that what he is doing is attended with danger, while the railroad officials standing by know both the danger and the passenger's ignorance of it. It was decided in 1808, in Dudley v. Smith, 1 Campb. 167, that the driver of a stage coach, before passing through any place that is dangerous, is bound to inform the passengers of the full extent of the danger; and if he proceeds without giving them this information the proprietor is liable for any injury which they may suffer which they might have escaped by alighting. The failure of the railroad employees to warn the passenger of the danger, to him, to their knowledge, unknown, but to them known, would be clearly a breach of duty which would render the carrier liable for an injury due to the lack of warning. The case supposed differs from the present only in the fact that the plaintiff's want of knowledge, incapacity, and irresponsibility was produced by his own negligence. But one's inability to escape danger because of his negligence does not authorize another negligently to injure him. "The law no more justifies . . . an avoidable injury to the person of one who carelessly exposes himself to danger than to his property similarly situated in his absence. He who cannot prevent an injury negligently inflicted upon his person or property by an intelligent agent, 'present and acting at the time,' . . . is legally without fault; and it is immaterial whether his inability results from his absence, previous negligence, or other cause. . . . Nashua Iron & Steel Co. v. Worcester & N. R. Co. 62 N. H. 159, 163." Brember v. Jones, 67 N. H. 374, 376, 26 L. R. A. 408, 30 Atl. 411. In such case the legal cause of the injury is not the negligence of carelessly exposing his person to injury which he cannot avoid, but the negligence of him who might have avoided the injury, but did not. It is urged that, as intoxication is no excuse for want of care, if the plaintiff was incapable of taking care of himself because he was drunk, he was simply failing to exercise due care without due excuse. This is only saying that he was negligent in occupying the position he did in the condition he was in. But his negligence did not excuse or justify negligence in the defendants in their care of him, and if, by the exercise of due care, they could have avoided injury to him, they were bound to do so, and their failure to do so if they could is the legal cause of the injury.

It is urged that the remaining in the car up to the very moment of the accident was negligence continuing to the very moment of the accident. Up to the very time of the accident, it is said, the plaintiff could have ceased his dance. When things came to such a pass that he could no longer prevent the accident, which was not until the accident itself began to happen, it was too late for the defendants to interfere; that it was, at most, a case of coincident negligence, and therefore the rule of contributory negligence ought to have been given. It is conceded that the rule given at the trial might apply to the man asleep on the track, but not to this case. The argument leaves out of consideration the material point of the defendants' knowledge of the danger and of the plaintiff's incapacity. If the negligence claimed were that the defendants negligently ran their train upon the curve at an excessive speed, whereby the plaintiff was thrown off, the defendants being ignorant of the plaintiff's peculiar danger, the plaintiff's negligent occupation of an exposed position would defeat his recovery, if contributing to his injury. The rule as to contributory negligence would apply. The plaintiff's intoxication would be no excuse. If what he did or was doing would defeat the action of a sober man, it would defeat him. To such a state of facts the defendants' argument and request for instructions would be entirely applicable. The present case, in principle, is exactly that of an intoxicated man who wanders upon the track without care for his safety. His intoxication does not relieve him from the result of his negligence, but it does not excuse the defendants for the breach of their duty not carelessly to injure him, nor authorize the engineer, who sees him upon the track, and knows he is incapable of saving himself, to run over and kill him. Keen v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 61 Md. 154, 157. The failure of the drunken man to see and avoid the train at the time of the accident is not the legal cause of an injury which, in spite of his negligence, the engineer could have foreseen and avoided by ordinary care, as in Brember v. Jones, 67 N. H. 374, 26 L. R. A. 408, 30 Atl. 411. The negligence of the defendant in being upon the wrong side of the road at the time of the collision was not the legal cause of the injury, if the collision could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care by the plaintiff. In this case the legal cause of the injury is not the plaintiff's failure to care for himself when incapacitated to do so by his intoxication, if, by the exercise of ordinary care, the defendants could have prevented it. The plaintiff, to the defendants' knowledge, being incapacitated from exercising any care, the question of contributory negligence is not involved. Bisaillon v. Blood, 64 N. H. 565, 15 Atl. 147. In this case the plaintiff's irresponsibility and incapacity to take care, to the defendants' knowledge, is the determining element upon the question of the care of both parties. The case was so put to the jury.

It is also claimed that the evidence does not warrant a finding that the plaintiff had so far lost his bodily powers as to be incapable of exercising care. Reference to the reserved case answers this claim. It is there stated that "the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that . . . he was received as a passenger by the defendants when so much under the influence of liquor as to be both physically and mentally incapable of taking care of himself." Whether there was or not such evidence is a question of fact settled at the trial term. Edwards v. Tilton Mills (N. H. March 15, 1901) 50 Atl. 102; Gamsby v. Columbia, 58 N. H. 60. It is conceded the plaintiff was drunk. Whether his drunkenness so affected him as to render him incapable of appreciating or understanding the dangerous position in which he was, or of protecting himself from its hazards, although he was able to talk, laugh, sing, and dance about, is a question of fact, and not of law. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that a man may not be able to do all that the plaintiff did, and still be so affected by the intoxicants of which he had partaken as not to appreciate or understand the danger of riding in a car with open side doors, or of stepping near the doors. The defendants took no precautions to guard their passenger. They did not even warn him of the danger to which he was exposed, when they knew he was irresponsible, and incapable of taking care of himself. The case does not present the question of the general duty of a railroad to take care to guard an intoxicated passenger from running into danger. The question is simply whether, knowing he is in danger which he is incapable of understanding or guarding against, they are not bound to save him, if they can by ordinary care. Leaving out of sight the immaterial fact of the cause of the plaintiff's incapacity, the question is whether a jury may not find that, in the exercise of the care in transportation required of them, a railroad corporation, knowing that a passenger is in a dangerous position,—the danger of which he does not know, and which they know he is ignorant of and powerless to avoid,—are under obligation to do something to prevent the injury. To this question there can be but one answer upon reason and the authorities. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ferguson, 79 Va. 241; St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Carr, 47 Ill. App. 353; Strand v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 67 Mich. 380, 34 N. W. 712; Fisher v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 366, 23 L. R. A. 758, 19 S. E. 578, 42 W. Va. 183, 33 L. R. A. 69, 24 S. E. 570. Whether the plaintiff's intoxication was or was not in violation of the statute is immaterial upon the question of the defendants' breach of duty. Brember v. Jones, 67 N. H. 374, 26 L. R. A. 408, 30 Atl. 411.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth IVEY, Plff. in Err.,

v.
STATE of Georgia.

(113 Ga. 1062.)

*1. The state, as accuser in a criminal proceeding, does not seek to have one of its citizens convicted unless the evidence shows his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; nor will it permit its prosecuting officer to use any unfair means in the trial, or illegal argument in his address to the jury, to the prejudice of the accused.

2. Where, therefore, a solicitor general, in his address to the jury, uses highly improper language, not authorized by the evidence or any fair deduction therefrom, and the counsel for the accused objects thereto, and moves the court to declare a mistrial, which the court refuses, and exception is taken to the ruling, this court will reverse the judgment, and grant a new trial, in the interest of justice and of fair and impartial trials.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Whitefield County to review a judgment convicting defendant of illegally selling intoxicating liquors. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jesse A. Glenn and George G. Glenn for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Samuel F. Maddox for the State.

SIMMONS, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record discloses that Mrs. Elizabeth Ivey was tried and convicted for the offense of selling intoxicating liquor without a license. She made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, and she excepted. From her motion it appears that the solicitor general, in his address to the jury, used the following language: "Gentlemen of the jury, I want you to stand by me, and help me break up this vile den;" and: "Gentlemen of the jury, if you could go over this town, and see the good mothers whose pillows have been wet with tears over their boys who have been intoxicated by the acts of this woman." Defendant's counsel objected to these remarks as being highly improper, and without evidence to authorize them, and asked the court to declare a mistrial on account of them. This motion the court overruled, simply remarking, "Go on with the case, and confine your argument to the facts in the case." The motion for a new trial complains of the refusal of the court to grant a mistrial as asked. We think that the ruling complained of was erroneous. While the state is the accuser in every criminal case, it does not seek the conviction or punishment of any one of its citizens unless the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty. An officer is appointed to represent the state in the courts, and it is his duty, when the evidence shows or tends to show the guilt of one on trial for crime, to argue to the jury that the evidence is sufficient to authorize a conviction, and that the jury should return a verdict of guilty. The state, however, will in no case permit its representative to go outside of the evidence to find a basis for appealing to the sentiments, passions, or prejudices of the jury in order to obtain a conviction. Jesse v. State, 20 Ga. 169. The solicitor general, appointed to represent the interest of the state in the trial of offenders, does not occupy the position of counsel generally. His duty does not require him to insist upon the conviction of the accused unless the evidence is sufficient to authorize

it. His office is quasi judicial, and, while it is his duty, if he honestly believes that the evidence shows the guilt of the accused, to insist upon this view before the jury, and to use in his argument all his ability and skill in presenting the case as made by the pleadings and the evidence, still it is under no circumstances his duty either to go outside of the case, and state facts not in evidence, or to appeal to the passions or prejudices of the jury. The motion for a new trial shows that the solicitor general stated as facts things to which no witness had testified,—that good mothers had wet their pillows with their tears over their boys who had been intoxicated by the acts of the accused. These remarks were not warranted by the evidence, and were plainly calculated to prejudice the accused. While, as before remarked, the state is the accuser in criminal cases, it will not permit its representatives to use unfair means against the accused pending the trial, or to comment upon facts not put in evidence, or to make remarks calculated to prejudice the accused in the minds of the jurors. This is not a new question in this court. Similar conduct was condemned by this court in no uncertain terms in the case of Berry v. State, 10 Ga. 522. In Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, where the court had refused to restrain the solicitor general from commenting on facts not in evidence, Nisbet, J., said, in reference to the habit of counsel in addressing the jury of going outside of the evidence, and commenting on facts not growing out of the evidence or the pleadings: "We entertain no shadow of doubt as to the necessity of pronouncing it, as we now do, illegal, and highly prejudicial to a fair and just administration of the rights of parties, either on the criminal or civil side of the court. It is the duty of the court to prevent such comments; and in all cases where this is not done, provided the court is requested to prevent them, we shall hold, as we rule in this case, that it is good ground for a new trial." In Forsyth v. Cothran, 61 Ga. 278, this court approved the grant of a new trial by the lower court upon this ground. In Augusta & S. R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 315, 11 S. E. 706, this court granted a new trial in a civil case because counsel for the plaintiff, in his concluding address to the jury, stated facts which were not in evidence, and inferences which could not be deduced from anything properly in the case. In Bennett v. State, 86 Ga. 401, 12 L. R. A. 449, 12 S. E. 806, a new trial was granted because the trial judge allowed the solicitor general to argue, over objection, that the accused was of bad character, when there was no evidence of such character. In Washington v. State, 87 Ga. 12, 13 S. E. 131, in which the accused was tried on a charge of arson, it was held that it was error to allow the solicitor general, over objection of defendant's counsel, 54 L. R. A.

to state that frequent burnings had occurred throughout the country, and to urge the jury, in consequence thereof, to strictly enforce the law in the case then on trial. In that case a new trial was granted. In Johnson v. State, 88 Ga. 606, 15 S. E. 667, a new trial was granted because the solicitor general was allowed, over the objections of the counsel for the accused, to argue to the jury that the failure of the counsel for the accused to examine the state's witnesses concerning a fact which the court had ruled to be inadmissible was an admission of such fact; and also that the failure of the accused to introduce these witnesses as his own amounted to such an admission. Mr. Justice Lumpkin, speaking for the court, said: "We feel constrained to allow the accused another hearing. The conclusions drawn . . . from the premises stated were unauthorized, and were highly injurious to the accused." In some of the foregoing cases it does not appear that any objection was made in the lower court to the improper language, or that any motion for a mistrial was made on account of it. The rule which now prevails in this court is that a new trial will not be granted upon such grounds unless objection is made by counsel for the accused, and some ruling invoked thereon in the court below. Farmer v. State, 91 Ga. 720, 18 S. E. 987. In the case of Bowens v. State, 100 Ga. 760, 764, 32 S. E. 666, 667. Mr. Justice Lumpkin lays down the rule as follows (with numerous citations of the decisions of this court): "Where counsel make unauthorized and improper statements in their arguments before juries, opposing counsel should call attention to the same, and either move for a mistrial or request the court to instruct the jury to disregard such statements." Even in cases where this court has refused to grant a new trial on this ground because of the failure to invoke a ruling in the court below, and make the point properly, it has almost invariably condemned the practice of commenting on facts not in evidence, and making improper remarks to the jury. In the present case the solicitor general made statements to the jury which were highly improper, the court failed to rebuke him, or to charge the jury with reference to the matter, and refused to grant a mistrial when asked so to do by the counsel for the accused. Under these circumstances, and the doctrine announced in the above-cited cases, we feel constrained to grant a new trial upon this ground. It may be that the accused was guilty of the offense charged, but certainly she cannot be said to have had a fair and impartial trial, and, in the interest of impartiality and of justice and of the dignity and decorum of the courts, a new trial should be had.

RÉSUMÉ OF THE DECISIONS PUBLISHED IN THIS BOOK.

SHOWING the Changes, Progress, and Development of the Law during the Second Quarter of the Judicial Year Beginning with October 1, 1901, Classified as Follows:

- I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.
- II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.
- III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.
- IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.
- V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.
- VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.
- VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; GIFTS; WILLS; LIENS.
- VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.
- IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

Equal protection of laws; discrimination.

The equal protection of the laws is held not to be denied to a foreign railroad corporation operating a portion of its road within the state by compelling it to become domesticated as a condition to its continuing such operation. (Ky.) 916.

A statute prohibiting bookmaking or pool selling at all places except upon grounds where the races are to be run, and by all except licensed persons, is held not to be unconstitutional as a grant of special and exclusive rights and immunities. (Mo.) 650.

A restriction of the number of persons which lodging-house keepers may permit to occupy one room during the same night is held to be a deprivation of property without due process of law, because of the discrimination in limiting the provision to lodging-house keepers. (Ill.) 838.

A statute prohibiting the letting of public printing to papers which have been established less than a year is held to violate constitutional provisions that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and that no citizen shall be granted privileges which upon the same terms shall not be granted to all citizens. (Cal.) 771.

Police power.

A statute prohibiting the sale of cream that contains less than 20 per cent of fat is held to be a valid exercise of the police power, and constitutional. (Minn.) 466.

A statute making it unlawful to herd or graze sheep within two miles of an inhabited dwelling is held to be a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not unconstitutional. (Id.) 785.

A statute making railroad companies liable to all employees for injuries caused by negligence of any of their servants in charge of any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, roundhouse, locomotive engine, or train, is held to be constitutional as an exercise of the police power. (Ind.) 787.

Jury.

A statute providing that three fourths of the jurors sitting in a civil case may concur in and render a verdict is held not to be authorized by a constitutional provision providing that in civil cases the jury may consist of less than twelve men, since the legislature is given no power to dispense with the unanimity of a verdict. (Wyo.) 549.

Physicians.

A statute authorizing the state board of health to revoke a physician's license for grossly unprofessional conduct likely to deceive or defraud the public, without fixing any standard by which such fact shall be determined, is held to be void. (Ky.) 415.

Cottolene.

A statute providing that any person who manufactures or sells any substance made in resemblance of lard, or as an imitation thereof, shall cause the package containing it to be labeled "Lard substitute," is held to forbid the sale of cottolene unless the package is labeled as provided in the statute. (Minn.) 468.

Heavy vehicles on parkway.

An ordinance providing that no vehicle which, together with its load, weighs more than 2,000 pounds, and which has tires less than 6 inches in width, shall pass or enter upon any park or parkway, is held to be void as applicable to a parkway. (Minn.) 947.

Public improvements.

Assessments for paving, made by apportioning the total cost of the work to the abutting lands according to frontage, is held not to constitute a taking of property for public use without compensation or due process of law. (Mo.) 492.

License and regulation of business.

A vessel having no propelling power of her own, and in charge of a tug having on board a licensed pilot, is held to be subject to the provisions of a state statute requiring vessels entering a certain port to take a licensed pilot, or, in case of refusal, to pay his regular fee. (C. C. A. 4th C.) 236.

The amount of the bond to be executed by a person making application for a license to sell intoxicating liquors, which is fixed by statute, is held to be a penalty, and not in the nature of liquidated damages, to be recovered as an entire sum in case any of the conditions of the bond are violated. (Minn.) 487.

Taxes.

Green-going tugboats are held not to be exempt from taxation by the state in whose waters they are exclusively employed, by the fact that they are registered and taxed at a port in another state where their owner is domiciled. (Wash.) 212.

The promotion of the construction and operation of mills and factories to manufacture sorghum cane into sugar or syrup is held to be a private purpose, and not a public one which will authorize the creation of a public debt to be paid by taxation. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 242.

A farmer who, to give his children school facilities, takes a house in town in which he places some of his household effects and lives with his family, is held not to be subject to taxation there, where he keeps his country house at all times in readiness to receive the family, and performs his duties as a citizen where his country house is located, claiming that as his home. (Ky.) 214.

An armory "owned" and occupied by any command of the volunteer military forces of the state is held not to be public property within the meaning of the constitutional provision authorizing the exemption from taxation of all public property; and a statute declaring that it shall be to all intents and purposes public property and exempt from taxation is held to be void. (Ga.) 806.

Eminent domain.

The condemnation of land for a public wharf is held not to be prevented by the fact that it is already in use by a common carrier as a landing place in connection with its business as such carrier. (Iowa) 859.

Municipal corporations.

A municipal corporation owning land on a navigable lake and its non-navigable outlet is held to have no right to appropriate the waters of the lake for a municipal water supply, even under permission of the state, to the injury of a riparian owner whose rights vested before the adoption of the state Constitution, which asserted ownership in the state of the beds of all navigable lakes, but provided that it should not debar any person from asserting his claim to vested rights. (Wash.) 190.

Under statutory authority to prevent the running at large of dogs, a municipal corporation is held to have a right to exact a fee for the privilege of keeping a dog, and, in case of its nonpayment, to impose a fine upon the owner and provide for the killing of the dog. (Ark.) 268.

Neither the general police power, nor charter authority to provide for the health and cleanliness of the city, is held to authorize a municipal ordinance prohibiting all interments within the city limits unless such prohibition is reasonable. (Or.) 636.

Making the mere possession of a lottery ticket a misdemeanor is held to be within 54 L. R. A.

the power of a municipal corporation where, by the Constitution, it has authority to make and enforce such by-laws and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws. (Cal.) 779.

Failure of a municipality to attempt to enforce its ordinance limiting the speed at which bicycles may be ridden on its streets is held to render it liable for injuries to a pedestrian knocked down by a bicycle which is being ridden at an immoderate rate of speed. (Md.) 940.

Bankruptcy.

The voluntary conveyance by an insolvent for the use of his wife, without actual fraud, of all his real estate, the value of which is not greater than is subject by law to a homestead exemption, is held not to deprive him of the right to have the homestead set off to him in a bankruptcy proceeding, in case he obtains a reconveyance after the adjudication of his bankruptcy, and includes the land in his schedule of property. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 222.

Liability upon a penal bond conditioned for the payment of rents and annuities to another during life is held to be within the provisions of the bankruptcy act of 1898 allowing the proving against the bankrupt's estate of a fixed liability, evidenced by instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition, whether then payable or not. (C. C. A. 4th C.) 369.

Schools.

Power to make vaccination a condition to admission to the schools is held not to be conferred by statutory authority to make suitable rules and regulations for their government and management, and to determine the qualifications for admission thereto, where the children are in good health, and there is no smallpox in the town, although there are some cases in other parts of the state. (Mich.) 736.

Voters and elections.

The inmates of a soldier's home are held not to acquire, by reason of their presence in such home and while kept at public expense, the right to vote in the county and precinct in which such institution is located. (Id.) 378.

Constitutional requirements of a written vote, and provisions for sorting and counting, are held not to preclude the use of a voting machine. (Mass.) 430.

Officers.

Officials in charge of the financial affairs of a county are held to have no authority to purchase vaccine matter, and to make the cost of the same a charge against the county. (Ga.) 292.

The salaries of public officers receiving no more than $5,000 per year are held to be exempt, on grounds of public policy, from the payment of their debts. (Ky.) 566.

Promotion of a police officer for acts of personal heroism is held not to be prohibited by the constitutional provision that promotions shall be made, when practicable, upon competitive examination. (N. Y.) 589.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Public policy; illegality.

An agreement that for a pecuniary consideration a person will withdraw opposition to the granting of a pardon, and will endeavor to induce the pardoning authority to grant a pardon to one who has been convicted of a crime, is held to be against public policy, and void. (Kan.) 410.

Remedy for breach.

A party to a contract, who has received and retained the benefits of a substantial partial performance by the other party, is held to have no right to rescind the contract because of the breach of complete performance by the other party; but he is held to be limited to compensation therefor in damages. (C. C. A. 8th C.) 247.

Contract not to engage in certain business.

A contract not to engage in the barber business in any manner in a certain town, made by the owner of a barber shop on the sale of his furniture, tools, and fixtures, is held to be violated by his working as an employee in another barber shop in the town. (Kan.) 913.

Covenant.

A covenant in a conveyance of land for a college campus, that it shall be devoted exclusively as a part of the campus, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon except those devoted to university purposes, is held not to be broken by the placing thereon of sheds, engines, oil tanks, etc., for exploration for oil supposed to be beneath the surface, where such occupation will probably be temporary, and the general purposes of the grant may be materially advanced by the pecuniary results of development. (C. C. A. 9th C.) 262.

Bonds.

The failure to require an agent to make weekly reports of a business transacted by him as stipulated in the terms of the agency contract, to secure the faithful performance of which a bond was given, is held to be such a material departure from the contract as will release and discharge the sureties from liability on the bond. (Minn.) 945.

The killing by a deputy sheriff of a person under the mistaken belief that he is one for whose arrest on a charge of felony he has a warrant, and that the killing is necessary to prevent his escape, is held to render the sheriff liable on his bond, where the statute provides that he shall be liable on his bond for any misconduct or default of his deputies. (Ky.) 220.

Bills and notes.

Upon the transfer to a third person for value without recourse of a promissory note for the purchase money of personal property, which contains a reservation of title to the property in the payee until the note is paid, it is held that the title reserved for securing the payment of the debt is divested, and that, if, at the time of such transfer, the title so held was not likewise transferred to the purchaser of the note as a security in his hands, it vests in the maker, and the transferee becomes an ordinary creditor of such maker. (Ga.) 808.

A payee of a promissory note, who sells it to an innocent third person, and afterwards repurchases it for value, is held to have no better right as against the maker than he possessed in the first instance. (Wis.) 673.

One who signs a promissory note in the name of another, by himself as attorney in fact, but who, to the knowledge of the payee and a subsequent indorsee has no authority to use the other's name, and who refuses their solicitation to sign his own name and bind himself personally, is held not to be liable upon the note as his contract, although it is given in a transaction of his own, and the name signed to the note is generally used by him as a tradename. (Kan.) 408.

The fact that at the time of signing a note the maker is voluntarily intoxicated to the extent that he cannot give proper attention to it, is held not to render the note void. (Ala.) 440.

Insurance.

An agent who secures an application for insurance at a time when he has not complied with the statute prohibiting, under penalty, the soliciting of insurance without a license, is held not to be entitled to recover commissions thereon, although the policies are not issued until after the license is procured, and the statute does not expressly prevent recovery of the commissions. (Me.) 939.

Recovery upon a contract of life insurance not procured by the insured with the intention of committing suicide is held not to be defeated by his suicide, unless the contract so provides in express terms. (N. J. Err. & App.) 576.

An illegitimate child is held not to be a child or relative of her father as those words are used in a statute designating the persons who may be beneficiaries in certificates of mutual benefit associations. (Mass.) 814.

An assignment of a policy upon a person's own life to another, having no insurable interest, is held to be lawful, if done in good faith, and not by way of cover for a wager policy. (Neb.) 338.

The existence of a law imposing upon a son the duty of supporting his father in case the latter becomes unable to support himself is held to give the son no insurable interest in the father's life, in the absence of any expenditures, past or prospective, towards such support. (C. C. A. 3d C.) 225.

Recovery on a policy insuring against sickness, which limits liability to the period when insured is continuously confined to his house and subject to the personal calls of a physician, is held not to be defeated by the fact that the insured went out by direction of his physician for an occasional and necessary airing, if by reason of his illness he was continuously confined to the house for a large portion of the time. (Mich.) 746.

The temporary absence of a competent watchman regularly employed for a mill, during which the mill is destroyed by fire, is held not to avoid a policy of insurance on the property, which stipulates that statements in the application shall be a part of the contract, although in the application the insured agrees to keep a watchman on the premises at such times as that when the fire occurs. (Mich.) 739.

Liability for loss resulting from destruction by fire of a building insured by a policy exempting the insurer from liability for loss caused by explosions of any kind, unless fire ensues, and in that event for the damage by fire only, and providing that if the building or any part thereof falls, except as the result of fire, the insurance shall immediately cease, is held to attach under the former clause, and not to be defeated by the latter, where one corner of the building is knocked down by an explosion in a neighboring building, and fire immediately appears in the exposed part, caused either by the flame of the explosion or by fires liberated thereby in the building insured. (C. C. A. 7th C.) 706.

The recovery for loss of prospective earnings awarded because of injury to a vessel by a collision is held to be within the rule entitling an insurer who has received an abandonment of the vessel to the fund recovered on account of the collision from the vessel in fault. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 700.

Gas.

A gas company required by statute to furnish gas to all persons within a certain distance of its mains is held to have the right to refuse to do so unless the customer agrees to pay a reasonable rent for a meter, where the value of gas required by him will not amount to one sixth of such rent. (Cal.) 769.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Corporations.

Minority stockholders of a corporation, who, by filing an equitable petition against it and its officers, succeeded in enjoining it from doing ultra vires acts which would have required the expenditure of money, are held not to be entitled to a judgment for their attorney's fees against the corporation, when the litigation did not result in the recovery of any property, and the corporation itself repudiated the efforts of the plaintiffs to thus protect its interests, and, in defense to their petition, contended that the acts in question were not ultra vires, but authorized by its charter. (Ga.) 305.

Dividend.

Under a writing entitled "escrow," instructing a depository to deliver stock to a third person in case he pays therefor on or before a certain date, it is held that no title passes to the vendee until payment is made, so as to entitle him to dividends on 54 L. R. A.

Release of judgment.

Payment of part of a judgment by a third person for the benefit of the debtor is held to be a sufficient consideration for a release of the entire judgment. (Iowa) 862.

Waiver of delay.

When time is made of the essence of a contract for the shipment of oranges under a contract of sale, acceptance of them when shipped after the stipulated time is held not to waive a right to damages caused by the delay. (Mo.) 718.

Carriers.

The duty of a railroad company to one as a passenger is held not to have arisen when, with the ticket in his pocket, he is crossing the tracks on a public highway for the purpose of boarding a train standing on the further track, and when he has not reached the platform provided for passengers. (Ill.) 827.

A carrier who, having engaged to transport imported goods in bond, pays duties and takes the goods out of bond without authority, is held to be liable for the damages caused thereby. (La.) 923.

Stoppage in transitu.

The right of stoppage in transitu of a carload of lumber is held not to be lost by the storage of the lumber by the carrier for failure to unload within the time required by its rules, when the freight charges remain unpaid and the carrier has made no agreement to hold the property for the consignee. (Mass.) 435.

Warehousemen.

A warehouseman to whom are delivered spirits in defective casks is held to be under no obligation to exercise any care to discover and cure the defect or prevent loss by leakage, where, by the storage contract, the risk of loss by leakage is placed on the owner of the spirits. (Cal.) 774.

the stock declared between the times of deposit and payment. (Utah) 508.

Partnership.

Members of an insolvent partnership, if in good faith, and all the partners consent, are held to be entitled to appropriate their own interest in the partnership property to the payment of their individual debts in preference to those of the partnership. (Kan.) 412.

A partner who, upon dissolution of the partnership and exhaustion of the social assets, pays a judgment subsequently recovered against it on partnership debts, is held to be entitled to be subrogated to the rights of creditors whose judgments he has satisfied against the real estate of his copartner in the hands of a subsequent purchaser to the extent to which his payments exceed his proportional part of the liability. (Va.) 614.

(DOMESTIC RELATIONS.—FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.—TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.)

Benefit societies.

A requirement of the constitution of a mutual benefit society, that its privileges shall be limited to members of a specified religious denomination, is held not to violate a provision of the state Constitution as to religious liberty. (Mo.) 723.

One who joins a mutual benefit society whose by-laws provide that no one can be a member of it who is a member of a society not approved by a particular church is held to have no right to complain if he is expelled from the society for membership in a society prohibited by such church. (Mich.) 727.

A provision in a certificate of membership in a benefit society, that the holder shall comply with the constitution and by-laws of the association, is held to refer to such laws as they then exist, and not to bind him to submit to a change subsequently made depriving him of the right to dispose of the benefit by will. (Ill.) 836.

A mere general consent by a member of a mutual benefit society, that the constitution and by-laws may be amended, is held to apply only to such reasonable regulations as may be within the scope of its original design, and not to authorize changes which will destroy the value of his contract. (N. C.) 605.

A provision in the constitution of a benefit society, that members shall become such subject to the power of the corporation to change its by-laws, is held not to permit the society to change at will the contract it has made with each member. (N. C.) 602.

Building associations.

The rule that the minimum premium which a building and loan association may fix, to be deducted in advance or paid in instalments, must in any case be a certain definite sum, fixed and determined at the time of the making of the loan, is held to apply to a foreign building association; and a contract which does not conform to this requirement is held not to be within the exemption from the operation of the usury laws given by statute to domestic building and loan associations. (W. Va.) 536.

While a building association may fix a minimum premium, payable in advance or in periodical instalments, it is held that such premium must be a lump sum, certain and definite, and not a percentage payable for an indefinite time, at fixed periods. (W. Va.) 217.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS.

A mutual agreement between husband and wife to separate on friendly terms and to make no future demands upon each other's property, carried out until the wife's death, is held not to prevent the husband from claiming his rights in her estate. (N. H.) 554.

A man's heirs at law are held to have no right to maintain a suit to set aside a fraudulent divorce from a third person of a woman whom he afterwards attempts to marry, for the purpose of defeating her claims upon his estate, where they were not parties to the divorce proceedings, and had no interest therein. (Conn.) 758.

V. FIDUCIARY RELATIONS.

A contract binding upon the ward or upon his estate, however beneficial to the ward it may be, is held to be beyond the power of a guardian, and to impose a personal liability upon himself. (Utah) 354.

A person charged with the duty of selling corporation stock in order to raise a fund with which to pay encumbrances upon the property of the corporation, and who is himself the owner of one of the encumbrances, is held not to be the trustee as to the property of the corporation covered by the encumbrances, and forbidden to protect his own interests by buying the prior liens upon it. (Kan.) 405.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES.

Libel.

Libelous words in a pleading, which are entirely foreign to the issues, and not pertinent to the subject of the controversy, are held not to be within the rule protecting averments in judicial proceedings as privileged. (La.) 930.

In the absence of anything to show ill-will or malice, it is held that a verdict must be directed for defendant in an action for the publication in a newspaper of an article ridiculing in exaggerated and uncomplimentary terms a public entertainment which is not only childish, but ridiculous in the extreme. (Iowa) 855.

Trespass in cutting lumber.

One who hires a gang of workmen and furnishes them to a third person together with a time keeper, who is to impart to them the latter's orders as to the time and place to work, is held not to be liable for trespasses committed by them in cutting timber upon a stranger's land under direction of such third person, although he is to pay the wages and has power to discharge the men, where he is ignorant of the trespass, and has no voice in directing the laborers when and where to work. (Or.) 625.

Wrongful death; alien's right of action for.

A woman suing to recover damages for the negligent killing of her husband, for the benefit of herself and her minor children by him, is held not to be compelled to testify on cross-examination to the fact that she has given birth to an illegitimate child since his death, for the purpose of affecting her credibility as a witness. (R. I.) 646.

Under a statute giving a right of action for wrongful death, to the next of kin of deceased if dependent on him for support, it is held that an action may be brought by a nonresident alien for the negligent killing of her son. (Mass.) 934.

Telegraph companies.

A telegraph company is held to be liable for losses caused by a false telegram willfully transmitted by an operator employed in its office, directing a bank to pay money on account of a correspondent bank. (C. C. A. 9th C.) 711.

Mental anguish resulting from failure to promptly deliver a telegram is held not to be sufficient to support an action against the telegraph company for such failure. (Ind.) 846.

Nuisance.

Damages for injuries growing out of a continuing nuisance, which have accrued within the statutory period before the commencement of the action, although more than the statutory period has elapsed since the completion of the work, are held to be recoverable. (Wash.) 532.

Compliance with the specific directions for the abatement of the nuisance in a decree enjoining the conducting of a business in such a way that the dust and fumes therefrom constitute a nuisance, is held not to absolve defendant from liability to punishment for contempt in failing to obey the general clause of the decree in case such directions prove insufficient. (Mich.) 454.

Injuries on highway.

The macadamized portion alone of a street 40 feet wide, of which about 25 are paved with cobble stones and the remainder macadamized, is held not to be the traveled part within the meaning of a statute requiring travelers by carriage to keep to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road; and therefore a traveler injured by collision while needlessly on the left of the center of the whole width of road is held not to absolve himself from fault by showing that he was to the right of the center of the macadamized part. (R. I.) 643.

Injury from gasoline.

A merchant who fills a jug with gasoline for a customer, without complying with the statute providing that no gasoline shall be sold unless the package containing it is marked "gasoline," is held to be liable for injuries to a member of the customer's family by its explosion when she attempts to use it believing it to be kerosene. (Iowa) 854.

Explosion of gas machine.

Damages for personal injuries caused by an explosion of an acetylene gas machine are held to be recoverable in an action for breach of warranty of its safety. (Ky.) 417.

Injury by driving logs.

One attempting to float logs down a stream is held to be liable to an abutting owner for injuries to his land by a jam 54 L. R. A.

caused by the careless manner of driving the logs. (Wash.) 199.

Injuries by dogs.

Injury inflicted by savage dogs upon one who entered the premises of the owner by his request is held to render the latter liable. (La.) 420.

Druggists.

Negligence in putting up a prescription is held to render a druggist liable for injuries caused thereby, although the negligence is that of a registered pharmacist employed by him, which class alone is allowed by statute to fill prescriptions. (Iowa) 364.

Combined negligence of master and servant.

In an action against a railroad company and its conductor for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the conductor a verdict in favor of the latter is held to preclude a judgment against the company. (Wash.) 649.

Injury by servant to third person.

An assault and battery inflicted by a station agent and another upon a third person is held not to render the railroad company liable for damages when it appears that the difficulty arose out of a personal quarrel, and that the agent was acting upon his individual responsibility. (Ga.) 810.

Injuries to employees.

A foreman authorized to purchase, inspect, and direct the use of lumber for the temporary structure of a bridge which his employer is engaged in constructing is held to represent the master in respect to the duty of inspecting to ascertain if the lumber used is reasonably suitable for the purpose intended, so as to render the master liable for injuries to other employees due to failure to perform that duty. (C. C. A. 7th C.) 33.

A master's liability for injury to a servant by a defective tool furnished for his use is held not to be defeated by the fact that the defective condition was known to a fellow servant who procured the tool for use by himself and the injured one. (Mich.) 456.

A railroad company which fails to provide suitable rules and regulations for the control and operation of hand cars used by bridge gangs in coming to and from a station to places where they are engaged in the repair and construction of bridges is held to be guilty of negligence. (Minn.) 481.

A shed of a third person under which a railroad company runs a spur track is held to be within the rule that the working place furnished by the master must be reasonably safe. (Mich.) 461.

Injury to lineman of electric company.

An electric company is held not to be able to relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by its failure to warn of the danger an employee unacquainted with the dangerous character of the work of a lineman, upon ordering him to ascend a pole and scrape a wire, by delegating the performance of such duty to a foreman who is in a general sense a fellow servant of the person injured. (Cal.) 85.

Injuries by fellow servants.

A foreman and a servant engaged in deepening a canal are held to be fellow servants in attempting to extinguish a fire spreading over adjacent lands towards property of the master on the canal bank, so that the master is not liable for injuries to the servant from the negligence of the foreman in failing to warn him of the impending fall of burning trees. (N. Y.) 52.

The failure of a foreman to keep cleaned and oiled an automatic stop designed to prevent the trolley from running off the end of the track of a traveler used to convey metal plates from one place to another in the shop, because of which the stop fails to work and falls upon an employee, is held not to render the master liable for the injury. (N. Y.) 62.

A foreman of water supply of a railroad, whose duty requires him to be carried from place to place along the road, is held, when riding on a detached engine to a place where machinery needs repairing, to be a fellow servant of the engineer, for whose negligence the master is not liable. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 696.

A section foreman in charge of a crew on a hand car, with power to determine where the car should be stopped, is held not to be, in the act of applying the brakes, a fellow servant of one of the crew, so as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injuries to the latter by his negligent application of the brakes. (Ky.) 78.

One operating a body maker in a can factory, having authority to direct the actions of the machine tender, is held to represent the master in directing the tender to remove a can body which has caught in the machine, and not to become the fellow servant of the tender by reason of the fact that it is his duty to start the machinery with his own hand, so as to release the master from liability for injuries caused thereby. (Ill.) 842.

Injury to passenger.

Injury to a passenger caused by the overturning of a car is held to render the railroad company liable, where it leaves her in the car without warning because she cannot understand the language in which other passengers are warned, after the engine has been overturned by a washout and water is running along the track in such a way as to undermine one side of it and render the overturning of the car probable. (C. C. A. 5th C.) 240.

A railway company which permits a drunken passenger to dance and stagger near the door of a baggage car is held to be liable for injuries caused by his falling from the car. (N. H.) 955.

Permitting a drunken passenger who has been removed from a street car for turbulence and an assault upon a fellow passenger, to return to and remain upon the car, although his turbulence continues, is held to render the street-car company liable for injuries inflicted by him upon a passenger. (Md.) 942.

Assault by conductor.

An assault by a street-car conductor on a passenger because the latter, after being carried past his station, in order to stop the car pulled the bell rope so hard that he broke it and jerked the conductor several feet along the car floor, is held to render the company liable. (Ala.) 752.

Ejection of drunken trespasser.

The ejection from a train of one who, without right and while in a drunken and helpless condition, has boarded at night a train standing in a cut, by trainmen who know that a passenger train will soon pass through the cut, is held to render the company liable for injuries by the latter train. (Ky.) 919.

Injuries to children.

The owner of an uninclosed lot adjacent to a highway in a thickly populated part of the city, who leaves unguarded thereon a heavy section of cement pipe of unstable equilibrium, which is an attractive plaything for children to roll about, and who knows that they resort there for that purpose, is held to be liable to a child who is injured by the pipe toppling over onto him while he is playing with it. (Colo.) 284.

One who makes an excavation upon his land is held not to be bound to so guard it as to prevent injury to children who come upon the premises without his invitation, express or implied, but who are induced to do so merely by the alluring attractiveness of the excavation and its surroundings. (Ga.) 313.

A municipal corporation which, in constructing a sewer in a public street, leaves a manhole uncovered for several weeks and near it a pile of sand with knowledge that children are accustomed to play in the sand, is held to be liable for injuries to a child who, while at play, falls into the manhole and is injured. (Ind.) 396.

Injury in escaping danger.

A woman who, seeing a car which had been derailed while a flying drill was being made, coming out of the limits of a freight yard and across a public street at great speed towards the place where she was standing, ran for safety and fell, is held to be entitled to recover for the injury thereby received. (N. J. Err. & App.) 582.

Contributory negligence.

The modification of the rule that one guilty of contributory negligence cannot recover for injuries negligently inflicted, which permits a recovery in case defendant might, after discovering plaintiff's peril, have avoided the injury, is held to be inapplicable, where plaintiff, in attempting to put a parcel on the front platform of a street car, negligently stood on the side toward the other track, and upon perceiving a car approaching became confused and got caught between the cars and was injured. (Md.) 424.

Failure to exercise ordinary care on the part of the person injured, before the negligence complained of is apparent or should have been reasonably apprehended, is held not to preclude a recovery, but to authorize the jury to diminish the damages in proportion to the fault attributable to the person injured. (Ga.) 802.

The question whether or not a boy ten years old is guilty of negligence contributing to his injury, is held to be for the jury, where, at a street crossing, he attempts to ride a bicycle across street-railway tracks, and in so doing passes behind one car and comes immediately in front of another approaching from the opposite direction, which, because of its defective condition, cannot be stopped in time to avoid collision with him. (Wash.) 184.

In an action for the death of a child, the father as administrator being plaintiff, it is held to be error to instruct the jury that contributory negligence of the father is no defense. (Neb.) 321.

Unforeseen result of wrongful act.

One who beats a horse in violation of the statute for prevention of cruelty to animals is held not to be able to escape liability for an injury caused by a blow falling on a bystander, on the ground that he used reasonable care to avoid the accident, which was caused by the shying of the horse and the slipping of his own foot, and that such result of his acts was not anticipated. (Iowa) 367.

Unforeseen result of lawful act.

The accidental shooting of a man upon a highway by an employee in a slaughter house who was shooting at dogs that had caused annoyance and trouble about the place is held not to render either employer or employee liable, as the shooting of the man was entirely accidental, and was due to the deflection of the course of the bullet in some manner, except for which it could never have reached the highway. (Kan.) 402.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; GIFTS; WILLS; LIENS.

Adverse possession.

Adverse possession of a portion of a railroad right of way for a period exceeding that designated by the statute of limitations for the recovery of real property is held to bar a right of action to recover possession thereof. (Wash.) 526.

A railroad right of way is held to be of such a public nature that title thereto cannot be acquired against the company by prescription or the running of the statute of limitations. (Cal.) 522.

An agent's occupancy of a house on his principal's property as a part merely of the contract for services is held not to establish the relation of tenant and landlord between him and the principal so as to preclude him from acquiring an adverse title to the property. (Ala.) 749.

Mortgage.

A power of sale inserted in a real-estate mortgage is held to be a power coupled with an interest, and is not revoked or suspended by the death of the mortgagor. (N. D.) 610.

A purchaser of a parcel of a tract of land, the whole of which is subsequently mortgaged, is held not to be entitled to take advantage, after foreclosure of the mortgage, of a clause therein by which any parcel may be released upon payment of a certain sum, where he has unsuccessfully sought to cast the burden of the whole mortgage on subsequent purchasers of the remaining parcels who purchased before the prior conveyance was recorded. (Mich.) 731.

Deeds.

Delivery of a deed in escrow sufficient to pass title is held to be made where the grantor turns the deed over to his housekeeper with instructions to deliver it to the grantee on his death, with no subsequent attempt to control or take possession of it, although for safe keeping she places it in the grantor's trunk, which is locked and 64 L. R. A.

the key to which he retains until his death. (Ill.) 865.

Gift.

A gift of personality placed in the possession of a third person for delivery to the donee is held not to be defeated by the fact that the delivery is not effected until the donor has become finally unconscious in his last illness. (C. C. A. 9th C.) 708.

Waters.

The riparian owners along a stream of water, the flow of which has been diverted from its natural channel or obstructed by a permanent dam which has continued for the time necessary to establish a prescriptive right to perpetually maintain the same, who have improved their property in reliance upon the continuance thereof, are held to acquire a reciprocal right to have the artificial conditions remain undisturbed. (Minn.) 473.

The right to appropriate the water of a spring which has no natural stream flowing therefrom is held to exist under a statute providing that all ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the spring waters of the state shall be governed by the same laws as ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the waters of running streams. (Or.) 628.

The right of a riparian proprietor to use the water for irrigating purposes is held not to be limited to the tract of land bordering on the stream as first segregated and sold by the government, but to extend to lands lying back of such tract and purchased by him from other persons. (Or.) 630.

Wills.

A paper reading: "This is good to Miss Rubie Ferris for eight hundred dollars for care and attendance rendered by her to me in my last sickness. This eight hundred dollars is to be collected out of my estate after my death, provided, however, I die a bachelor,"—is held to be a will when it is duly executed as such. (Mich.) 464.

A bequest by name to an unincorporated educational society, which has an existing organization governed by a constitution and by-laws, and having officers to conduct its business affairs and carry out its objects, is held to be valid. (Cal.) 281.

An absolute gift, and not a trust, is held to be created by a will bequeathing a fund to a church, and "suggesting" that it be used to complete the spire, or invested and the income used to carry on a church mission, or for the benefit of the church poor. (Md.) 427.

Liens.

A stipulation in a lease of a farm for a term of years, that all property of every kind and description belonging to the tenant that shall be on the premises, or brought thereon during the term of the lease, shall be held as security for the payment of the rent, and that there shall be a lien on the same for the payment of such rent, is held to be ineffectual to create a lien for rents due and in arrears, on the crops grown on the leased premises, and other property not in esse at the time of the lease, but afterwards brought thereon by the lessee. (Neb.) 328.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES.

Comity.

A written promise of a married woman made in a foreign state, where it is valid, is held to be enforceable in New Jersey, although it would be void if made in the latter state. (N. J. Err. & App.) 585.

A judgment against a nonresident, entered on a note containing a power of attorney to confess judgment which is valid in the state where entered, is held to be entitled to full faith and credit in other states. (Mo.) 502.

That a judgment for alimony in a divorce proceeding is subject to alteration from time to time by the court which rendered it is held not to prevent its being a final decree which may be enforced in the courts of another state. (Wash.) 204.

Jurisdiction of probate court.

A cause of action against a railroad company for negligently killing a person, which is created by statute for the benefit of persons named, and is enforceable only by his administrator, is held to give jurisdiction to the probate court of the county where the killing occurred to grant letters of administration on the estate, although the deceased was not a resident of the state and owned no other estate within its limits at the time of his death, and the statutes provide in case of a nonresident for administration only in the county where the greater part of his estate may be. (S. C.) 660.

Injunction.

An injunction to restrain a representative of a labor union from enticing apprentices to break their contract and become members of the union is held to be properly granted at the instance of a manufacturer whose apprentices are under express contract not to join a labor union. (Pa.) 640.

To warrant an injunction restraining, as a threatened nuisance, the erection of a building proposed to be used for legitimate purposes, it is held that the fact that it will be a nuisance if so used must be made clearly to appear beyond all ground of fair questioning. (W. Va.) 545.

Abatement of nuisance.

Save as to those things which are by the common or statute law declared to be nuisances, or which are in their very nature palpably and indisputably such, it is held that a municipal corporation has no legal right summarily to compel the abatement of a particular thing or act as a nuisance, without reasonable notice to the person alleged to be maintaining the same of the time and place for hearing, and determining whether such thing or act does in law constitute a nuisance. (Ga.) 294.

The fact that all places where intoxicating liquors are sold are declared by statute to be nuisances is held not to justify their abatement by any person or persons without process of law. (Kan.) 910.

A public nuisance consisting of a fence across a navigable stream is held not to be abatable at the suit of a private individual, unless he has some special interest in the abatement different from and greater than the interest of the community. (Wash.) 178.

Attachment.

An attachment levied on real estate fraudulently alienated by the attachment debtor, even though the legal title of record is in another, is held to create a lien in favor of the attachment creditor upon the interest of the debtor in the land attached, which he may enforce by appropriate proceedings after recovering a judgment. (Neb.) 333.

An attachment creditor, claiming that an assignment for creditors is fraudulent as to him, and maintaining a hostile attitude toward the receiver of the estate, and who allows the receiver to insure the attached property for the benefit of the estate, is held to have no right, after money is collected on the insurance policy, to claim a trust in his favor on account of his attachment on the burned building which might have satisfied its execution had it not been burned. (Utah) 343.

Set-off.

A creditor of an insolvent debtor, who bids in the debtor's property at an execution sale for an amount in excess of the judgment, is held to have no right to set off his claim against the amount of his bid, to which the debtor is entitled. (Cal.) 272.

Judicial sale.

A sale of a section of a railroad under a decree of court separate from the franchise is held not to be warranted for the purpose of enforcing a contractor's lien. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 687.

Attorneys' fees.

That the fund reached by a creditor's bill against an insolvent building and loan association is all absorbed by prior claims not secured by mortgage or other fixed lien, so that the one who has instigated it will receive nothing, is held not to prevent the allowance of a reasonable attorney's fee to his solicitors out of the fund. (Tenn.) 817.

Habeas corpus.

A writ of habeas corpus directed to a wife on the application of her husband touching the custody of a minor child is held not to be a suit within the meaning of a statute prohibiting suits between husband and wife except in special permitted cases. (La.) 927.

Limitation of actions.

In case a defendant, once a resident of the state, departs and resides out of it before a personal judgment against him, the time of his residence abroad is held not to excuse the judgment from the statute of limitations, although he was a resident when the cause of action on which the judgment rests, arose or accrued. (W. Va.) 215.

The substitution of plaintiff as administrator with the will annexed after the filing and probate of the will, for himself as simple administrator in an action on an insurance policy, is held not to constitute a new action so as to give the insurer the benefit of the expiration of the time limited for the bringing of the suit which occurs before the substitution is made. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 680.

An action by a father to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter is held to be barred by the statute of limitations, unless brought within two years from the time the right of action accrued. (Ga.) 811.

Evidence.

Evidence tending to show that a party to an action tried to bribe a witness to give false testimony in his favor is held to be competent as an admission of weakness in his case. (N. Y.) 592.

Evidence of good character, while not a defense, is held to be a circumstance tending to strengthen the legal presumption of innocence, and to be weighed and estimated by the jury according to the weight of the testimony by which it is supported in connection with that to which it is opposed. (Del.) 286.

Military tribunal.

A military examining board provided by the Constitution and statutes to determine the moral character, capacity, or general fitness of officers of the militia, and having within its jurisdiction the powers of a court martial, and upon whose findings the governor may dismiss an officer from the service, is held to be a judicial body whose determination may be reviewed by a common-law writ of certiorari. (N. Y.) 597.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

Forgery.

The alteration of a memorandum as to the grade of grain, indorsed on the back of an elevator receipt given by a railroad company for grain to be stored and shipped, is held not to constitute forgery, since the memorandum is not part of the receipt, and the alteration does not change the legal effect of the receipt. (Ind.) 794.

An instrument in the following form: "Mr. Sage: Please let this boy have a single rig—a good one—and oblige. I will bring it back myself. (Signed) George Clinger,"—is held to be the subject of forgery. (Neb.) 327.

Perjury.

False testimony given in the course of proceedings which are merely erroneous or voidable, even if there are such irregularities or defects as would require a reversal of the cause on appeal, is held to constitute perjury, if material. (Okla.) 513.

Homicide.

In the absence of actual malice manslaughter, and not murder, is held to be committed by killing a man while reasonably believing from the circumstances that he is in the act of adultery with assailant's wife, although the assailant is in fact mistaken. (Conn.) 780.

Prison breach.

Breaking a prison is held not to be effected by a prisoner's concealing himself in a crevice in a stone quarry to which he has been taken to work until the guards withdraw, and then walking forth without impediment, although to aid the concealment a cover is placed over the crevice, which is removed when the escape is effected. (Iowa) 823.

Intoxication to excuse crime.

Upon trial of an indictment for conspiring to commit murder the fact of defendant's intoxication at the time of the commission of the offense is held to be properly considered by the jury as bearing upon the existence of the felonious intent necessary to render him guilty. (Ind.) 391.

Drunkenness of juror.

The conviction of a person of a crime which the Constitution requires should be tried by a jury of twelve, though nine jurors concurring might render a verdict, is held not to be a legal conviction, though twelve jurors were physically present during the trial and all concurred in a verdict of guilty, if one of the jurors was in a drunken condition during the trial. (La.) 933.

Prejudicial remarks of prosecuting attorney.

Remarks of the solicitor general in a criminal proceeding, calculated to prejudice the jury, and not authorized by the evidence or any fair deduction therefrom, are held to require the reversal of the judgment and the granting of a new trial. (Ga.) 959.

ACCORD AND SATISFACTION.

Payment of part of a judgment by a third person for the benefit of the debtor is a sufficient consideration for a release of the entire judgment. Marshall v. Bullard (Iowa) 862

NOTES AND BRIEFS.

Accord and satisfaction; part payment of liquidated debt; payment before due, or where collateral benefit exists; assumption of new obligation and change of position of the parties; payment or note by third person. 863

ACTION OR SUIT.

By Heirs to Set Aside Divorce, see JUDGMENT, 4.

Against Purchaser at Judicial Sale, see JUDICIAL SALE, 5, 6.

See also INSURANCE, 16.

1. The judgment debtor may maintain a suit against the purchaser at execution sale to recover the excess of the bid over the amount of the judgment, upon the neglect or refusal of the officer to bring the suit until it is about to be barred by the statute of limitations,—especially where the officer has surrendered the evidence of indebtedness and become insolvent, and the liability of the sureties is exhausted. Meherin v. Ambrose (Cal.) 272

2. Under a statute requiring the officer selling property under execution to return to the execution debtor any excess in the proceeds of the sale over the judgment, in case the officer takes a check for such excess, which he wrongfully surrenders to the purchaser, the judgment debtor may, as equitable assignee, maintain an action to enforce payment of its amount, against the purchaser, although he has recovered judgment against the officer for the amount, which has proved unavailing because of his insolvency. Id.

3. The name by which an action brought to establish title to a portion of a railroad right of way is designated is immaterial in determining the relief to be afforded, or whether the defense of prescription is available, where there is, under the statute, but one form of civil action, the character of 54 L. R. A.

which is determined by the substance of the complaint. Southern P. Co. v. Hyatt (Cal.) 522

4. A railroad company against which a right of action exists for negligently killing a person is not entitled to be made a party to proceedings for the appointment of an administrator for his estate. Re Mayo (S. C.) 660

5. An insurer is not precluded from intervening to claim the amount decreed against the owners of vessels which damaged by collision the vessel on which his contract was written by waiting until after the liability has been fixed by the appellate court, if no issue was made in the case as to the distribution of the funds recovered, and the appellate court did not pass upon that question. Mason v. Marine Ins. Co. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 700

6. A purchaser of a railroad under a decree in a creditors' suit may intervene in a suit to enforce a construction lien upon the property by sale of the section to which it applies, to enforce its right to be relieved from the threatened sale, by which the unity of the railroad will be broken. Connor v. Tennessee C. R. Co. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 687

7. In order to authorize a change of venue in a criminal prosecution, prejudice on the part of a judge must clearly appear, and a prima facie showing of prejudice is insufficient. State v. Stark (Kan.) 910

1. An agent's occupancy of a house on his principal's property as a part merely of the contract for service does not establish the relation of tenant and landlord between him and the principal, so as to preclude him 975

from acquiring an adverse title to the property. Davis v. Williams (Ala.) 749

2. A railroad right of way is of such a public nature that title thereto cannot be acquired against the company by prescription or the running of the statute of limitations. Southern P. Co. v. Hyatt (Cal.) 522

3. A railroad company cannot set up the rights of the government to defeat a title acquired through adverse possession by a third person to a portion of its right of way. Northern P. R. Co. v. Ely (Wash.) 526

AGREED CASE.

A statement in an agreed statement of facts in a proceeding for violation of an ordinance regulating the keeping of dogs; that the sum exacted for the privilege of keeping them is intended as a tax for revenue, is not binding on the courts where the ordinance shows that it is a license fee. *Gibson v. 1. The owner of savage dogs, who requests another to come into her yard, and, after compliance with the request, does not protect her from attack by the dogs, is responsible for the injury which the dogs inflict upon such person. Delisle v. Bourriague (La.) 420

2. Although an owner of an animal is not responsible when damage is caused by an unforeseen accident, or an accident he could not guard against,—as, when it arises from vis major,—he is responsible when he is chargeable with the least fault. Id.

APPEAL AND ERROR.

To Preclude Review by Certiorari, see CERTIORARI, 3.

1. The decisions of the court of oyer and terminer and the court of general sessions were not reviewable by the supreme court 54 L. R. A.

prior to the adoption of the Delaware Constitution of 1897, and they will not be departed from by the supreme court unless it be satisfied that they are clearly erroneous. Daniels v. State (Del.) 286

Assignments of error.

2. One of two defendants cannot assign errors upon a general exception by both to the overruling by the court of demurrers to the complaint, filed, one by both defendants demurring generally to each paragraph of the complaint, and others by the complaining defendant attacking specified paragraphs of it. South Bend v. Turner (Ind.) 396

Questions not in record.

3. Appeal by defendant against whom judgment is rendered in an action against two for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of one acting as agent for the other, in which judgment is rendered against one and in favor of the other, will take up only that part of the judgment which affects appellant, and the appellate court will have no power over the other judgment on such appeal. Doremus v. Root (Wash.) 649

4. An appeal by the owner of a vessel from a decree awarding the sum recovered for probable loss of earnings because of a collision, to the insurer, will not give the appellate court jurisdiction to review the portion of the decree which awarded appellant the amounts recovered for loss of freight under existing contracts and for loss of coal on board. Mason v. Marine Ins. Co. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 700

Exceptions.

5. A general exception to the court's charge to the jury is unavailing without a specification calling the attention of the court to the particular error that it may be corrected. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 955

6. Objectionable remarks of counsel in arguing to the jury must be preserved by bill of exceptions, to be the subject of review on appeal. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Josey (Ky.) 78

Hearing and determination.

7. Findings of facts by the district judge, affirmed by the court of appeal, will, except in case of manifest error, be treated and considered as true. Delisle v. Bourriague (La.) 420

8. The appellate court is not precluded from considering the correctness of the overruling of a demurrer to an amended complaint by the fact that the original and amended complaints as they appear in the transcript are alike, on the theory that the original complaint was erroneously copied where the amended one should appear, where the clerk has certified that the amended complaint was correctly copied, and his duty required the copying of only that paper. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Houlihan (Ind.) 787

9. The court on appeal will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court as to the extent of the cross-examination of wit-cesses, where a just verdict has been rendered and the testimony objected to could not have improperly affected the result. Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (C. C. A. 7th C.) 33

10. Error in continuing a temporary injunction until final hearing cannot be corrected on appeal from the final judgment, where the trial court itself dissolved the injunction at the final hearing. Watkins v. Dorris (Wash.) 109

11. Action of the appellate court not assigned as error is not subject to review in the supreme court. Peterson v. Gibson (Ill.) 836

12. The refusal to instruct the jury that the burden of proving that the insured did not come to his death through causes from liability for which the policy excepts the insurer is upon the one suing on the policy cannot be questioned for the first time on appeal. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Freeman (C. C. A. 6th C.) 680

13. Although the statute allows complaint for the first time in the appellate court, in case of absence from the complaint of averments essential to the cause of action, or the presence of some averment which absolutely destroys the right to recover, yet mere uncertainty or inadequacy of averment, which might have been amended or cured, will be deemed to have been waived by a defendant who proceeds with the trial to final judgment without objection. South Bend v. Turner (Ind.) 396

14. Failure to object to an instruction that three fourths of the jury may return a verdict does not waive the right to have the validity of the verdict considered on appeal, where the receiving and entering of the verdict are objected to, and an exception taken to the decision of the court in overruling the objection. First Nat. Bank v. Foster (Wyo.) 549

15. An exception to a refusal to take a case from the jury at the close of plaintiff's evidence is waived by the introduction of evidence by defendant. United Railways & E. Co. v. State use of Deane (Md.) 942

16. A verdict for $15,000 in favor of an employee of an electric company, who was badly injured by falling from a pole on account of contact with a live wire, for which the company was responsible, will not be set aside by the appellate court as excessive. Tedford v. Los Angeles Electric Co. (Cal.) 85

17. The circuit court of appeals may review the question whether or not a finding of facts in an action at law in the circuit court has any evidence to support it. King v. Smith (C. C. A. 9th C.) 708

18. The admission of incompetent evidence does not constitute reversible error when without the evidence the decision must have been the same. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. French (Mo.) 492

19. A judgment will not be reversed for failure of the trial court to expressly state 54 L. R. A.

that certain requested instructions are given, where it states that counsel have handed it some requests as stating propositions of law by which the jury should be guided in determining their verdict, and proceeds to read them to the jury. Noble v. Bessemer S. S. Co. (Mich.) 456

20. When proper instructions are given it is no ground of exception that they are not given in the form requested. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 955

21. It is not error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury under a request which assumes the existence of a fact to be established by evidence. Daniels v. State (Del.) 286

22. In an action for the death of a child the father, as administrator, being plaintiff, it is error to instruct the jury that contributory negligence of the father is no defense. Tucker v. Draper (Neb.) 321

23. It is reversible error to refuse defendant in an action by a child for personal injuries an order for a physical examination of plaintiff by physicians to be appointed by the court, where defendant has no other method of determining the extent of the injury, and the examination may be made without pain or danger to the plaintiff. South Bend v. Turner (Ind.) 396

Judgment.

24. Judgment absolute must be entered upon appeal, in favor of the principal, in an action against principal and agent for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the agent, where judgment was entered in the trial court in favor of the agent and against the principal, and the principal alone appeals, since the judgment in favor of the agent precludes a recovery against the principal, and the appellate court has no power to revise such judgment. Doremus v. Root (Wash.) 649

1. While a creditor is under no obligation to accept the provisions of an assignment made for his benefit, yet he cannot hold an assignment good in part and bad in part; nor can he receive the benefits of the assignment while he is in actual hostility to it, claiming in the courts that it is fraudulent and void, and refusing to accept its benefits. McLaughlin v. Park City Bank (Utah) 343

2. A creditor is not entitled to two inconsistent, adverse, or conflicting rights, and if he accepts the benefit of an assignment knowing the facts, he cannot, ordinarily, impeach or repudiate it thereafter on the ground that it is illegal and fraudulent; nor can he, having repudiated it, take under its provisions as other creditors who have accepted it. Id.

3. While an assignee, or a receiver as his successor, holds the assigned property in trust for such creditors as accept the provisions of the assignment, the trust relation cannot exist between the receiver and a creditor who repudiates the assignment as well as the trust relation. Id.

ATTACHMENT.

See also INSURANCE, 2.

1. An attachment levied on real estate fraudulently alienated by the attachment debtor and grantor for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors, even though the legal title of record is in another, gives the attachment creditor a lien upon the interest of the debtor in the land attached, which he may enforce by appropriate proceedings after recovery of judgment. Westervelt v. Hagge (Neb.) 333

2. The lien of an attachment levied on land fraudulently alienated becomes effective and enforceable after the real estate is reconveyed and restored to the fraudulent grantor, the same as though the conveyance in the first instance had not been made. Id.

3. No valid lien is acquired by an attachment on real estate by a creditor of a fraudulent grantee to whom the legal title has been conveyed in fraud of the rights of the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, and who has no actual interest therein, and who restores and reconveys the real estate to the fraudulent grantor, who voluntarily encumbers the same for the benefit of his creditor. 54 L. R. A.

ors, as against such creditors of the grantor under their liens thus acquired. Id.

4. An attachment lien on land, the legal title to which is in the attachment debtor, is subject to every equity which exists against the debtor at the time of the levy of the attachment, and courts of equity will limit the lien to the actual interest of the attachment debtor in such real estate. Id.

5. An attachment creditor cannot be deemed guilty of laches such as will forfeit his lien where he obtains judgment in his action within two years after the attachment is levied and within five months thereafter sets up his attachment in a suit to which he is made a defendant, which is brought to foreclose a mortgage on the property upon which he claims a lien. Id.

6. An attachment creditor who sits back during the pendency of legal proceedings, and allows the receiver of the estate to insure the attached property for the benefit of the estate, and who all the time is maintaining a hostile attitude towards the receiver and the assignment under which he holds, cannot, after money is collected by the receiver on an insurance policy, claim a trust in his favor on account of his attachment on the burned building, which might have satisfied his execution had it not burned. McLaughlin v. Park City Bank (Utah) 344

7. One who has acquired a lien on real estate, pending litigation, after the levy of an attachment thereon, is charged with notice and takes subject to the rights of the plaintiff in the action wherein the attachment was levied and final judgment rendered. Westervelt v. Hagge (Neb.) 333

8. Leaving a copy of an order of attachment with the actual occupant of lands attached, having possession of the premises and apparent authority over and control of the same, is a compliance with the provisions of a statute requiring that, "where the property attached is real property, the officer shall leave with the occupant thereof, or, if there be no occupant, in a conspicuous place thereon, a copy of the order," although such occupant be not the owner or lessee of such premises. Id.

9. An execution creditor is not entitled to possession and rents of the property levied upon, before sale and before the time for redemption has expired. McLaughlin v. Park City Bank (Utah) 343

1. The voluntary conveyance by an insolvent, for the use of his wife, without actual fraud, of all his real estate, the value of which is not greater than is subject by law to a homestead exemption during the life of himself and wife and the minority of his children, will not deprive him of the right to have the homestead set off to him in a bankruptcy proceeding, in case he obtains a reconveyance after the adjudication of his bankruptcy, and includes the land in his schedule of property. Re Tollett (C. C. A. 6th C.) 222

2. Liability upon a penal bond conditioned for the payment of rents and annuities to another during life is within the provisions of § 63a of the bankruptcy act of 1898, allowing the proving against the bankrupt's estate of a fixed liability, evidenced by instrument in writing, absolutely owing at the time of filing the petition, whether then payable or not, but the claim proved must be limited to the penalty of the bond, where the computed value of the expectancy exceeds that amount. *Cobb v. 1. A requirement of the constitution of a mutual benefit society that its privileges shall be limited to members of a specified religious denomination, and that members neglecting to comply with the rules governing that denomination shall be suspended or expelled, does not violate a provision of the state Constitution securing the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience, and providing that no human authority can control or interfere with the rights of conscience. Franta v. Bohemian Roman Catholic C. Union (Mo.) 723

2. A by-law prohibiting members from being connected with societies not approved by a particular church is authorized by a provision in the statute authorizing the incorporation of mutual benefit societies, that they shall have power to establish rules for 64 L. R. A.

the regulation of the affairs of the corporation not contrary to the laws of the state or United States, and to decide the necessary qualifications of membership. Mazurkiewicz v. St. Adelburtus Aid Society (Mich.) 727

3. One who joins a mutual benefit society whose by-laws provide that no one can be a member of it who is a member of a society not approved by a particular church cannot complain if he is expelled from the society for membership in a society prohibited by such church. Id.

4. The financial secretary of a subordinate lodge of a benefit society, who is designated by the supreme lodge to receive and forward assessments from certificate holders, is for that purpose the agent of the supreme lodge, so that the standing of certificate holders will not be affected by his failure to forward assessments paid him. Bragaw v. Supreme Lodge K. & L. of H. (N. C.) 602

5. A provision in the constitution of a benefit society, that members should become such subject to the power of the corporation to change its by-laws, cannot be construed into liberty to change at will the contract of insurance it has made with each member. Id.

6. A mere general consent by a member of a mutual benefit society, that the constitution and by-laws may be amended, applies only to such reasonable regulations as may be within the scope of its original design, and does not authorize changes which will destroy the value of his contract. Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. (N. C.) 605

7. The contract evidenced by a certificate of membership in a mutual benefit society cannot, after the holder has paid large sums thereon, be altered by resolutions of the society without the holder's consent so as to place him in a class and assess that class in a manner different from the rule applied to newer members, the result of which is to destroy the value of the contract. Id.

8. A provision in a certificate of membership in a benefit society, that the holder shall comply with the constitution and by-laws of the association, a copy of which is attached to the certificate, refers to such laws as they then exist, and will not bind him to submit to a change subsequently made, depriving him of the right to dispose of the benefit by will, although the constitution provides for amendment. *Peterson v. 2. The general rule that if a person, with knowledge of facts which will defeat a promissory note in the hands of the payee, purchases it from a bona fide holder thereof, he may recover thereon upon the strength of such bona fides, does not apply to a purchaser who is the payee of the note. If he sells such paper to an innocent third person and repurchases it for value, he does not thereby become possessed of any better right as against the maker than he possessed in the first instance. Andrews v. Williams (Ky.) 220

2. The sureties on a bond given by an agent to his principal, to secure the faithful performance of a contract by the terms of which the agent was required to make weekly reports to his principal of the business transacted by him, are released from liability on the bond where the principal, without the knowledge or consent of the sureties, permitted the agent to continue in its employ, and to transact its business under the agency, without requiring him to make such weekly reports, since this constituted a material departure from the terms of the contract and one affecting the substantial rights of the sureties. *Fidelity Mut. 2. A building and loan association may fix a minimum premium to be deducted in advance or paid in periodical instalments, but in either case such premium must be a certain, definite sum, fixed and determined at the time of the making of the loan. Floyd v. National Loan & Invest Co. (W. Va.) 536

3. Only the principal of the loan, with legal interest thereon, together with such sums as have been necessarily expended in preserving the property, less the amounts paid into the association by the borrower as dues, interest, premium, and fines, to be treated in the settlements as partial payments, can be collected by a building and loan association on a contract for a premium which the law deems usurious. Id.

The duty of a railroad company to one as a passenger has not arisen when, with a passage ticket in his pocket, he is crossing its tracks on a public highway for the purpose of boarding a train standing on the track farthest from him, and when he has not yet reached the platform provided for passengers. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Jennings (Ill.) 827

2. A railroad company is chargeable with the knowledge of its conductor and baggage-man as to the helpless condition of a passenger riding in the baggage car. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 955

3. The duty of a railroad company may be found by the jury to include the doing of 54 L. R. A.

something to prevent injury to a drunken passenger who is in a dangerous position, the danger of which it knows he is ignorant of and powerless to avoid. Id.

4. The duty of a carrier to protect an intoxicated passenger from falling from an exposed position on the cars is not changed by the fact that the intoxication is in violation of a statute. Id.

5. That incapacity of a passenger is caused by his voluntary intoxication will not absolve the carrier, upon discovering it, from using due care to prevent his being injured because he has placed himself in a dangerous position without ability to care for himself. Id.

6. A railroad company is liable for injuries to a drunken passenger caused by his fall from the door of a baggage car, near which he was permitted to dance and stagger, if, by exercising the care the situation required, it could have prevented the injury, and the passenger could not avoid it, although his inability resulted from his voluntary intoxication. Id.

7. A railroad company is liable for injuries to a passenger by the overturning of the car, where it leaves her in the car without warning because she cannot understand the language in which other passengers are warned, after the engine has been overturned by a washout, and the water is running along the track on which the car stands, in such a way as to undermine one side of it and render an overturning of the car probable. Southern Pac. Co. v. Tarin (C. C. A. 5th C.) 240

8. A street-car company is liable for an assault by its conductor on a passenger because the latter, after being carried past his station, in order to stop the car, pulled the bell rope so hard that he broke it, and jerked the conductor several feet along the car floor, notwithstanding the passenger, upon the conductor's following him to the platform, attempted an assault on him. Birmingham R. & E. Co. v. Baird (Ala.) 752

9. Failure of employees of a street-railway company to overpower or remove from the car a drunken passenger whose conduct is such as to indicate danger to other passengers if he is permitted to ride unrestrained is negligence which will render the company liable for injuries which he inflicts upon a passenger, although there is nothing to indicate that the one injured is in especial peril. United Railways & E. Co. v. State use of Deane (Md.) 942

10. Permitting a drunken passenger who has been removed from a street car for turbulence and an assault upon a fellow passenger, to return to and remain upon the car without further effort to remove him, although his turbulence continues, is negligence which will render the street-car company liable for injuries inflicted by him upon a passenger. Id.

11. The rule of contributory negligence does not apply to an injury to a drunken passenger by falling from a train while staggering and dancing between the open doors of the baggage car, where, with knowledge on the part of the carrier of his inability to realize his danger and to care for himself, it makes no effort to protect him from injury. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 955

12. A carrier which pays the duties on imported goods at the place of entry, when it has agreed to receive and transport them in bond to another place, where there may be a market for the goods in bond for purposes of export or for sale to the United States government, is liable to the owner for the damages which he sustains on account of such unauthorized payment of the duties by the carrier. *Smith Bros. & Co. v. CERTIORARI.

1. A military examining board provided by the Constitution and statutes to determine the moral character, capacity, or general fitness for office of officers of the militia, and having within its jurisdiction the powers of a court-martial, and upon whose findings the governor may dismiss an officer from the service, is a judicial body whose determination may be reviewed by a common-law writ of certiorari. People ex rel. Smith v. Hoffman (N. Y.) 597

2. No implied exception from the provisions of a statute authorizing the use of the common-law writ of certiorari when not expressly forbidden by statute can be made in case of the decisions of state military tribunals in proceedings for the discipline of militia officers in time of peace, on the ground that if civil courts were permitted to interfere with the judgment of military courts the discipline of the militia might be injured. Id.

3. The appeal which, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2122, will preclude review by writ of certiorari, means one that can be brought, argued, and heard as matter of right, and not a secret review of a judgment, as of 54 L. R. A.

that of a military examining board, the existence of which cannot be known to the defeated party until after the review has been made and the judgment executed. Id.

4. The governor is not a proper party to a writ of certiorari to review a determination of a military examining board as to the fitness of a militia officer for his office. Id.

CONFLICT OF LAWS.

Doctrine of Fellow Service, see COURTS, 4.

1. The contract of a foreign building association, made with a citizen of West Virginia, secured by a deed of trust upon real estate situated in this state, and by its terms to be performed in the domiciliary state, must conform to the requirement of the local law with respect to premiums, and, if it does not, such contract is not within the exemption from the operation of the usury laws given by the statute to domestic building and loan associations. Floyd v. National Loan & Invest. Co. (W. Va.) 536

2. The statute of New Jersey that regulates the right of married women to make contracts of suretyship is not a declaration of a public policy that closes the courts of that state to rights of action arising in other jurisdictions where the law is different. Thompson v. Taylor (N. J. Err. & App.) 585

3. The written promise of a married woman domiciled in New Jersey, to pay a sum of money to the order of her husband, signed by her at her domicile, and carried by him, with her acquiescence, to New York, and there indorsed, and delivered in exchange for other notes of like import, is a contract made in the state of New York; and the capacity of the wife to bind herself by a contract of suretyship is to be de-terminated by the law of that state, so that if valid in the state of New York it may be enforced against her in New Jersey, although the contract, if made there, would be void. Id.

1. Where the language of a constitutional provision is plain and free from ambiguity, the ordinary signification of the words employed, as used in common parlance, must be considered, and the intent of the provision gathered from the words themselves, giving to them their usual meaning and signification. Powell v. Spackman (Idaho) 378

Delegation of power.

2. An unconstitutional delegation of legislative power is not effected by conferring upon the state auditor the right to issue licenses for bookmaking on horse races to persons of good character, to be exercised on grounds of good repute. State v. Thompson (Mo.) 950

Equal protection and privileges.

See also infra, 12.

3. The equal protection of the laws is not denied to a foreign railroad corporation operating a portion of its road within the state, by compelling it to become domesticated as a condition to its continuing such operation. Com. v. Mobile & O. R. Co. (Ky.) 916

4. A statute is not void for granting special rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, which, by not being applicable to companies doing business on the assessment plan, thereby exempts them from a provision that false representations in applications for life or casualty insurance shall not avoid the policy unless made with actual intent to deceive or unless they increase the

risk. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Freeman (C. C. A. 6th C.) 680

5. A statute prohibiting the letting of public printing to papers which have been established less than a year violates the constitutional provisions that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and that no citizen shall be granted privileges which upon the same terms shall not be granted to all citizens. Van Harlingen v. Doyle (Cal.) 771

6. A statute prohibiting bookmaking or pool selling at all places except upon grounds where the races are to be run, and by all except licensed persons, is not an unconstitutional special law on the ground that it grants special and exclusive rights and immunities. State v. Thompson (Mo.) 950

7. An accident insurance company cannot insist on the invalidity of a statute for unconstitutional discrimination against fire insurance companies. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Freeman (C. C. A. 6th C.) 680

Due process of law.

8. Assessments for paving, made according to the provisions of a city charter, by apportioning the total cost of the work to the abutting lands according to frontage, do not constitute a taking of property for public use, or a violation of U. S. Const. 14th Amend., as a taking of property without due process of law. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. French (Mo.) 492

Police power.

9. The prohibition of the sale of cream that contains less than 20 per cent of fat, by Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 7002, is a valid exercise of the police power, and constitutional. State v. Crescent Creamery Co. (Minn.) 466

10. The police power will not justify the restriction of the number of persons which lodging-house keepers alone may permit to occupy one room during the same night, since they are thereby deprived of their property, and the discrimination in limiting the provisions to lodging-house keepers prevents the regulation being due process of law. Bailey v. People (Ill.) 838

11. A statute making it unlawful to herd or graze sheep within 2 miles of an inhabited dwelling, and making the owner of sheep so herded or grazed liable for damages to the injured party, is a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not unconstitutional. Sifers v. Johnson (Idaho) 785

12. A statute making railroad companies liable to all employees for injuries caused by negligence of any of their servants in charge of any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, roundhouse, locomotive engine, or train, is not unconstitutional as unequal, but is sustainable as an exercise of the police power for the protection of persons exposed to dangerous agencies in the hands of others. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Houlihan (Ind.) 787

1. The situation of the parties when a contract is made, its subject-matter, and the purpose of its execution, are always material to determine the intention of the parties and the meaning of the terms they used, 64 L. R. A.

and when these are ascertained they must prevail over the dry words of the agreement. Kauffman v. Raeder (C. C. A. 8th C.) 347

2. Commercial contracts must be interpreted in the light of commercial usages, and their performance must be such as business men would naturally contemplate. Id.

3. An agreement that, for a pecuniary consideration, a person will withdraw opposition to the granting of a pardon, and will, by solicitation and the exercise of personal influence, endeavor to induce the pardoning authority to grant a pardon to one who has been convicted of a crime, contravenes public policy and is void. Deering & Co. v. Cunningham (Kan.) 410

Performance; breach.

See also supra, 2.

4. All that is ordinarily required of a party to a contract who has agreed to deliver personal property upon the payment of a debt or price is that he shall put the property in some convenient place, subject to the disposal of the payer upon his compliance with the terms of the contract, and that he shall notify the promisor of the fact. Kauffman v. Raeder (C. C. A. 8th C.) 247

5. A sufficient offer to perform a contract is made where, nine parties having agreed to pay a certain sum and interest to plaintiff on or before a certain day, he agreeing to assign and deliver to them certain stock in a corporation upon payment of the money, plaintiff deposits the stock in a bank in the city where the contract was made, and more than forty days before the day named causes the parties to be notified that the stock is in the bank, subject to their disposition, upon payment of the debt, and some of the parties reside in the city while others reside at a place more than 300 miles distant. Id.

6. A contract not to engage in the barber business in any manner in a certain town so long as another person shall continue in business, made by the owner of a barber shop upon a sale of his furniture, tools, and fixtures to such person, is violated by working at the barber trade as an employee. Pohlman v. Dawson (Kan.) 913

7. A breach of an independent covenant which does not go to the whole consideration of a contract, but which is subordinate and incidental to its main purpose, does not constitute a breach of the entire contract, or warrant its rescission by the injured party; but the latter is still bound to perform his part of the contract, and his only remedy for the breach is compensation in damages. Kauffman v. Raeder (C. C. A. 8th C.) 247

8. One party to a contract who has received and retained the benefits of a substantial partial performance thereof by the other party cannot rescind it, but the contract must stand, and he must perform his part of it, and his remedy for the breach of complete performance by the other party is limited to compensation therefor in damages. Id.

9. A party to a contract who has conferred upon the other party thereto the benefits of a substantial partial performance thereof, but who has not completely performed the agreement, may maintain an action against the other party for specific performance, or for damages for the latter's failure to perform, upon plea and proof of his own partial performance, without plea or proof of his complete performance; and the defendant in such an action may recoup his damages for the plaintiff's failure of complete performance, or may recover them in an independent action therefor. Id.

Rescission and reformation.

See also supra, 7, 8.

10. The breach of a dependent covenant which goes to the whole consideration of a contract gives to the injured party the right to rescind the contract, or to treat it as broken and to recover damages for a total breach. Id.

11. When the facts are within the knowledge of both parties to a written contract, and the language used is such as they intended, a mistake as to the legal effect of the contract, or that its legal effect is different from that intended, is not available as a defense at law, and is not ground for a reformation of the contract in a court of equity. Andrus v. Blazzard (Utah) 354

Impairment of obligations.

12. The legislature may provide that no breach of condition in an insurance policy shall avoid it, as to an insurer not injured thereby, without interfering with any constitutional right of contract, or, as to future contracts, impairing their obligation, since, insurance companies being the creatures of the legislature, it may prescribe limitations in relation to forfeiture of their contracts. McGannon v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mich.) 739

13. A statute permitting a foreign railroad corporation to extend its road through the state, subject to the restrictions prescribed by its charter for its government within the state of its domicile, when accepted, constitutes a contract which will preclude the state from subsequently requiring it to become domesticated as a condition to its continued enjoyment of the privilege. *Com. v. 1. Minority stockholders of a corporation, who, by filing an equitable petition against it and its officers, succeeded in enjoining it and them from doing ultra vires acts which would have required the expenditure of money belonging to it, were not entitled to a judgment for their attorney's fees against the corporation when there was, as a result of the litigation, neither a recovery of property for the corporation, nor administration or distribution by the court of any fund brought into its hands for this purpose, and when the corporation itself repudiated the effort of the plaintiffs to thus protect its interests, and, in defense to their petition, stood squarely upon the proposition that the acts in question were not ultra vires, but authorized by its charter. Alexander v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (Ga.) 305

2. That the fund reached by a general creditors' bill against an insolvent building and loan association is all absorbed by prior claims not secured by mortgage or other fixed lien, so that the one who instigated it will receive nothing, will not prevent the allowance of a reasonable fee to his solicitors out of the fund, since their work was done for the benefit of all the distributees. Campbell v. Provident Sav. & L. Soc. (Tenn.) 817

3. Costs may be awarded against one who has constructed a ditch with the avowed purpose of diverting a certain quantity of water from a stream, in an action to enjoin him from so doing, although at the time of trial he has not done so and in fact has caused no injury to the complaining party. *Jones v. The doctrine of stare decisis applies with peculiar force to decisions respecting real property, vested rights, and those matters of general commercial importance which tend to influence future business transactions; but questions where the decisions do not constitute a business rule—as where personal liberty is involved—will be met by considerations which favor certainty and stability in the law. Daniels v. State (Del.) 236

3. The question respecting the proper relation of character evidence to the other evidence in the case does not involve any of those essentially important rights and interests favored by the doctrine of precedents. Id.

4. The question of fellow service, in an action by an employee in a Federal court to recover from his employer for personal injuries inflicted through negligence, is not one of local law to be settled by the decisions of the highest courts of the state in which the cause of action arose. *Louisville & N. COVENANT.

See also SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE, 3.

1. A covenant, and not a condition, is created by a clause in a conveyance of land for a college campus, which states that the conveyance is upon express condition that the land shall be devoted exclusively as part of the campus, although another condition is that it shall revert to the grantor if abandoned or devoted to other uses before a certain date, after which a forfeiture is not to occur under any circumstances. Los Angeles University v. Swarth (C. C. A. 9th C.) 262

2. A covenant in a conveyance of land for a college campus, that it shall be devoted exclusively as a part of the campus, and that no buildings shall be erected thereon except those devoted to university purposes, is not broken by the placing thereon of lumber, tools, sheds, derricks, engines, and oil tanks for the exploration for oil supposed to be beneath the surface, where such occupation will probably be of a temporary character, even if oil is found, and the general purposes of the grant may be materially advanced by the pecuniary results of the development. Id.

2. Punitive damages cannot be awarded against a sheriff's bond for the wrongful act of the sheriff's deputy in killing a third person under the mistaken belief that he is a felon for whose arrest the deputy has a warrant, and that the killing is necessary to prevent his escape. Johnson v. Williams (Ky.) 220

*3. The rule that the damages for breach of a contract insuring a life are the premiums paid prior to the breach, with interest thereon from the date of each payment, is applicable to contracts in mutual benefit associations. Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund L. Asso. (N. C.) 605

4. Counsel fees expended in good faith in an effort to recover the money are not properly part of the damages to be recovered from a telegraph company by a bank which has been induced to pay out money by a false telegram forwarded by an employee of the company, either at common law or under a statute allowing as damages for the conversion of property a fair compensation for the money properly expended in pursuit of it. Pacific Postal Teleg. Emmons (N. D.) 610

6. Upon the question whether or not a woman was dependent upon her son for support, interrogatories are admissible as to whether he contributed to her support, and, if so, how much. Mulhall v. Fallon (Mass.) 934

Parol.

7. Testimony of the writer may be admitted to explain the meaning of a letter which contains statements that are confusing, ambiguous, and seemingly contradictory. Smith Bros. & Co. v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. (La.) 923

8. Parol evidence is proper to explain the meaning of words used in a writing which are ambiguous when applied to the subject which gave rise to such paper, as well as when the meaning of the writing is uncertain looking only at the language thereof. Andrews v. Robertson (Wis.) 673

9. Parol evidence is inadmissible to show a different understanding of the parties to a note, where its terms were such as they intended to use, and their legal effect was to bind personally one who signed it as guardian. Andrus v. Blazard (Utah) 354

10. The consideration for a release by an injured employee to his employer, expressed as being "in consideration of the employer's agreement to pay physician's and hospital charges" and a specified cash payment to the employee, is contractual so that it cannot be contradicted by parol. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Houlihan (Ind.) 787

11. Parol evidence is admissible to show that a will was properly executed and witnessed according to the requirements of the statute. Ferris v. Neville (Mich.) 464

Conclusions.

12. A woman's testimony that she was almost entirely dependent on her son for support is not inadmissible in a suit by her for his negligent killing, because it is a conclusion which the jury is to draw, or because it is law rather than fact. Mulhall v. Fallon (Mass.) 934

Admissions.

13. Evidence tending to show that a party to an action tried to bribe a witness to give false testimony in his favor is competent as an admission of weakness in his case. Nowack v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (N. Y.) 592

Acts and declarations.

14. Declarations of the manager of a theater that he is acting under instructions of the owner in preventing the service of process on an actor engaged in the theater are not admissible in a suit to hold the owner liable for such act. Paulton v. Keith (R. I.) 670

15. The manager of a theater has no implied authority from the owner to prevent the service of process upon actors employed in the theater, so as to make his declarations while doing so admissible against the owner as part of the res gestæ. Id.

16. Evidence that an agent of a corporation employed as investigator, to see witnesses and take their statements in actions against the corporation, attempted to bribe a witness in such case, is admissible against the corporation, without proof of his authority to do such act. Nowack v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (N. Y.) 592

17. Declarations of one killed by negligence, that his mother was poor, and that he sent money to her repeatedly, are admissible under Mass. Stat. 1898, chap. 535, in a suit by her to recover for the killing. Mulhall v. Fallon (Mass.) 934

18. Evidence of a son's declarations that his mother was very poor, and that he sent her money repeatedly, corroborated by her testimony that she bought food with his money, sufficiently shows her dependence on him for support to carry to the jury a suit by her to recover for his negligent killing, under Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 2. Id.

Res gestæ.

19. Evidence of the use, by the wife of accused, of an endearing expression in regard to one whom her husband had killed for alleged criminal intimacy with her, uttered after she had left the scene of the murder, is not admissible in favor of accused, although she could not be compelled to become a witness in the case. State v. Yanz (Conn.) 780

Privileged communications.

20. A waiver of the patient's privilege as to communications made to his physician must be confined to the trial in which it is made, and cannot avail to make the testimony of the physician competent at a subsequent trial. Burgess v. Sims Drug Co. (Iowa) 364

21. Answering questions on cross-examination as to a matter of privilege between physician and patient will not waive the patient's right to object on the ground of privilege to the physician's answering questions as to communications made to him by the patient. Id.

tions as to communications made to him by the patient. Id.

Character.

22. While character evidence is not a defense, it is a circumstance in the antecedent conduct and habits of the accused, its purpose being to strengthen the legal presumption of innocence, and is to be weighed and estimated by the jury according to the weight of the testimony by which it is supported, in connection with that to which it is opposed. Daniels v. State (Del.) 286

Similar appliances.

23. Upon the question of liability of a master for injury to a servant by failure of an appliance furnished for his use to operate as intended, evidence is not admissible of the successful working of another device intended for the same purpose, where it is not shown to be a standard article, and the failure of the one furnished was due to lack of oiling and cleaning, and not to faulty design. Quigley v. Levering (N. Y.) 62

Variance.

24. Under a declaration seeking to recover from a carrier for the negligent killing of a passenger no recovery can be had unless the relation of carrier and passenger is shown, although the facts are such as to warrant a recovery in the absence of such relation. *Chicago & E. 1. Nonresidents are within the protection of S. C. Rev. Stat. §§ 2315, 2316, creating a right of action for wrongful death to be enforced by the administrator, so as to justify the appointment of an administrator to enforce the liability, without requiring a resort for such appointment to the state of decedent's residence,—especially where there is no statutory permission for a suit by an administrator appointed there. Re Mayo (S. C.) 660

2. A cause of action against a railroad company for negligently killing a person, which under the statutes is not the old one belonging to decedent, but a new one created for the benefit of the persons named, and is enforceable only by his administrator, will give jurisdiction to the probate court of the county where the killing occurred and where the railroad company had its residence, to grant letters of administration on the estate, although the deceased was not a resident of the state, and owned no other estate within its limits at the time of his death, and the statutes provide, in case of a nonresident, for administration only in the county where the greater part of his estate may be. Id.

3. A railroad company against which a cause of action exists for negligently killing a person can attack the appointment of an administrator upon his estate for non-residence or want of assets only in case want of jurisdiction appears on the record, under a statute forbidding the contesting of jurisdiction assumed by the probate court, so far as it depends on place of residence or location of the estate, except by appeal, or when the want of jurisdiction appears on the record, since it is not entitled to be made a party to the proceedings so as to have a right to appeal. Id.

1. The macadamized portion alone of a street 40 feet wide, of which about 25 are paved with cobble stones and the remainder macadamized, cannot be treated as the traveled part within the meaning of a statute requiring travelers by carriage to keep to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, and therefore a traveler injured by collision while needlessly on the left of the center of the whole width of road cannot absolve himself from fault by showing that he was to the right of the center of the macadamized part. Winter v. Harris (R. I.) 643

2. A municipal corporation which, in constructing a sewer in a public street, leaves a manhole uncovered for several weeks, and near it a pile of sand, with knowledge that children are accustomed to play in the sand, will be liable for injuries to a child of tender years who, while at play in the sand, falls into the manhole and is injured. *South Bend v. 3. A municipality constructing a sewer in a public street is not relieved from liability for injuries to persons using the street by the fact that it was in the exclusive possession of the contractor, if it had notice, or might have had notice by the exercise of proper oversight, that its licensee had acted in a negligent manner and left

1. That the erection of a building will increase the rates of insurance upon neighboring property is not ground for injunction to restrain such erection. Chambers v. Cramer (W. Va.) 545

2. Injunction will be granted at the instance of the manufacturer whose apprentices are under express contract not to join a labor union, to restrain representatives of such union, who are not employed by him, from enticing his apprentices to break their contracts and become members of the union to the injury of the business. Flacus v. Smith (Pa.) 640

3. A suit to enjoin threatened diversion of water to a certain amount for irrigating purposes, under a claim of absolute right, through a ditch already constructed, will not be dismissed merely because that amount has not been used and the complaining party has not proved actual injury. Jones v. Conn (Or.) 630

4. Equity will not interfere as a general rule when a thing complained of is not a nuisance per se, but may or may not become so, according to circumstances, and the injury apprehended is eventual or contingent, the presumption being that a person entering into a legitimate business will conduct it in a proper way, so that it will not constitute a nuisance. Chambers v. Cramer (W. Va.) 545

5. To warrant the perpetuation of an injunction restraining, as a threatened nuisance, the erection of a building proposed to be used for legitimate purposes, the fact that it will be a nuisance if so used must be made clearly to appear, beyond all ground of fair questioning. Id.

6. The collection of a tax cannot be enjoined because the person by whom it was assessed had no right to the office of assessor, if he was a de facto assessor properly exercising the functions of the office. Northwestern Lumber Co. v. Chehalis County (Wash.) 212

1. No recovery of his commissions can be had by one who secures applications for insurance at a time when he has not complied with the statute prohibiting, under penalty, the soliciting of insurance without a license, although the policies are not issued until after the license is procured, and the statute does not expressly prevent recovery of the commissions. Black v. Security Mut. L. Assn. (Me.) 930

Insurable interest.

2. An attaching creditor as well as a receiver has an insurable interest in the attached property, but in either instance the insurance would be a personal contract between the company and the party insuring, and, unless there be some contract or trust relation between them, in the event of loss the insurance money collected would belong to each in his individual or official right. McLaughlin v. Park City Bank (Utah) 343

3. One may lawfully insure his own life, and afterwards assign the policy to another having no insurable interest, if done in good faith, and not by way of cover for a wager policy. Chamberlain v. Butler (Neb.) 338

4. An adult son has not, from the bare fact of relationship, an insurable interest in the life of his father. Life Ins. Clearing Co. v. O'Neill (C. C. A. 3d C.) 225

5. Ability on the part of the father to support his adult son in case of the latter's inability to support himself is necessary to give the son an insurable interest in the father's life, under a statute imposing upon fathers the duty of caring for their indigent children. Id.

6. The existence of a law imposing upon a son the duty of supporting his father in case the latter becomes unable to support himself gives the son no insurable interest in the father's life, in the absence of any expenditures, past or prospective, towards such support. Id.

7. An illegitimate child is not a child or relative of her father, as those words are used in a statute designating the persons who may be beneficiaries in certificates of mutual benefit associations. Lavigne v. Ligue Des Patriotes (Mass.) 814

8. No relation of dependency exists between an illegitimate child of a married woman and her putative father so as to entitle her to become a beneficiary in a benefit certificate issued to him, under a statutory provision as to "persons dependent," where he merely boards with her mother, paying his board when able, and is under no legal obligation to support the child. Id.

Construction.

9. Liability for loss resulting from destruction by fire of a building insured by a policy exempting the insurer from liability for loss caused by explosions of any kind (unless fire ensues, and in that event for the damage by fire only) and providing that if the building or any part thereof falls, except as the result of fire, the insurance shall immediately cease, will attach under the former clause, and not be defeated by the latter, where one corner of the building is knocked down by an explosion in a neighboring building, and fire immediately appears in the exposed part, caused either by the flame of the explosion or by fires liberated thereby in the building insured. Leonard v. Orient Ins. Co. (C. C. A. 7th C.) 706

10. Recovery on a policy insuring against illness, which limits liability to the period when insured is continuously confined to his house and subject to the personal calls of a registered physician in good standing, is not defeated by the fact that the insured went out by direction of his physician for an occasional and necessary airing, if, by reason of the illness, he was continuously confined to the house the larger portion of the time. Hoffman v. Michigan Home & Hospital Asso. (Mich.) 746

Breach of condition.

11. All policies, whether standard or not, are covered by a statute declaring that no policy of fire insurance shall be declared void by the insurer for breach of any condition if the insurer has not been injured by it. McGannon v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (Mich.) 739

12. The temporary absence of a competent watchman regularly employed for a mill, during which the mill is destroyed by fire, will not avoid a policy of insurance on the property, which provides that statements in the application shall be a part of the contract, although in the application the insured agrees to keep a watchman on the premises at such times as that when the fire occurs. Id.

Proofs of loss.

13. Failure to comply with the requirements of a policy insuring against illness, as to time of furnishing proofs of disability and as to allowing time for investigating the claim, will not defeat an action on the policy when liability is denied because the disease is not covered by the policy, and insured is not confined to the house. Hoffman v. Michigan Home & H. Asso. (Mich.) 746

Defenses.

See also supra, 9, 10, 12, 13.

14. Suicide will not defeat recovery upon a contract of life insurance not procured by the insured with the intention of committing suicide, unless the contract so provides in express terms. Campbell v. Supreme Conclave I. O. H. (N. J. Err. & App.) 576

Subrogation.

15. The recovery for loss of prospective earnings awarded because of injury to a vessel by collision is within the rule entitling an insurer who has received an abandonment of the vessel to the fund recovered on account of the collision from the vessel in fault, and the fact that the insurance did not cover the full value of the injured vessel will not require the insurer to share such recovery with the vessel owner. Mason v. Marine Ins. Co. (C. C. A. 6th C.) 700

Suit.

16. A new action is not brought by the substitution of plaintiff as administrator with the will annexed after the finding and probate of the will, for himself as simple administrator, in an action on an insurance policy, so as to give the insurer the benefit of the expiration of the time limited for the bringing of the suit, which occurs before the substitution is made. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Freeman (C. C. A. 6th C.) 680

2. The action of the trial court in construing a verdict silent as to one of two sued jointly for injuries caused by the alleged negligence of one acting as agent for the other, as a verdict in his favor, and rendering judgment to that effect, is, at most, error rendering the judgment voidable if properly attacked, but leaving it conclusive against collateral attack. Id.

Aspinwall* (Conn.) 758

5. One cannot defeat liability on a judgment entered on a note authorizing an attorney to confess judgment, which he signed without reading, on the ground that he did not know that it contained such authority, in the absence of any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment in procuring his signature. Crim v. Crim (Mo.) 502

2. The return of the officer selling property under execution, that it sold for a certain sum, is not conclusive in favor of the purchaser that the price was paid. Meherin v. Ambrose (Cal.) 272

3. Receipt of the officer's deed is not a condition to liability to comply with a bid at execution sale by one who has received the officer's certificate of sale. Id.

4. That the property had been sold at a former execution sale under another judgment will not absolve a purchaser at execution sale from complying with his bid. Id.

5. A purchaser at execution sale cannot defeat an action to compel him to comply with his bid, on the ground that the sale was not wholly for cash, as required by statute. Id.

6. A suit to compel a purchaser at execution sale to comply with his bid cannot be defeated because the statute, upon such failure, requires a resale of the property, making the purchaser liable for the costs and deficiency, where he induced the officer to forego that course, gave his check for the balance, and received and retained a certificate of sale. Id.

1. The statute of limitations runs against a right of action to recover possession of a portion of a railroad right of way in adverse possession of a third person. Northern P. R. Co. v. Ely (Wash.) 526

2. In case an officer selling property at an execution sale takes a check for the excess of the bid over the judgment, the right of the judgment debtor as an equitable assignees to enforce payment of the check is governed by the statute applicable to the limitation of actions on written instruments, and not by that applicable to actions not founded on instruments in writing. Meherin v. Ambrose (Cal.) 272

3. An action by a father to recover damages for the seduction of his daughter is barred by the Georgia statute of limitations, unless for an injury to the person and brought within two years from the time the right of action accrued. Hutcherson v. Durden (Ga.) 811

4. The statute of limitations does not begin to run against all actions for injuries to adjoining property, growing out of the negligent erection by a municipality of a bulkhead so as to constitute a continuing nuisance, at the time of its completion, but damages may be recovered for injuries which have accrued within the statutory period before the commencement of the action, although more than the statutory period has elapsed since the completion of the work. Doran v. Seattle (Wash.) 532

5. A personal judgment upon any cause of action merges and ends that cause of action, so that thereafter the statute of limitations runs against the judgment. Hogg v. Hartley (W. Va.) 215

6. The time of the residence abroad of one who was a resident of the state when the cause of action arose, but who departs from it before the entry of a personal judgment against him, will not excuse the judgment from the statute of limitations, under a provision that the time of obstructing the prosecution of the right by a departure from the state shall not be computed. Id.

7. Removal from the state and residence abroad before the birth of a cause of action or the accrual of a right of action against the person will not save the cause of action from the statute of limitations. Id.

1. One who hires a gang of workmen and furnishes them to a third person, together with a time keeper, who is to impart to them the latter's orders as to the time and place to work, will not be liable for trespasses committed by them in cutting timber upon a stranger's land under direction of such third person, although he is to pay the wages and has power to discharge the men, where he is ignorant of the trespass, is not interested in the work except as security for his advances, and has no voice in directing the laborers when or where to work. *Swackhamer v. 2. A railroad company is guilty of negligence in failing to provide suitable rules and regulations for the control and operation of hand cars used by bridge gangs in going to and from a station to places where they are engaged in the repair and reconstruction of bridges. *Wallin v. 3. It is the duty of an electric company to warn of the danger an employee who is hired to dig holes, repair poles, and to do other work on the ground, and who to its knowledge is unacquainted with the dangerous character of the work of a lineman, upon ordering him to ascend a pole and scrape a wire, and it cannot relieve itself from liability for injuries caused by non-compliance with such duty by delegating its performance to a foreman who is in a general sense a fellow servant of the person injured. *Tedford v. Safe place and appliances.

4. One engaged in constructing a bridge owes to his employees the duty of furnishing material for the temporary structure, which is reasonably sufficient to bear the weight to which it will be subjected; and for that purpose he is required to make proper inspection of the material furnished, to ascertain its soundness. Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (C. C. A. 7th C.) 33

5. Toledo, S. & M. R. Co.* (Mich.) 461

7. The master's liability for injury to a servant by a defective tool furnished for his use is not defeated by the fact that the defective condition was known to a fellow servant who procured the tool for use by himself and the injured one, and who was therefore negligent with regard to such use. *Noble v. 8. A servant employed in deepening a canal assumes the risk of the fall of standing trees, in complying with the request of his foreman to assist in extinguishing a fire spreading through swamp and underbrush towards property of the employer on the canal bank, the danger of which is as obvious to him as to any other person engaged in saving the property. Maltbie v. Belden (N. Y.) 52

9. A minor employed as a servant assumes, to the same extent as an adult, the ordinary dangers and risks of his employment which he actually knows and appreciates, and those that are so apparent and open that one of his age, experience, and capacity would, in the exercise of ordinary care, know and appreciate them. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Marcan (C. C. A. 8th C.) 258

10. A minor who for four weeks has been working upon a block 14 inches square and 5 inches in thickness, placed upon a wet, greasy, and slippery floor by himself, assumes the risk and danger of the slipping of the block upon the greasy floor, by means of which his hand is involuntarily thrown into the cylinders of a chopping machine. Id.

Liability to third person.

See also CARRIERS.

11. A railroad company is not liable for damages resulting from an assault and battery inflicted by its station agent and another upon a third person, when it appears that the difficulty which gave rise to the beating arose out of a personal quarrel, 54 L. R. A.

and that the agent, so far as related to his participation therein, was acting upon his individual responsibility, and not within the scope of the business of his agency as an employee of the company. Lynch v. Florida, C. & P. R. Co. (Ga.) 810

Fellow servants or vice principal.

See also supra, 3, 7.

12. A foreman and servant engaged in deepening a canal are fellow servants in attempting to extinguish a fire spreading over adjacent land towards property of the master on the canal bank, so that the master is not liable for injuries to the servant from the negligence of the foreman in failing to warn him of the impending fall of burning trees. Maltbie v. Belden (N. Y.) 52

13. A foreman of water supply of a railroad, whose duty requires him to be carried from place to place along the road to supervise water tanks and pumping machinery, is, when riding on a detached engine to a place where machinery needs repairs, a fellow servant of the engineer in charge of the engine carrying him, within the rule exempting the employer from liability for injuries negligently inflicted upon an employee by his fellow servant. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Stuber (C. C. A. 6th C.) 696

14. Members of a bridge gang at work in repairing and reconstructing railroad bridges are employees of the railroad company and engaged in their duties as such, within the meaning of Wis. Laws 1893, chap. 220, entitling them to recover for damages caused by negligence of fellow servants, while riding on hand cars going to and from their work, when as a part of their contract it is the business of the railroad company to transport them by regular trains to the nearest station and from there to the place of their work by hand cars. Wallin v. Eastern R. Co. (Minn.) 481

15. A section foreman in charge of a crew on a hand car, with power to determine where the car should be stopped, is not, in the act of applying the brakes, a fellow servant of one of the crew, so as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injuries to the latter by his negligent application of the brakes. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Josey (Ky.) 78

16. A foreman authorized to purchase, inspect, and direct the use of lumber for the temporary structure of a bridge which his employer is engaged in constructing represents the master in respect to the duty of inspecting to ascertain if the lumber used is reasonably suitable for the purpose intended, so as to render the master liable for injuries to other employees due to failure to perform that duty. Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (C. C. A. 7th C.) 33

17. One operating a body maker in a can manufactory, having authority to direct the actions of the machine tender, and therefore representing the master in directing the tender to remove a can body which has caught in the machine, does not, by reason of the fact that it is his duty to start the machinery with his own hand, become the fellow servant of the tender in so doing, so as to relieve the master from liability for injuries to the tender caused by his starting the machinery before the tender has withdrawn his hand from within it. Norton Bros. v. Nadebok (Ill.) 842

18. A master is not liable for injury to an employee by reason of failure of his foreman to keep cleaned and oiled an automatic stop designed to prevent the trolley from running off the end of the track of a traveler used to convey metal plates from one place to another in the shop, because of which the stop fails to work and the trolley falls upon the employee. Quigley v. Levering (N. Y.) 62

19. It is negligence for a section foreman in charge of a crew on a hand car to apply the brakes when the car is running at a high rate of speed, and he sees a member of the crew standing without support, so that suddenly checking the speed of the car will be likely to throw him off from it. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Josey (Ky.) 78

20. One in charge of a locomotive engine is negligent in running it at 20 miles an hour without warning past a place where he knows it is the duty of an employee to cross the track to receive the report of a train then passing, and whose view along the track is obstructed by posts and weeds. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Houlihan (Ind.) 787

21. That an injury was caused, by the negligent use of an engine by a servant in charge thereof, to another servant of the same corporation, both being at the time in the line of duty as employees, is sufficient to render the employer liable under a statute imposing liability where injury is caused by the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation who has been given charge of any engine, or where such injury is caused by the negligence of any servant acting in the place of the corporation in that behalf, and the person injured is obeying at the time of such injury the order of some superior having authority to direct, without showing that the negligent servant represented the employer, or that the injured one was obeying the order of a superior. Id.

22. The negligence of a fellow servant is the cause of injury to an employee by the fall of the trolley from the traveler used for conveying metal plates across the shop, where, in disregard of orders, he pulls the trolley towards the end of the track without looking to see whether or not the stop designed to prevent it from running off the end is working,—and not the failure of the stop to work. Quigley v. Levering (N. Y.) 62

2. Advantage of a clause in a mortgage covering several parcels of land, by which any parcel may be released upon payment of a certain sum, cannot be taken after foreclosure of the mortgage, by a purchaser of a parcel who has unsuccessfully sought to cast the whole burden of the mortgage upon subsequent purchasers of the remaining parcels who purchased before the prior conveyance was recorded. Gray v. H. M. Loud & Sons Lumber Co. (Mich.) 731

3. One obtaining a contract which he fails to record, for the conveyance of a parcel of a tract of land the whole of which is subsequently mortgaged, cannot cast the burden of the mortgage upon subsequent purchasers of the remainder of the tract, who have no notice of his rights, he not having taken possession so as to charge the subsequent purchaser with constructive notice. Id.

1. A municipal corporation may make the mere possession of a lottery ticket a misdemeanor, where by the Constitution it 54 L. R. A.

has power to make and enforce such police and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, and the suppression of lotteries is part of the public policy of the state as evidenced by its penal laws. Ex parte McClain (Cal.) 779

2. Under statutory authority to prevent the running at large of dogs, a municipal corporation may exact a fee of $1.50 for the privilege of keeping a dog, and in case of its nonpayment impose a fine upon the owner and provide for the killing of the dog. Gibson v. Harrison (Ark.) 268

3. An ordinance providing that no vehicle which, together with its load, weighs more than 2,000 pounds, and which is in use for carrying goods, merchandise, building material, manure, dirt, earth, or other article or commodity, and which has tires less than 6 inches in width, shall pass or enter upon any park or parkway, is void as applicable to a parkway, because unreasonable, and in its effect prohibitive of traffic thus classified. State v. Rohart (Minn.) 947

4. Failure of a municipality to attempt to enforce its ordinance limiting the speed at which bicycles may be ridden on its streets will render it liable for injuries to a pedestrian knocked down by a bicycle which is being ridden at an immoderate rate of speed. Hagerstown v. Klotz (Md.) 940

1. One who by negligence puts another under a reasonable apprehension of personal physical injury, and, in a reasonable effort to escape, the latter sustains physical injury, is subject to a right of action for the physical injury and the mental disorder naturally incident to its occurrence. Tuttle v. Atlantic City R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 582

2. A woman, seeing a car which had been derailed while a flying drill was being made coming out of the limits of a freight yard and across a public street at great speed towards the place where she was standing, is entitled to recover damages for an injury which she sustained by falling as in fright she ran for safety. Id.

3. Negligence, to be actionable, must result in damage to someone, which result, in the absence of wantonness or malice animus, might have been reasonably foreseen by a man of ordinary intelligence and prudence, and be the probable result of the initial act. Cleghorn v. Thompson (Kan.) 402

4. A person guilty of negligence should be held responsible for all the consequences which a prudent and experienced person fully acquainted with all the circumstances which in fact existed, whether they could have been ascertained by reasonable diligence or not, would at the time of the negligent act have thought reasonably possible to follow if they had occurred to his mind. Wallin v. Eastern R. Co. (Minn.) 481

5. One who beats a horse in violation of the statute for the prevention of cruelty to animals cannot escape liability for an injury caused by a blow falling on a bystander, on the ground that he used reasonable care to avoid the accident, which was caused by the shying of the horse and the slipping of his own foot, and that such result of his acts was not anticipated. Osborne v. Van Dyke (Iowa) 367

6. The accidental shooting of a man upon a highway by an employee in a slaughterhouse, who was shooting at dogs that had caused annoyance and trouble about the place, and who had been instructed to kill the dogs if they returned, does not render either employer or employee liable, where the shooting of the man was entirely accidental and was due to the deflection of the course of the bullet in some manner, except for which it could never have reached the highway. Cleghorn v. Thompson (Kan.) 402

7. A merchant who fills a jug with gasoline for a customer without complying with the statute providing that no gasoline shall be sold until the package containing it has been marked "gasoline" is liable for injuries to a member of the customer's family by its explosion when she attempts to use it believing it to be kerosene. Ives v. Welden (Iowa) 854

8. A child injured by explosion of gasoline which she attempts to use believing it to be kerosene is not, in an action to hold the merchant who sold it liable for the injury, affected by the negligence of her father, who, with knowledge of its character, permits her to use it, or fails to warn her of the danger. Id.

Premises.

9. One who goes upon the premises of another by express or implied invitation of the owner may recover damages for an injury caused by a failure on the part of 54 L. R. A.

such owner to keep the premises in a reasonably safe condition. Tucker v. Draper (Neb.) 321

10. One who leaves an open well upon his premises, where he knows that children of tender years, without any notion of their danger, are continually playing, although he can obviate the danger with very little trouble and without injuring the premises or interfering with his own free use thereof, is guilty of negligence which renders him liable for the drowning of a child in the well,—especially when he knows that other children have very nearly fallen into the well and he has been warned of the danger. Id.

11. The owner of an uninclosed lot adjacent to a highway in a thickly populated part of a city, who leaves unguarded thereon a heavy section of cement pipe of unstable equilibrium, which, because of its large diameter, is an attractive plaything for children to roll about, and who knows that they resort there for that purpose, is liable to a child who, not having arrived at years of discretion and judgment, is injured by the pipe toppling over onto him while he is playing with it. Kopplekom v. Colorado Cement Pipe Co. (Colo.) 284

12. One who makes an excavation upon his land is not bound to so guard it as to prevent injury to children who come upon it without his invitation, express or implied, but who are induced to do so merely by the alluring attractiveness of the excavation and its surroundings. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Beavers (Ga.) 314

Contributory.

13. The duty imposed by law upon all persons to exercise ordinary care to avoid the consequences of another's negligence does not arise until the negligence of such other is existing, and is either apparent, or the circumstances are such that an ordinarily prudent person would have reason to apprehend its existence. Western & A. R. Co. v. Ferguson (Ga.) 802

14. Failure to exercise ordinary care on the part of the person injured, before the negligence complained of is apparent or should have been reasonably apprehended, will not preclude a recovery, but will, in Georgia, authorize the jury to diminish the damages in proportion to the fault attributable to the person injured. Id.

15. The modification of the rule that one guilty of contributory negligence cannot recover for injuries negligently inflicted, which permits a recovery in case defendant might, after discovering plaintiff's peril, have avoided the injury by the exercise of due care, is not applicable where plaintiff, in attempting to put a parcel on the front platform of a street car, negligently stood on the side towards the other track, and, upon perceiving a car approaching on it and receiving and assenting to instructions from its motorman as to reaching a place of safety, became confused and got caught between the cars and injured. Baltimore

NEW TRIAL.

1. A new trial in a foreclosure action will not be granted under N. Dak. Rev. Codes, § 5630, providing that the supreme court, if it deem such a course necessary to the accomplishment of justice, may order a new trial of an action, where, although the defendant introduced no evidence on the trial because the court held at the close of plain-tiff's testimony that the notice of sale was insufficient and the foreclosure void, there is not even the suggestion of the possibility of establishing facts which would alter the conclusions already reached. Grandin
v. Emmons (N. D.) 610

2. The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted in a criminal case where the solicitor general, in his address to the jury, uses highly improper language, not authorized by the evidence or any fair deduction therefrom, and the court fails to rebuke him or charge the jury with reference to the matter, and, upon motion of the counsel for the accused, refuses to declare a mistrial. Ivey v. State (Ga.) 959

1. A blacksmith shop or a machine shop is not a nuisance per se. Chambers v.
Cramer (W. Va.) 545

2. Charter power to declare what shall constitute nuisances will not authorize a municipal corporation to declare generally that to inter a dead body in any portion of the inhabited district of the city shall be a nuisance, when such interment may be made in the usual way in some of such sections without giving offense to the senses of any human inhabitant, or endangering in the least measure the health of the community. Wygant v. McLauchlan (Or.) 636

3. Jurisdiction to abate nuisances existing in the cities having a population of 20,000 or more, in a summary manner, under the laws of the state of Georgia, resides alone in the police court of the city where it is claimed such nuisance exists, except as to things or acts which are by the common or statute law declared to be nusances per se or which are in their very nature palpably and indisputably such.
Western & A. R. Co. v. Atlanta (Ga.) 294

4. Save and except as to those things which are by the common or statute law declared to be nuisances, per se, or which are in their very nature palpably and indisputably such, neither the municipal authorities of any city of this state, nor any department thereof which has been given the power to abate nuisances, has the legal right summarily to compel the abatement of a particular thing or act as a nuisance, without reasonable notice, to the person alleged to be maintaining or doing the same, of the time and place for hearing and determining whether such thing or act does in law constitute a nuisance. Id.

5. The fact that all places where intoxicating liquors are sold or kept for sale, or places where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking the same, are declared by statute to be common nusances, does not justify their abatement by any person or persons without process of law; and the destruction or injury to property used in aid of the maintenance of such nuisances, except in the manner provided by the statute, is a trespass. State v.
Stark (Kan.) 910

6. A private individual cannot abate a public nuisance consisting of a fence across a navigable stream, unless he has some special interest in the abatement different from and greater than the interest of the community. Griffith v. Holman (Wash.)

2. Where an office exists under the law, and a person is elected to fill such office, and duly qualifies and enters upon the discharge of his official duties, he is a de facto officer, and his acts are valid, notwithstanding the fact that he may not possess all the necessary qualifications as prescribed by the statute to fill such office. Id.

PERJURY.

Perjury cannot be assigned upon the alleged false testimony of a witness, given in the course of a trial, where the court has no jurisdiction of the offense charged or of the defendant; but if the proceedings are merely erroneous or voidable, even if there be such irregularities or defects as would require a reversal of the cause on appeal, false testimony given in the course of such trial, if material, does constitute perjury. Morford v. Territory (Okla.) 513

1. The presumption of the regularity of the proceedings in the courts of another state resulting in a decree of divorce will dispense with an allegation, in a bill to enforce the decree, that the cross complaint on which the decree was based was duly served. Trowbridge v. Spinning (Wash.) 204

2. Allegation of the fact of jurisdiction to grant a divorce in a court of another state, whose decree is sought to be enforced, is not necessary where it is alleged to be a court of general jurisdiction, and the local statutes empower it to pass such decrees. Id.

3. Knowledge of the falsity of a warranty that an acetylene gas machine is safe need not be alleged in an action to recover for its breach. Tyler v. Moody (Ky.) 417

4. A petition by an administrator to recover for the death of an intestate sufficiently alleges the necessary pecuniary injury to the widow or next of kin, as against a general demurrer, by an allegation that "by reason of the death of the intestate, and the loss of the service and society and fellowship of the said intestate, the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $5,000." Tucker v. Draper (Neb.) 321

5. Where a railway company is by statute made liable for the negligence of its engineer, an averment that its negligence was the cause of an injury will include the negligence of the engineer. Indianapolis Union R. Co. v. Houlihan (Ind.) 787

6. An amendment of pleadings is more readily allowed than refused. There is no substitution of a new plaintiff when the original plaintiff amends his petition in order to make it clearly appear that his children, in whose name he sued, were the parties actually in interest. Delisle v. Bourriague (La.) 420

7. Sustaining a demurrer to a plea in an action for negligent injuries, which alleges that they were committed by a third person, is not error where there is also a plea of the general issue, since the plea demurred to amounts merely to the general issue. Hagerstown v. Klotz (Md.) 940

2. Any right which a creditor of an insolvent has to set off his claim against the surplus of his bid at an execution sale of the debtor's property must be exercised when he proves his claim in the insolvency proceedings against the debtor, and is waived by proving for and receiving a dividend on the whole amount of his claim. Id.

3. A claim against an insolvent which has been proved in the insolvency proceedings has ceased to be an existing cause of action so as to be a valid counterclaim against a demand by the insolvent's assignee, where the statute provides that no creditor proving his debt shall be allowed to maintain any action therefor against the debtor. Id.

3. Failure to look and listen before crossing an electric street railway is not negligence per se. Id.

4. 2. A farmer who, to give his children school facilities, takes a house in town, in which he places some of his household effects and lives with his family, is not subject to taxation there, where he keeps his country house at all times in readiness to receive the family when the purpose of their sojourn in town shall have been accomplished, and performs his duties as a citizen where his country house is located, claiming that as his home. Montgomery v. Lebanon (Ky.) 914

3. Ocean-going tugboats are not exempt from taxation by the state in whose waters they are exclusively employed, by the fact that they are registered and taxed at a port in another state where their owner is domiciled. Northwestern Lumber Co. v. Chelalis County (Wash.) 212

4. A statute enacting that each armory "owned" and occupied by any command of the volunteer military forces of the state "shall be to all intents and purposes public property . . . and as such public property . . . shall be exempt from any taxation, state, county, or municipal" (Ga. Pol. Code, § 1156), is in violation of the state Constitution authorizing the exemption from taxation of "public property," since that exemption extends only to property owned by the state or some political division thereof. Board of Trustees of Gate City Guards v. Atlanta (Ga.) 806

5. Public property within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which authorizes the general assembly to exempt from taxation "all public property" embraces only such property as is owned by the state or some political division thereof, and title to which is vested directly in the state or one of its subordinate political divisions, or in some person holding exclusively for the benefit of the state or a subordinate public corporation. Id.

1. A statute providing that three fourths of the jurors sitting in a civil case may concur in and render a verdict, and that such a verdict shall have the same force and effect as though found and returned by all the jurors, is not authorized by Wyo. Const. art 1, § 9, which provides that the right to trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases, but a jury in civil cases in all courts, or in criminal cases in courts not of record, may consist of less than twelve men, since the legislature is given no power to dispense with the unanimity of a verdict. First Nat. Bank v. Foster (Wyo.) 549

2. The conviction of a person of a crime which La. Const. 1898, art. 116, requires should be tried by a jury of twelve, though nine jurors concurring may render a verdict, is not a legal conviction, though twelve jurors are physically present during the trial, and all concur in a verdict of guilty, if one member of the jury is in a drunken condition during the trial. State v. Ned (La.) 933

Questions for court or jury.

3. What facts will create the contract relation of carrier and passenger is a question of law. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Jennings (Ill.) 827

4. Whether or not the measure of care which a railroad company owed to a drunken passenger dancing and staggering between the open doors of the baggage car was such that by its exercise he could have been prevented from falling out to his injury is a question for the jury. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 955

5. The jury must determine whether or not a railroad company could have prevented a drunken passenger staggering and dancing between the open doors of a baggage car, without capacity to appreciate the danger, from falling out and being injured. Id.

6. Whether or not the intoxication of a passenger renders him incapable of understanding the danger of a position which he has assumed or from protecting himself from its hazards, although he is able to talk, laugh, sing and dance about, is a question for the jury. Id.

7. Two and a half miles an hour cannot, as matter of law, be said not to be an excessive speed for an electric street car, when it meets, at a busy street crossing, another car on a parallel track, where its mechanism for controlling the current is defective. Roberts v. Spokane Street R. Co. (Wash.) 184

8. The question of negligence in permitting electric cars to meet and pass at a street crossing is one of fact in the light of all the evidence in the case. Id.

9. The question of an implied invitation on the part of the owner of premises on which there was an uncovered well, for children to come upon the lots to play, is for the jury, where there is evidence that children were accustomed to play there, that public entertainments were sometimes given on the premises, and people invited to hitch their teams there, and that there was a saloon on one corner of the tract. Tucker v. Draper (Neb.) 321

10. The question whether or not a boy ten years old is guilty of negligence contributing to his injury is for the jury, where at a street crossing he attempts to ride a bicycle across the tracks, and in so doing passes behind one car and comes immediately in front of another approaching from the opposite direction, which, because of its defective condition, cannot be stopped in time to avoid collision with him. Roberts v. Spokane Street R. Co. (Wash.) 184

Instructions.

11. A requested instruction not true in its application to the case on trial should not be given, although stating a proposition true in general. Wheeler v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (N. H.) 955

Taking from jury; directing verdict.

12. At the close of the evidence there is always a preliminary question for the judge before the case can be properly submitted to the jury, and that is whether or not there is any substantial evidence upon which the jury can properly return a verdict in favor of the party who produces it; and, if there is no such evidence, it is the duty of the court to direct the jury to return a verdict against him. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Marcan (C. C. A. 8th C.) 258

13. A verdict must be directed for defendant in the absence of anything to show ill will or malice, in an action for the publication in a newspaper of an article ridiculing in exaggerated and uncomplimentary terms a public entertainment which is not only childish, but ridiculous in the extreme. Cherry v. Des Moines Leader (Iowa) 855

14. Suicide of the insured is not so conclusively shown as to require the taking of an action on the policy from the jury, by evidence that, having been upon a train, he was found by the side of the track mortally wounded, that for some time he had been in straitened financial circumstances, his property being heavily encumbered and about to be sold, that he had failed in an attempt to effect a loan, had been guilty of forgery and false representations for which he was threatened with prosecution, and had recently been making efforts to secure as much accident insurance as possible, where it also appears that he had four daughters dependent upon him for support, for whom he had a strong affection, was a man of sanguine temperament, accustomed to carry considerable insurance, and that his property sold for enough to pay all his debts. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Freeman (C. C. A. 6th C.) 680

15. An action for injuries to an employee of one engaged in constructing a bridge, which is caused by the breaking of defective material used in the temporary structure, cannot be taken from the jury where there is no evidence of inspection on the part of the master to ascertain whether or not the material furnished was suitable, and evidence produced indicates that proper inspection would have disclosed the defect. Lafayette Bridge Co. v. Olsen (C. C. A. 7th C.) 33

Verdict.

16. For the purpose of overthrowing a general verdict in favor of a child who, while playing on a sand pile in a public street, fell into an open manhole and was injured, the court will not assume from the fact that he was six and a half years old, that he was so advanced in knowledge as to be able to know when he was in a place where he ought not to be, and to appreciate the evidences and presence of danger. South Bend v. Turner (Ind.) 396

17. To overthrow a general verdict by answers to special interrogatories they must be of such a nature as to exclude the possible existence of other controlling facts provable under the issue relating to the same subject. Id.

A person charged with the duty of selling corporation stock in order to raise a fund with which to pay encumbrances upon the property of the corporation, and who is himself the owner of one of the encumbrances, junior in time to the others, and acquired by him before he became obligated to sell the stock, is not a trustee as to the property of the corporation covered by the encumbrances, and forbidden to protect his own interests in it by buying the prior liens on it, merely because he was under obligation to sell the corporation stock to raise a fund to discharge the corporation indebtedness. Harrison v. Mulvane (Kan.) 405

VOTERS AND ELECTIONS.

1. A constitutional provision which provides that, "for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence . . . while kept at the almshouse or other asylum at public expense," preserves the voting status of the inmates of a soldiers' home at the time of their entry thereto, and such inmates cannot acquire, by reason of their presence in such soldiers' home, and while kept at public expense, the right to vote in the county and precinct in which such institution is located. Powell v. Spackman (Idaho) 378

2. Constitutional requirements of a written vote, and provisions for sorting and counting, will not preclude the use of a voting machine by which the result is effected by a system of wheels, cogs, and indexes in connection with written or printed names of the candidates,—at least if the action of the machine in registering each vote cast is visible to the voter casting it, and the work of the machine in adding the votes is done under the supervision of someone duly charged with counting the votes cast. Re House Bill No. 1,291 (Mass.) 430

1. A notice printed plainly on the face of a warehouse receipt, to the effect that loss by leakage shall be at the risk of the owner of the goods, is a part of the contract. Tausig v. Bode (Cal.) 774

2. A provision in a warehouse receipt, that loss by leakage shall be at the risk of the owner of goods, exempts the warehouseman from the duty of watching the packages to detect leakage resulting from any cause other than improper handling or storage. Id.

3. A warehouseman to whom are delivered spirits in defective casks is under no obligation to exercise any care to discover and cure the defect or prevent loss by leakage, where by the storage contract the risk of loss by leakage is placed on the owner of the spirits. Id.

4. Improperly piling casks of spirits in a warehouse in double tiers, so as to prevent convenient inspection to discover leakage, will not render the warehouseman liable for leakage in the absence of any attempt at inspection on the part of the owner of the casks, where the storage contract places the duty of inspection on him. Id.

1. A stream 100 feet wide and 3 feet deep, which, during annually recurring freshets for a period of twenty-five years, has been profitably used for floating logs to market, is a public highway for that purpose. Watkins v. Dorris (Wash.) 199

2. A stream 40 feet wide and 4 feet deep at high water lasting about three months of the year, and at other times from 6 inches to 2 feet deep, and which has never been used for purposes of navigation except by row boats to a limited extent for pleasure, is not a navigable stream. Griffith v. Holman (Wash.) 173

3. The provision of the Constitution reserving to the state the title to the beds of the navigable waters of the state does not apply to streams which are valuable only for floating logs to market during periods of annual freshets. Watkins v. Dorris (Wash.) 199

4. The owner of the land on both sides of a non-navigable stream has a right to maintain a fence across it. Griffith v. Holman (Wash.) 178

5. Where the flow of a stream of water has been diverted from its natural channel, or obstructed by a permanent dam, and such diversion or obstruction has continued for the time necessary to establish a prescriptive right to perpetually maintain the same, the riparian owners along such stream of water, who have improved their property with reference to the change and in reliance on the continuance thereof, acquire a reciprocal right to have the artificial conditions remain undisturbed; and the person who placed the obstruction in the stream, or caused the diversion of the waters, and all those claiming under or through him, are estopped upon principles of equity from restoring the waters to their natural channel or state to the injury of such riparian owners. Kray v. Muggli (Minn.) 473

6. Water cannot be taken from a stream to irrigate riparian land, in such quantities as to materially injure lower proprietors in the stream. Jones v. Conn (Or.) 630

7. A lower riparian proprietor cannot complain of the use by an upper proprietor of water for irrigating purposes, if the amount taken is not sufficient to materially injure him or to interfere in any substantial way with his right as a riparian proprietor. Id.

8. The right of a riparian proprietor to use the water for irrigating purposes is not limited to the tract of land bordering on the stream, as first segregated and sold by the government, but extends to lands lying back of such tract and purchased by him from other persons. Id.

9. Irrigation of riparian land cannot be prevented by the fact that it is divided from the stream by a natural ridge over which the water will not flow through ditches wholly on the proprietor's own land, and which will prevent its return to the stream. Id.

10. One attempting to float logs down a stream is liable to the abutting owner for injuries to his land by jams caused by the careless manner of driving the logs. Watkins v. Dorris (Wash.) 199

11. The right to appropriate the water of a spring which has no natural stream flowing therefrom exists under a statute providing that all ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the spring waters of the state shall be governed by the same laws as ditches constructed for the purpose of utilizing the waters of running streams. Brosnan v. Harris (Or.) 628

12. A municipal corporation owning land on a navigable lake and its non-navigable outlet cannot appropriate the waters of the lake for a municipal water supply, even under permission of the state, to the injury of a riparian owner whose rights vested before the adoption of the state Constitution, which asserted ownership in the state of the beds of all navigable lakes, but provided that it should not debar any person from asserting his claim to vested rights. New Whatcom v. Fairhaven Land Co. (Wash.) 190

13. Neither an individual desiring to use a stream for floating logs to market, nor a corporation formed to take advantage of a statute authorizing the improvement of floatable streams, can interfere with the soil in the stream without the consent of the abutting owner, or by operation of law, with due compensation made. Watkins v. Dorris (Wash.) 199

1. A paper is a will where it is duly executed as such and reads: "This is good to Miss Rubie Ferris for eight hundred dollars for care and attendance rendered by her to me in my last sickness. This eight hundred dollars is to be collected out of my estate after my death, provided, however, I die a bachelor." Ferris v. Neville (Mich.) 464

2. A valid bequest may be made by name to an unincorporated educational society, which has an existing organization composed of certain known members, governed by a constitution and by-laws, and having officers chosen to conduct its business affairs and carry out its objects. Re Winchester (Cal.) 281

3. A bequest to an unincorporated educational society may be received by a corporation subsequently formed by its members to carry out the objects of the former society. Id.

4. An absolute gift, and not a trust, is created by a will bequeathing a fund to a church, and "suggesting" that it be used to complete the spire, or invested and the income used to carry on a church mission or for the benefit of the church poor,—especially in view of the fact that the objects designated are so vague as to render the trust void if established, and permit the property to revert to the next of kin, and the word "trust" is used in other parts of the will, where there was a plain intent to create a trust. Williams v. Committee of Baptist Church of Baltimore (Md.) 427
